The Washington Times (9/20, DeBose) adds, "The standard of identification recommended by the" commission "is essentially the same as those established by the recently passed federal Real ID Act, which outlines strict rules and procedures for the issuance of driver's licenses by the states. 'The Real ID is a logical vehicle because the National Voter Registration Act established a connection between obtaining a driver's license and registering to vote,' said the report drafted by the commission. … 'The Real ID card adds two critical elements for voting -- proof of citizenship and verification by using the full Social Security number.'" Carter and Baker "yesterday defended the recommendations, saying photo-identification already is required to board airplanes, cash checks and enter federal buildings. But Commissioner Spencer Overton, a George Washington University election law professor, dissented. 'The recommendation will exclude millions of Americans, and the disproportionate numbers of citizens who will be excluded are people of color,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0006412

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A18, Harwood) relates that Carter and Baker "presented President Bush with their recommendations, which also included information-sharing to prevent voters from registering in more than one state" and "use of mobile offices to ease registration. … They said White House support will be critical to moving some portions through the Republican-controlled Congress, and signaled it may come soon." The Journal adds, "Last night the White House released a statement from the president praising the commission's 'excellent work' and pledging to work with Congress on its recommendations."

Editorials Criticize Voter-ID Recommendation. The Washington Post (9/20, A22) editorializes, "The report released yesterday by" the Commission on Federal Election Reform "contains a number of valuable proposals. But adopting one of the commission's recommendations -- that voters be required to present a government-issued voter ID at the polls -- would, on balance, do more harm than good. … This may not sound particularly burdensome. … Yet 12 percent of the voting-age population does not have a driver's license, and those without identification tend disproportionately to be minorities, the elderly and the poor." And, "for those who don't already have identification, the hurdle of assembling the necessary documentation and obtaining the cards could prove a deterrent to voting." The Post adds that "election administrators agree that absentee ballots pose a bigger risk of fraud, and in that case the commission would guard against fraud by having election officials match a signature on file. … Allowing voters to show alternative forms of identification or to sign a sworn affidavit of eligibility could go a significant way toward deterring fraud without imposing the burden of an inflexible photo ID requirement."

The New York Times (9/20) editorializes that the "bombshell recommendation" requiring "voters to have drivers' licenses or a government-issued photo ID" wouldn't "be a great burden for people who have drivers' licenses, but it would be for those who don't, and they are disproportionately poor, elderly or members of minorities. These voters would have to get special photo ID's and keep them updated. If they didn't have the ID's, their right to vote would be taken away. The commission recommends that the cards be free. But election administration is notoriously underfinanced, and it is not hard to imagine that states would charge for them." The Times adds, "There is very little evidence of voters' claiming to be people they are not. … But the report goes on to say that even if there is just a small amount of fraud, it should be stopped. True, but if the solution risks disenfranchising hundreds of thousands, or even millions, of voters, it is a very bad reform."

Suit Challenges Georgia's Voter ID Law. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/20, Campos, Salzer) reports, "Voting and civil rights groups launched a legal assault Monday on the state's requirement that Georgians show a government-issued photo ID at the polls — a law they call the most restrictive of its kind in the country." The AJC continues, "A federal lawsuit filed on behalf of two African-American voters, the American Civil Liberties Union, NAACP, League of Women Voters, black legislators and others calls the new law a 'poll tax' that will rob black, elderly and rural people of their right to vote. … Supporters of the new law condemned the suit, arguing that the law will eliminate the likelihood of fraud at the polls. House Speaker Glenn Richardson (R-Hiram) called it a 'ludicrous lawsuit.' … 'This lawsuit is nothing more than liberal special interests using unconscionable scare tactics to frighten Georgia voters,' Richardson said." The AJC adds, "While long expected, the suit raises the stakes of a debate that has raged since last winter's session of the Legislature. The suit won't affect today's special elections in Cobb County and elsewhere, but opponents hope a judge throws out the law before elections being held in November in many Georgia cities."

The AP (9/19, Pettys) reports, "The suit was filed the same day a commission co-chaired by former President Carter, a Georgia native, recommended a national requirement that voters show photo IDs. … Opponents of photo IDs for voters say such requirements would disenfranchise minorities and the poor; backers say they're a good way to combat voter fraud. … 'Photographic identification as a requirement for voting is antidemocratic and prevents people from exercising their fundamental right to vote whether proposed by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia or the Carter-Baker commission,' said Daniel Levitas of the American Civil Liberties Union's voting rights project." The AP adds, "Plaintiffs in the suit — including Common Cause, the League of Women Voters, the Georgia Legislative Black Caucus and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People — contend the law violates the state and federal constitutions. … The law eliminates formerly accepted forms of voter identification, such as Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills."

DOJ_NMG_0006413

DOJ's Florida Voting Rights Suit Divides Hispanics. The Orlando Sentinel (9/20, Sashin) reports, "The federal voting-rights lawsuit against Osceola County has become a wedge in the Hispanic community, dividing activists and candidates over the best way to gain political power." The Sentinel continues, "Some supporters of the suit, who filed a similar challenge against the city of Kissimmee, contend that single-member districts would give Hispanics a better shot at representation. … Other Hispanics say there's nothing keeping the right candidate from winning under the current at-large system, in which commissioners are elected by all the voters. Often, they say, Hispanic candidates undercut each other's campaigns, fail to get other Hispanics to vote or convey the wrong message. … 'Saying we should get this because we're Hispanic is not the answer. . . . There's a lot of people who are sick of it,' said Hector Lizasuain, a board member of several community organizations, including Give Kids Safe Shelter." The Sentinel adds, "The Justice Department filed suit against the county in July, alleging Osceola's practice of electing commissioners countywide discriminates against Hispanics because it dilutes their voting strength. The county's Hispanic population has tripled during the past decade. Although they make up 31 percent of registered voters, only one Hispanic has been elected as a county commissioner. … The federal government has suggested that Osceola could create five commission districts, with one made up of mostly Hispanic voters. … Armando Ramirez, who originally complained to the Justice Department and spearheaded the Kissimmee suit, and other activists say a single-member district system is the only way for a minority candidate with little money to get elected."

Disabled Groups Protest Congressional Spending Cuts. Roll Call (9/20, Hechinger) reports, "More than 500 disability-rights protesters from across the country, most in wheelchairs, descended on Congressional offices today to call for expanded patient rights under Medicaid and to express frustration with some Members' calls for deep cuts to social programs. Despite numerous arrests and a heavy Capitol Police presence, the protesters plan to stay on Capitol Hill throughout the week. … Most of those arrested were being held in Room 2128 in the Rayburn House Office Building to be processed, but arrests also were made in the Hart Senate and Cannon House office buildings. No official comment on the number of arrests is yet available." Roll Call notes, "In addition to general calls for enhancing disability rights, the protesters urged Members of Congress to sponsor and pass the Medicaid Community-Based Attendant Services and Supports Act, as well as the Money Follows the Person Act, both of which were proposed by ADAPT, the disability-rights organization leading Monday's protest and fight on the Hill. … 'We've tried being nice,' said Linda Anthony, an ADAPT spokeswoman. 'We've written Congressmen, we've phoned them, we've come to their offices to try to talk, but nothing works. We're done playing nice. We'd rather go to jail then go back to the nursing homes.'"

Senate Debate On Flag Burning Could Affect 2006 Races. A flag burning amendment is likely to make it to the Senate floor before next year's elections, The Hill (9/20, Cusack, Lanham) reports. Republicans "will use the proposed amendment to the Constitution as political ammunition in 2006. Several targeted Democrats in the upper chamber oppose changing the Constitution to prohibit flag burning, including Sens. Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Robert Byrd (W.Va.)." The Hill adds, "The fate of a pending flag-burning amendment lies in the hands of a few senators. Because Sen. Orrin Hatch's (R-Utah) amendment would alter the Constitution, it needs 67 votes, two-thirds of the Senate, to pass. Including Hatch, the amendment has 58 co-sponsors. Based on previous votes, the measure has the likely support of 63 senators — if senators vote the way they have previously."

ANTITRUST:

Ohio, Wisconsin Plan Minimum-Service Real State Laws. Inman News (9/20, Roberts) reports, "Realtor associations in Wisconsin and Ohio are pushing for laws that establish new service requirements for real estate professionals while making room for real estate companies that offer a lesser range of services for lower fees." Inman continues, "In several other states, Realtor-backed efforts to establish a mandatory range of services for all real estate professionals – effectively banning some limited forms of real estate services – have drawn sharp criticism from antitrust officials at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. … But the Realtor groups in Wisconsin and Ohio say their proposals recognize and provide some protections for real estate business models that offer fewer services than traditional firms. In both of these states, Realtor associations formed task forces to study the law changes, with representation from limited-service real estate companies." Inman adds, "The Association of Real Estate License Law Officials, a group for real estate regulators, conducted a study that found that Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas and Utah have enacted some form of minimum-service legislation within the past couple of years. And other states, too, have earlier approved or are now pursuing minimum-service measures. … Federal officials opposed the Realtor-backed measures in Alabama, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas, charging that the legislation was anticompetitive and anti-consumer. But legislators and governors in all four states passed the measures despite these objections."

DOJ_NMG_0006414

MasterCard To Issue No-Touch Cards. Reuters (9/19, Kelleher) reports, "A top executive with Mastercard Inc. said on Monday the company, the world's No. 2 credit-card association, expected to have 4 million so-called 'pay pass' cards in circulation by year's end." Reuters continues, "Speaking at an industry conference here, Ruth Ann Marshall, Americas president for MasterCard, said that Citibank, HSBC and Key Bank had all begun offering the cards, which are equipped with a radio-frequency chip that allows customers to pay for purchases by simply waving their cards at readers posted near cash registers or gas pumps. … Marshall said the pay-pass cards were 'easier to use than cash' and were one of the products MasterCard was counting on to increase revenue and profits as it faces a variety of challenges in the marketplace, including new rivals and regulatory scrutiny. … 'It's just one of the ... breakthroughs in technology that we're pursuing in order to increase convenience and boost usage,' Marshall said." Reuters adds, "MasterCard, owned by more than 1,000 banks, formally revealed its plans last week to go public early next year in an initial public offering. … In addition, to raising money to bolster its balance sheet, MasterCard said it believed the IPO would help quell criticism from merchants and others, who charge that its current structure -- which foes characterize as a cartel of competing banks setting transaction fees in concert -- represents a violation of U.S. antitrust laws."

Verizon, Source Resources Settle Records Dispute. The Washington Post (9/20, D5, Krim) reports that Source Resources Inc. of Cookeville, TN has reached an agreement with Verizon to stop selling personal cell phone records of individuals over the Internet and will provide information on how it acquired the data. The paper says the firm "was among dozens of companies advertising that for fees starting under $100, they would provide records of calls placed to and from any phone user." The Post adds, "Although phone records cannot lead to the type of financial fraud that can result when other types of personal data are stolen, experts said they can be exploited by criminals, such as stalkers or abusive spouses trying to locate their victims. Wireless carriers say cases of purloined records are rare and that they take measures to safeguard the information. But the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a leading privacy rights group, last month urged the Federal Communications Commission to crack down on carriers for having inadequate security." The paper notes Verizon Wireless sued Source Resources in July, after a Verizon Wireless customer complained that his records had been obtained from Source Resources without his permission.

Regulators Near Approval Of Industry-Altering Phone Deals. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Schatz, Wilke) reports that federal regulators "are nearing approval of two deals that would reshape the telephone industry and are in negotiations over likely divestitures and other conditions intended to preserve competition, especially in the huge market for corporate customers." The Journal adds, "Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin is pressing the FCC staff to deliver as early as tomorrow recommendations to approve Verizon Communications Inc.'s $8.5 billion purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications Inc.'s $16 billion takeover of AT&T Corp., people familiar with the situation say. FCC votes on the deals could come as early as the agency's Oct. 12 meeting." The paper continues, "At the same time, Justice Department investigators have concluded that the merging companies must sell some assets, moves they believe are needed to preserve competition for high-volume business customers, said lawyers close to the government review. Antitrust enforcers are negotiating with SBC and Verizon on the scope of those divestitures, these people said. That is a concern for SBC and Verizon, since a major goal of their acquisitions was to acquire lucrative corporate customers in order to sell more packages of telecom services. As a result of both the FCC and Justice Department reviews, regulators are concerned that consolidation will make it more difficult for business customers to get discounts on telecom services."

DOJ_NMG_0006415

File-Sharing Firms Seek Deal With Recording Industry. The New York Times (9/20, Hansell) reports, "At least five online file-sharing companies have started trying to reach an accord with the music industry to convert the free trading of copyrighted music on their networks to paid services, according to several recording industry and file-sharing executives. The most advanced discussions are between the recording industry and Grokster, a small California company that has been sued by the entertainment industry, recording industry executives said." The Times adds, "Grokster has agreed in principle to be acquired by Mashboxx, a new company backed by Sony that is trying to start a legal file-sharing service, a person involved in the negotiations said. Mashboxx has made overtures to some file-sharing companies including eDonkey, Morpheus and LimeWire, but negotiations are not active, the person said." The paper continues, "Separately, iMesh, a file-sharing service that last year reached an accord with the music industry to convert to a legal paid service, has made overtures to acquire a number of the other file-sharing services, on the condition that they settle their claims with the recording industry, said Robert E. Summer, the executive chairman of iMesh."

Financier Ross Eyes Auto Parts Manufacturers. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, McCracken) reports, "Billionaire Wilbur L. Ross, the New York-based financier who in recent years merged five faltering steel companies to create a steelmaker he later sold for a huge profit, says he has as much as $4.5 billion in capital to bank on his next venture -- buying up troubled auto-parts makers, possibly including unprofitable operations Visteon Corp. is about to jettison. Mr. Ross's investment group and other funds he is working have already snapped up half the bank debt of automotive supplier Collins & Aikman Corp., which is under Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection, and stakes in smaller suppliers in Europe and Asia. Another potential target he could be interested in includes the 23 plants and other facilities that Visteon is about to transfer back to former parent Ford Motor Co." The Journal adds Visteon and Ford last week announced an agreement under which Ford will take over 17 Visteon plants, plus six offices, research centers and other facilities in the US and Mexico on Oct. 1. The assets, with combined annual sales of more than $7 billion, by themselves would make up the world's 17th largest auto supplier by sales. Ford, which will have to spend between $450 million and $650 million this year and $300 million to $500 million after that for buyouts of hourly workers, has said it hopes to sell the businesses to investors or new owners.

StarPoint To Acquire Acclaim In Energy Deal. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Carlisle) reports, "StarPoint Energy Trust said it agreed to acquire Acclaim Energy Trust in a stock transaction, in an attempt to create one of the biggest entities in Canada's increasingly crowded energy-trust sector, with the financial clout to pursue larger acquisitions. Under the agreement, StarPoint unitholders would get 53% of the new trust, receiving one unit for each StarPoint unit held. Acclaim unitholders would receive 0.8333 of a new-trust unit for each Acclaim unit held. StarPoint and Acclaim unitholders also would receive shares in a company exploring for oil and natural gas, to be spun off from the combined entity's assets. Based on StarPoint's closing share price, Acclaim shareholders would receive equity valued at about $1.93 billion." The paper adds, "At a news conference, Acclaim President and Chief Executive J. Paul Charron, who has been named to the same post at the combined trust, said he expects the increase in size to give the trust a competitive edge in pursuing acquisitions in a heated international market for oil and natural-gas assets."

Norsk Hydro To Buy Spinnaker. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Talley) reports that Norway's Norsk Hydro ASA said it will acquire Spinnaker Exploration Co., of the US, for $2.45 billion "substantially accelerating the Norwegian company's international production growth and making the Gulf of Mexico a future core production area." The paper adds, "Both Norsk Hydro and analysts said the price is high but that the acquisition is necessary if Norsk Hydro is going to increase the low rate at which it replaces reserves. The Norwegian oil, gas, power and aluminum company said it will pay $65.50 a share for Spinnaker, which has oil and gas assets primarily in the Gulf of Mexico."

DOJ_NMG_0006416

Microsoft Buys Alacris. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Guth) reports, "Microsoft Corp. said it bought privately held Alacris Inc., a small maker of software for managing employees' access to corporate computer networks, to help improve the security of Microsoft's programs. Terms weren't disclosed. Ottawa-based Alacris's software manages smart cards, or plastic cards that store a person's identification data. The purchase is an extension of joint work by the two companies on security software called idNexus for managing smart cards." The paper adds, "Alacris is part of a recent wave of companies that are developing technologies for administrating the electronic 'identities' of computer-network users by means such as granting or removing their access. The Journal continues, "By purchasing Alacris, Microsoft intends to make it easier for users of its server software to administer smart cards -- handling tasks such as setting up people with cards and retiring cards when a person leaves a company. Under increased scrutiny by its customers over the security of its software, Microsoft has bought technologies in the past two years to help it fight Internet-borne attacks such as spyware and viruses."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Pombo Offers Amendments To Endangered Species Act. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo proposed amendments to the Endangered Species Act that would make it more difficult for the federal government to set aside land deemed crucial to the heath of endangered species. The New York Times (9/20, Barringer) reports that the proposed amendments "also increase the obligation of government agencies to tell landowners quickly if the law limits their development options, and to compensate them." The Times adds, "The measure, which drew quick denunciations from groups like Environmental Defense, Defenders of Wildlife and the Natural Resources Defense Council, was proposed by the House Resources Committee chairman, Representative Richard W. Pombo, Republican of California."

Losers In Eminent Domain Case Face $300,000 In Fees. The Washington Times (9/20, Price) reports, "Seven homeowners in New London, Conn., who narrowly lost a court battle to save their homes from condemnation say the city is still demanding as much as $300,000 in 'use and occupancy' fees dating to the November 2000 condemnation order. They say the demands are being made even though an eviction order from last week has been rescinded. It had been issued by the semi-public New London Development Corp. and had told the homeowners to move out in the next 30 to 90 days and pay $600 a month in rent while they continue to occupy the premises. An attorney for NLDC, which wants to demolish the homes to make room for private development, had told the homeowners' attorney last year that the city, for which NLDC has acted as an agent, expects to collect the occupancy fees."

Native American Nation Works To Stop Arctic Drilling. The Washington Post (9/20, C1, de la Torre) reports on the efforts of the Gwich'in, "a nation of 8,000 Native Americans" who make their home in Alaska, to prevent the passage of a budget bill that includes a provision allowing for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The Gwich'in "see the prospect of drilling as a sure sign of their own demise."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Attorney: Internet Opens Doors For Drug Ring. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/19, Smith) reports, "Dr. Akhil Bansal was one of 17 people indicted by a federal grand jury in Philadelphia last April for allegedly taking part in 'an international conspiracy to import and distribute' prescription drugs, using the Internet. Five additional defendants were charged in a 'related indictment' in New York. … 'This case shows us how the Internet has opened the door to an unregulated universe from which anyone with access to a computer can purchase anything from anti-anxiety drugs to anabolic steroids,' said U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan, the Philadelphia area's top federal lawman, when the cases were made public." Christine Konieczny is a Lower Merion police officer assigned to a DEA task force. "The drugs are manufactured abroad, do not bear required labels and warnings, and are being imported without Customs declarations or payment of duty," said Konieczny.

DOJ_NMG_0006417

Report: Congress To Investigate Orioles' Palmeiro. The AP (9/20) reports, "Congressional investigators looking into whether [Baltimore Orioles first baseman] Rafael Palmeiro lied under oath are interviewing players who know him, including a Colorado outfielder suspended this year for steroids, The Associated Press has learned. Palmeiro testified to the House Government Reform Committee in March that he never had used steroids. The Baltimore Orioles slugger…was suspended by Major League Baseball for 10 days in August for failing a drug test." According to the AP, "a congressional source familiar with the committee's work, speaking to the AP on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said Monday that 'several active players' have spoken or will speak with the committee."

Report: Drugs In Iraq Called Threat To U.S.'s National Security. The WashingtonTimes (9/19, Scarborough) reports, "Insurgents and foreign terrorists in Iraq are being financed in part by the illicit drug trade originating in Afghanistan and passing through Iraq to Europe, congressional and defense sources say. Money from Afghan-produced heroin is being used by terror cells to buy weapons and equipment, and pay Iraqi citizens to conduct attacks on U.S. troops and to plant deadly improvised explosive devices (IEDs), U.S. officials say." In a Sept. 8 letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde is reported to have written of an "emerging and dangerous growth of the illicit drug trade in Iraq, especially with heroin, now originating and pouring out of nearby Afghanistan. We can no longer ignore the threat to our national security from drugs in Iraq," the Illinois Republican is reported to have written in the letter obtained by The Washington Times.

Former Haitian Anti-Narcotics Chief Faces Trial. The AP (9/19, Anderson) reports, "A top Haitian police official in the government of ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide is facing trial on charges that he accepted thousands of dollars in bribes to help Colombian drug lords move huge loads of cocaine through the impoverished Caribbean country." Jury selection is expected to begin this week in the case against Evintz Brillant, "the only one of four former senior Haitian police officials who has not pleaded guilty in the investigation of drug trafficking inside the Aristide government." According to the U.S. DEA, "Brillant used his post as head of Haiti's top anti-drug police unit from 2001 to 2004 to help drug traffickers ship thousands of pounds of cocaine through Haiti, including the airport in the capital of Port-au-Prince, to the United States, Europe and elsewhere."

Tucson Anti-Youth Violence Crackdown Yields Hundreds Of Arrests. The Tucson Citizen (9/20, Teibel, Rowley) reports, "Tucson police made 356 arrests over the summer in specialized efforts to reduce the number of juveniles involved in crimes and to put a cap on a rash of murders. … Of that number, 194 of those arrested were juveniles while the rest were adults." The Citizen continues, "Operations Division South Capt. Perry Tarrant said the summer youth deployment, which lasted from May 27 to Aug. 20, was funded by a grant from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and a private grant from Kino Weed and Seed. … On July 28, police and ATF agents expanded the program to target adult troublemakers after there were four homicides in three days: one on July 23, one on the 24th and two on the 25th, said Assistant police Chief Kathleen Robinson." The Citizen adds, "The expanded special patrols had officers looking for such things as illegal gatherings in business parking lots, rowdy gatherings and drinking in public, considered precursors to killings. The patrols went on until Sept. 10, Robinson said. … From July 28 to Sept. 10 there were no homicides in the South Side patrol area, said Sgt. Kerry Fuller, a police spokeswoman. During the same period last year there were two, she said. … Citywide there have been 33 homicides this year. There were 38 by this time last year, Fuller said Friday afternoon."

Judge Rules US Marshals Service Must Release Defendants' Photos. The Detroit Free Press/AP (9/20) reports, "A federal judge has ruled that the U.S. Marshals Service must comply with media requests for photos of criminal defendants, but said it can take up to 20 days to process the requests under the Federal Freedom of Information Act." The AP continues, "The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor also said that the requests may be processed through the Marshals Service headquarters in Washington, rather than through its office in Detroit, the Free Press reported in a story on its Web site Monday." The AP adds, "The newspaper had asked in its lawsuit that the photos be provided through the Detroit office. Pictures previously requested in Detroit usually were provided the same day. … The Free Press and the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal sued the Marshals Service earlier this year after it stopped providing the photos on the grounds that it would invade the privacy of defendants."

DOJ_NMG_0006418

Deadly Kansas Rig Blast Might Have Been Arson. The AP (9/20) reports, "Evidence of possible criminal activity has been found in a natural gas drilling rig explosion (in Independence, KS) that killed two workers and injured a third, authorities said Monday." The AP continues, "The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Kansas State Fire Marshal's office and the Montgomery County Sheriff's Department are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and conviction in the June 2 explosion. … 'If this tragedy was the result of a deliberate criminal act, we will not rest until whoever is responsible was brought to justice,' Sheriff Stan Veach said in a statement announcing the reward. … Paul Marquardt, an ATF spokesman in Kansas City, Mo., would not discuss the evidence in detail."

IMMIGRATION:

Nominee To Head Immigration Bureau Criticized As Inexperienced. The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Eggen, Hsu) reports, "The Bush administration is seeking to appoint a lawyer with little immigration or customs experience to head the troubled law enforcement agency that handles those issues, prompting sharp criticism from some employee groups, immigration advocates and homeland security experts. The push to appoint Julie Myers to head the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, part of the Department of Homeland Security, comes in the midst of intense debate over the qualifications of department political appointees involved in the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina. Concerns over Myers, 36, were acute enough at a Senate hearing last week that lawmakers asked the nominee to detail during her testimony her postings and to account for her management experience." Sen. George Voinovich "went so far as to tell Myers that her résumé indicates she is not qualified for the job. But Voinovich has since met with Myers and is now likely to support her, his spokeswoman said yesterday. Myers, who has attracted strong support from many former colleagues, told senators that she would draw upon the experiences of ICE veterans in running the agency." Myers said, "I realize that I'm not 80 years old. I have a few gray hairs, more coming, but I will seek to work with those who are knowledgeable in this area, who know more than I do."

Conflict Looms Between White House, DeLay On Immigration Reform. The Hill (9/20, O'Connor) reports that the White House's "comprehensive immigration overhaul" laid out to congressional Republicans last week is "creating a potential conflict between the administration and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay," a supporter of "an incremental approach to reform. The comprehensive package would increase enforcement on the border, create new workplace requirements for employers and expand guest-worker programs inside and outside the United States." Rep. Jeff Flake said the White House "'insists on comprehensive reform,' putting the president at odds with DeLay and those congressional Republicans who would rather change the current immigration code one law at a time. As recently as last week, DeLay said he would prefer passing a bill to increase border security before taking up legislation to address workplace enforcement or the current guest-worker program."

TAX:

"Survivor" Winner Hatch Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Evasion. The AP (9/20) reports, "Richard Hatch, who won $1 million on the first season of the U.S. reality show 'Survivor,'" pleaded not guilty Monday "to charges that he failed to pay taxes on his winnings and other income." The AP continues, "Hatch has been charged with tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. He entered the plea in U.S. District Court. … A grand jury indictment filed earlier this month said Hatch filed false tax returns for 2000 and 2001 that omitted his income from the CBS show, $327,000 he was paid to co-host a radio show and $28,000 in rent on a property he owns." The AP adds, "Hatch, 44, also was accused of misusing $36,500 from a nonprofit camp he set up. … The former corporate trainer said the 10-count indictment was retribution for his refusal earlier this year to follow through with a plea deal."

DOJ_NMG_0006419

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Testimony Fuels Conservative Unease. The Hill (9/20, Bolton) reports a "rift has opened between conservatives in the nation's capital and those outside the Washington Beltway over John Roberts and his carefully worded testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week." The split has "divided those on the right who communicate regularly with the White House from conservative activists whose view of Roberts was shaped by the recently completed hearings." The "conservatives who are voicing concerns about Roberts behind the scenes" are "sending a message to President Bush that his next nominee to the Supreme Court should have a clear record and be unafraid to express boldly his or her beliefs. As result, political pressure is growing on Bush to nominate an outspoken conservative to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor." Ironically, "the aspects of Roberts's nomination that have frustrated Senate Democrats and liberal groups trying to inflict political damage on him — specifically the few writings expressing his legal views, and furthermore the reluctance to express those views in Senate hearings — have also frustrated conservatives."

Specter Says He'll Vote For Roberts. Reuters (9/20, Ferraro) reports Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "said on Monday he will vote for John Roberts to be U.S. chief justice even though it is uncertain what the conservative appeals court judge will do on the Supreme Court." Specter said, "It's my judgment that he's well qualified ... and I intend to vote aye when his nomination is called before the Senate." Reuters adds Specter "had been expected to back Roberts."

The Legal Intelligencer (9/20, Blumenthal) reports, "With U.S. Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter announcing his support Monday, the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States gained momentum." The Intelligencer continues, "The Pennsylvania Republican, in a speech on the Senate floor, said 'Judge Roberts' answers demonstrated that he would take a fair, non-ideological approach to the law.' In Specter's view, Roberts had not tipped his hand on whether he would vote to preserve or overturn Supreme Court precedent on a woman's right to end her pregnancy. … 'Notwithstanding his answers and my efforts to glean some realistic expectation from his words and body language, candidly it is not possible to predict or have a solid expectation of what Judge Roberts would do,' he said." The Intelligencer adds, "On Sunday, Specter -- who chaired last week's sometimes contentious confirmation hearings to generally positive reviews -- even suggested that Roberts serve as the template for President Bush's next nomination to the Supreme Court. … But local legal scholars said Bush faces a much tougher fight when he makes his choice for a new associate justice." The Intelligencer notes, "Gregory Magarian, a constitutional law professor at Villanova University School of Law and a former clerk for Justice John Paul Stevens, said Specter managed to run Roberts' hearing equitably. … 'Sen. Specter attempted to go after information but he didn't grandstand and he definitely didn't grease the wheels for him,' Magarian said. … But Magarian and Temple University's Beasley School of Law professor Mark Rahdert, a clerk for former Justice Harry A. Blackmun, both said Roberts' decision to not answer questions dealing with hot-button issues such as abortion could set a precedent for the next nominee. … 'He played that card more than any candidate I have seen in recent memory,' Rahdert said. 'And each time that happens in the future, nominees will have more room to not answer questions. It's one thing if it's an actual case that will wind up before the court. But he can answer questions about an area of the law and he chose not to do so.'"

Liberal Groups Put Spotlight On Senators With White House Aspirations. The Hill (9/20, Allen) reports a "vote for Judge John Roberts could be well within the mainstream but that may not be where Democrats with an eye on the Oval Office are looking to swim, according to some political strategists and analysts." Democratic consultant Steve McMahon said, "If you're running for president, you need to take a hard look at voting no because that's where the Democratic base is." The Hill adds Democratic senators, "particularly those who harbor presidential aspirations, have plenty of reason to watch each other closely as a floor vote on Roberts's nomination to become chief justice of the United States approaches." Support for Roberts "could burnish a senator's centrist credentials and give room to oppose President Bush's pick to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy. But influential interest groups on the left — a source of strength in Democratic primaries — are pressuring their allies in the Senate to oppose Roberts." When the Roberts "roll call starts, those senators who are viewed as possible contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 — including Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), 2004 nominee John Kerry (Mass.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and perhaps others — will already be under a microscope. That is particularly true of Clinton, who has not publicly revealed her intentions on either Roberts or the 2008 race."

DOJ_NMG_0006420

LA Times Urges Democrats To Confirm Roberts. The Los Angeles Times (9/20) editorializes, "As last week's confirmation hearings made clear," John Roberts "is an exceptionally qualified nominee, well within the mainstream of American legal thought, who deserves broad bipartisan support." He should therefore be confirmed as the next chief justice of the United States, and if "a majority of Democrats in the Senate vote against Roberts, they will reveal themselves as nothing more than self-defeating obstructionists."

White House Reportedly Changing Criteria For Second High Court Nominee. The New York Times (9/20, Kirkpatrick, Stolberg) reports the White House is "reshuffling its short list of potential Supreme Court nominees with a new emphasis on finding someone who will hold up under the pressure of what is expected to be fierce confirmation battle, several Republican allies close to the process said on Monday." The "shifting calculus reflects the increased stakes in replacing the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor as the court's swing vote as well as the expectation that the new nominee will be measured against Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who was hailed by both parties for his performance during almost 20 hours of confirmation hearings for the post of chief justice." The shift also "indicates that the administration expects some Democrats' pent-up frustration with what they labeled as Judge Roberts's evasiveness to spill over into the hearings for a new nominee. Republican aides briefed on the search said the White House was looking mainly at female jurists for Justice O'Connor's seat, but it has expanded its short list and it is examining the contenders anew in the expectation of a trial by fire." The "new criteria could hurt the chances of Judge Janice Rogers Brown," because Brown, "an African-American known for her fiery speeches to conservative crowds, might try to fight back against vigorous questioning. Other conservative strategists say that she also lacks experience on the federal bench and that supporting her highly ideological oratory might strain the solidarity of the Senate Republican caucus." Strategists "say the White House is evaluating whether" Judge Priscilla R. Owen's "reticence and mild manner would be a strength or a weakness under interrogation in the Senate." Others "said to remain under consideration include the contenders for the last vacancy, Judge Edith H. Jones and Judge Edith Brown Clement of the Fifth Circuit, as well as Judge Alice M Batchelder of the Sixth Circuit, Judge Karen Williams of the Fourth Circuit and Judge Consuelo M. Callahan of the Ninth Circuit. Judge Callahan, a Republican appointee, is Hispanic, and President Bush has made clear that he would like to name a Hispanic to the court."

USA Today Says Bush Should Appoint Woman Or Minority. USA Today (9/20) says that "with the retirement of" Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, "the nation's highest court will lose more of a commodity already in very short supply — different life experiences. When President Bush nominates O'Connor's successor, he will have an opportunity to remedy that, and it should be a priority." In a "nation as diverse as America, a diversity of ideas and perspectives adds to the court's ability to wisely decide issues that change lives. If all nine justices see law and life from the same vantage point, their ideas will not be challenged, tested and honed into the best possible rulings." To those who "argue that merit and legal scholarship should be the only standards, the answer is it's easy to name a minority or female justice without compromising excellence or creating quotas."

Attorney Argues Merit Should Be Only Qualification. In a USA Today op-ed (9/20), Chicago attorney Thomas Heiden says, "The next nominee for the court should be chosen on the basis of merit (and not 'diversity,' however defined) for several important reasons: To maintain a bright line difference between law and politics. To re-emphasize that the function of the highest court is to maintain the rule of law. So that the court does not become an extension of our increasingly divided political culture, but that it stands as the independent counterweight to those influences." To "nominate a justice because he or she is a member of a group obviously signals that his or her decisions in certain cases will be influenced by membership in that group. To do so misperceives the court as a legislature and the justices as legislators."

Debate Grows Over Paying For Katrina Reconstruction. As cost estimates for Hurricane Katrina reconstruction increase, so does the volume of the debate over how to finance it. Some conservative Republicans are chafing at the prospects of a bloated

DOJ_NMG_0006421

Federal deficit, while Democrats have called for the elimination or reduction of the President's tax cuts.

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 5, 2:05, Gregory) reported, "The true cost of Katrina is only beginning to sink in: A $200 billion estimate, at least for reconstruction, much of it to be paid by taxpayers. That's on top of the roughly $200 billion taxpayers have already spent in Iraq to date. Conservatives are getting fed up, openly complaining about the return of big government under George W. Bush." Chris Edwards, Cato Institute: "We may never see a balanced budget in our lifetimes again if the President continues spending like this." Gregory: "Again today the White House warned that Katrina will swell the $333 billion deficit but so far has not asked Americans for any sizeable sacrifice." Some Republicans in Congress "are looking to cut costs. One target, the President's $700 billion prescription drug benefit for seniors set to hit the books next year." Sen. John McCain: "Let's go back to square one. $700 billion already on a broken entitlement program isn't going to work." Gregory: "Democrats have called on the President to roll back his tax cuts, something he's said he won't do."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 4, 2:30, Borger) reported, "McCain never liked the expensive prescription drug benefit in the first place, and now he tells us he wants Congress to kill it to help pay for Katrina and the war." McCain: "We've got to go back and look at the Medicare prescription. It was supposed to cost $400 billion. It's now up to $700 billion. Cancel it, go back to square one, and get prescription drugs to the truly needy."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 6, 2:00, Taibbi) reported, "Even in 'red state' Oklahoma, Republican politicians aren't convinced that on a national level, the party's figured the specifics about how to pay for the recovery. Sen. Tom Coburn says maybe this isn't the time to make President Bush's tax cuts permanent, or to fund all those pork barrel projects costing hundreds of millions." Sen. Tom Coburn: "This is a moral question. It's not just an economic question."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Chaddock) reports that the President's "call to spend 'whatever it takes' to rebuild the Gulf Coast set off alarm bells among some in his conservative base -- and stepped up a growing debate among Republicans at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue on how to fix the battered region in ways that promote conservative values. From vouchers for education and Medicaid to the creation of a giant 'opportunity zone' where Katrina struck, the Bush reconstruction effort -- which he called 'one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen' -- is reviving prospects for policy initiatives that GOP leaders say could make or break their party's future." But fiscal conservatives, "often outside of leadership, are calling for deep cuts in existing spending to pay the costs of reconstruction. They, too, see this as a fight for the soul of the Republican Party."

Cost Of Medicare Prescription Drug Program In Spotlight. The Washington Times (9/20, Lambro, Fagan) reports, "Some House and Senate members want President Bush to postpone his Medicare prescription-drug program to help pay for Hurricane Katrina relief as the fight over the deficit and the cost of rebuilding heats up. By targeting the Medicare program, which Congress passed in 2003 despite objections from some conservatives, the lawmakers are striking right at Mr. Bush's signature first-term domestic-policy achievement."

Roll Call (9/20, Bresnahan) reports that Republican Study Committee Chairman Rep. Mike Pence "said Congress must do something to rein in federal spending, even more now that the Gulf Coast recovery effort will add tens of billions of dollars to the federal budget. Pence vowed to continue to push for a vote on delaying implementation of the Medicare drug program, despite White House opposition." Pence said, "With all due respect to the White House and their intentions, House conservatives will vigorously pursue the one-year delay in the Medicare prescription drug entitlement."

Possible Greenspan Successor Sees "Modest" Economic Damage From Katrina. Reuters (9/20) reports that according to Glenn Hubbard, "who is cited as a possible candidate to head the U.S. Federal Reserve," economic damage from Katrina "is likely to be modest, making the case for huge government aid questionable. … In a Financial Times commentary on Monday, Hubbard said that federal fiscal aid should be used to cushion the blow to business and consumer confidence from a nasty regional shock. But overall the short-term hit to unemployment and production is likely to be modest, offset by rebuilding over the coming year, and long-term damage to energy supplies also seems unlikely."

Consultants Suggest Politicians "Tithe" For Relief From Campaign Funds. In a Los Angeles Times (9/20) op-ed, Gerald Rafshoon and Doug Bailey, the "opposing advertising consultants in the Carter-Ford presidential campaign in 1976," write, "Members of Congress have voted more than $60 billion in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, with the total estimated to eventually go as high as $200 billion. But that's (mostly) your money. What about their campaign money? … Washington should call a 90-day moratorium on campaign fundraising, and both parties -- and all congressional incumbents -- should tithe from their campaign funds for Katrina relief. That means 10% of their war chests should go to hurricane relief, or they should raise that amount and donate it to the relief effort instead of collecting still more for the 2006 campaign battles. While we're at it, how about extending the moratorium to political action committees and lobbyists and asking them to take what they have budgeted for the politicians and give it to Katrina relief instead."

DOJ_NMG_0006422

Bush Proposes School Vouchers For All Displaced Students. The Washington Post (9/20, A8, Goldstein) reports that President Bush is proposing school vouchers for all students displaced by Katrina. The plan would let parents "enroll their children in a private or religious school this year at federal expense, even if they had gone to public schools back home, administration officials said yesterday." As the "new fine print of the proposal emerged, White House and Education Department spokesmen confirmed that the government payment -- as much as $7,500 per child -- would be given for a year to any displaced family that now prefers an alternative to public schools."

New Orleans Students, Teachers Face Tough Transition. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 14, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "For the students and teachers of New Orleans' schools, it is a tough transition getting beyond the devastation and back to education." CBS (Cowan) added, "The devastation of New Orleans is already in the history books, quite literally in classrooms all across the city. The desks, chairs, the children's artwork, even their report cards, were all lost to the rising water. This is the fate suffered by more than 186,000 school kids all across Louisiana. They'll all have to be moved to a new school -- new friends, new teachers. That in and of itself would be stressful enough, but imagine that on top of everything else that they've seen."

Affirmative Action Requirement For Some Katrina Contractors Suspended. The New York Times (9/20, Glater) reports the Labor Department "has temporarily suspended government requirements that its contractors have an affirmative action plan addressing the employment of women, members of minorities, Vietnam veterans and the disabled if the companies are first-time government contractors working on reconstruction in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." While employment lawyers "said it was not clear how strong an impact the exemption would have, the move comes as President Bush has tried to address the perception of unfairness in the government's response to the hurricane." The "goal of the exemption in the case of recovery work associated with Hurricane Katrina is to reduce the burden of paperwork on government contractors and so encourage more companies to jump into assisting with rebuilding from the storm damage. The exemption is to last for three months, unless it is extended."

Black Ministers Say Bush's Outreach Since Katrina Undoing Political Damage. Under the headline "Storm Strains Bush's Ties to Black Clergy," the Los Angeles Times (9/20, Wallsten, Hamburger) reports that for "many of the black ministers who have allied themselves with President Bush and a Republican strategy to boost the party's African American support, the government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina put a severe strain on new and still-fragile bonds of trust." But "just as some ministers had begun denouncing a government recovery effort that seemed to leave many blacks in the Gulf region behind, a number of those African American clergy say an aggressive outreach campaign by Bush and senior White House aides in recent days has begun reversing what might have been lasting political damage." In addition, the ministers and the "cadre of conservative policy analysts who consult with the White House" suggest that the "Katrina relief response, while tarnishing the GOP image in the short term, could foster a Republican-led battle against poverty that would give the party a list of new selling points for African American voters."

Several columns in today's opinion pages explore issues of race and social class, and their impact on the Katrina recovery efforts. In his Washington Post (9/20, A23) column, headlined "Incompetence, Not Racism," Richard Cohen writes, "If you told me that George W. Bush is a dummy, I would argue with you but understand why you thought so: all those idiotic statements. But if you told me, as some have been implying, that Bush is a racist or that he doesn't care about black people, I would not only say that you're wrong but add, 'Not the George Bush I know.' … In his first presidential campaign, I traveled with him and tried, as he might say, to look into his heart. Conveniently enough, he sometimes wears it on his sleeve -- never more so, as I discovered, than when he talks about poor kids and racial and ethnic minorities. His feelings for them -- especially for poor kids -- are genuine. … In general it was incompetence, not racism, that slowed the relief effort -- incompetence on the local and state levels, too, and incompetence on the part of black as well as white public officials."

DOJ_NMG_0006423

In his Washington Post (9/20, A23) column, E.J. Dionne Jr. writes, "If the rebuilding of New Orleans is to be something other than a new government disaster, a coalition of the skeptical and the visionary will have to stand together and confront the lobbyists and the corporate welfare artists. Fiscal conservatives in Congress are right to worry about the potential for -- yes -- waste, fraud and abuse if the federal government throws off tens of billions of dollars into a haphazard and ill-planned spending fest. … But because the rest of us are morally obligated to those whose lives have been damaged by natural calamity and government failure, it's a fact that the federal government will be spending a lot of money. That's why the fiscal conservatives need the visionaries."

Donna Brazile echoes that sentiment in her Roll Call (9/20) column, "One of the most difficult conversations I have endured in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is the discussion about race and poverty. … Katrina was an equal opportunity destroyer. She did not care whether you owned a home on the lakefront or rented an apartment in the 'projects.' This monster hurricane uprooted big elm trees and oak trees that lined our historic neighborhoods as though they were toothpicks." Brazile adds, "In the aftermath of all this destruction, Congress should hold a series of hearings that allow the victims to tell their stories to determine how to help them get a fresh start. … Based on my experience, the worst part of being a member of the chronic poor or the working poor is the uncertainty about how to maneuver the system. Add race to this equation, and you have a recipe for hopelessness."

Fueled By Katrina Aftermath, Bush Disapproval Rating Hits Record High In Gallup Poll. USA Today (9/20, Page) reports that President Bush's disapproval rating is increasing "in the wake of dismay over the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, the course of the Iraq war and the future of the economy." While Bush's overall approval rating in the latest USA Today/CNN/Gallup Poll "is 40%, equaling a previous low," his "disapproval is 58%, a new high." And by a "record 66%-31%, independents disapprove of the job Bush is doing as president. White House press secretary Scott McClellan says the president 'knows a leader must govern based on what he believes is right, not based on polls.' Bush is 'working to address the priorities that Americans are most concerned about,' he says."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/19, Malveaux) commented on the poll. Bush "will be back in the hurricane-damaged regions again tomorrow. That will be his fifth trip. And the latest poll shows that 58% believe that the President has been going for political reasons. They do not believe that he sincerely cares about the victims."

Government Forced To Look To Contractors With "Checkered Histories." The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Dreazen) reports on Texas ambulance provider GoldStar EMS, which "was on the ropes earlier this year, beset by legal problems." After Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast and the company won a subcontract from a government contractor to provide up to 45 ambulances a day in hurricane-damaged Louisiana. The contract "illustrates one of the unintended consequences of what is shaping up to be the largest government rebuilding effort in U.S. history. As the Bush administration rushes to rebuild Louisiana, it faces the prospect of turning to companies with checkered histories that even include disputes with other arms of the government. It's essentially a no-win situation: If officials don't get quick results, they're likely to be criticized for getting bogged down in bureaucracy. But if they push some of the contracting formalities aside, they may find themselves employing unreliable or unsavory companies."

Contractors Seek Protection From Liability. Some contractors working on the Katrina relief effort want Congress to limit their liability from lawsuits. The Washington Post (9/20, A7, Merle) reports that the contractors are "drafting legislation to seek such protection, industry officials said yesterday." The companies "have become concerned about the liability issue because of lawsuits filed against construction firms that helped clean up the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks."

Hill GOP Drops Plans For Joint Katrina Probe. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Curtius) reports, "Congressional Republicans signaled today that they have abandoned their plan to conduct a joint House-Senate probe of the government's response to Hurricane Katrina. In announcing a joint probe this month, the Republican leadership had said it would be the most efficient way to investigate the administration's much-criticized initial response to the hurricane. But today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) conceded that he could not overcome Democratic opposition to a joint investigation." The Democratic leadership "has refused to appoint members to a joint committee, citing the lack of equal representation of Democrats on the panel, and the lack of power to issue subpoenas that the majority opposed. Democrats also have insisted on an independent inquiry."

DOJ_NMG_0006424

Partisanship, Bureaucracy Blamed For Poor Congressional Response. In a USA Today (9/20) op-ed, Rutgers University political scientist Ross K. Baker writes, "In a well-ordered world, a calamity of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina ought to be the subject of a congressional investigation. From the earliest days of the republic, the House of Representatives and Senate had unquestioned responsibility for probing and, yes, finger-pointing in calamities' aftermath. That, sadly, is no longer true. Congress has fallen victim to a number of problems that have caused Americans to look elsewhere for answers. The first of these problems is the fractious spirit of partisanship that has so infected Capitol Hill that no conclusion Congress might reach about who was responsible for the botched response to Katrina would have much legitimacy in the eyes of Americans. … But it is more than partisanship that has impeded Congress' ability to avert or probe causes of disasters. The perverse arrangement of committees supervising agencies responsible for disaster relief also impairs the lawmakers."

With Rita Looming, New Orleans Mayor Backs Off Repopulation Effort. With Tropical Storm Rita headed into the Gulf Coast, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin relented in his efforts to repopulate the city amid fears that the city's weakened levee system would fail if hit by even a much weaker storm. Before Mayor Nagin changed course, President Bush weighed in on the issue, urging great caution in encouraging a return to the city. Virtually all of the media coverage notes that Mayor Nagin was under "growing political pressure from federal leaders" to halt the return, as the Washington Post (9/20, A1, Connolly) characterized the situation in a front page story.

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 2, 3:35, Gibson) reported, "This morning, President Bush stated what everyone is worried about, with another storm in the offing." President Bush: "There is deep concern about this storm causing more flooding in New Orleans. If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break. And so, therefore, we're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history." Gibson: "And so late today, the Mayor of New Orleans changed his mind, agreeing now with Federal authorities that it's too dangerous to let people back into the city." ABC (Woodruff) added, "With word that Rita could be approaching, the Mayor suddenly reversed course, suspending the return plan and ordering residents to leave."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 3, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "Federal officials had been telling the New Orleans Mayor he was moving too quickly to reopen the city, and today's news that a new storm is headed his way apparently convinced him they were right." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "Critics called" Nagin's "aggressive timetable a political pipe dream, and today it went up in smoke." With "mounting political pressure from the President, another storm headed to the Gulf, and reports that just six inches of rain could make the city levee break again, a once-confident Mayor did a complete 180."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 4, 2:25, Tibbles) reported, "The advance of another storm now has everyone, including the Mayor, in agreement that people should stay out of here for a while." Mayor Ray Nagin "says if Rita hits New Orleans, the pump stations won't be able to handle the rush of water." At the White House, "the President was even more blunt, laying out a worst-case scenario." President Bush: "If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break." Now, residents "are being told to get ready for another hurricane, and the governor insists evacuation orders will be followed." Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) Louisiana: "Well, there will be a mandatory evacuation, and I do believe that 100% of the people will listen this time."

USA Today (9/20, Parker, Levin) reports Mayor Nagin "reversed his call for people to return to the city and ordered most people out over worries that a new tropical storm could flood the city again." The announcement "came after President Bush and the federal government's Hurricane Katrina response team urged the mayor to reconsider his plans, saying the city was not safe." Earlier in the day, Nagin "had criticized Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen for publicly imploring him to stop people from returning. He called Allen a 'good man' but said, 'There's only one mayor of New Orleans, and I'm it.'"

DOJ_NMG_0006425

The New York Times (9/20, Yardley) reports Nagin "called for a 'mandatory' evacuation of many of the residents who have returned or never left." The mayor "reversed himself hours after Mr. Bush had questioned whether it was safe for residents to return. The president reiterated warnings by Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, leader of the federal recovery effort, that the levee system was weakened, that the 911 emergency telephone system was not working, that the hospitals remained closed and that pollutants were in the air and water."

The AP (9/20, Loven) reports President Bush, "criticized for weeks for failing to react aggressively enough to Hurricane Katrina," yesterday "put some muscle behind concerns that a new tropical storm could again deluge New Orleans and the people being allowed to return to the ruined city. It worked. Six hours after Bush questioned New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's plan to bring as many as a third of the city's population back over the next week, Nagin reversed course and said he was suspending it." Besides the President's "public words, White House chief of staff Andrew Card pressed the point on the phone with Nagin. And Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, head of the federal government's hurricane response, delivered federal officials' concerns to Nagin later Monday — after appearing on numerous TV shows to express dismay with the city plan."

The AP (9/20, Rubinkam) reports Mayor Nagin's announcement "came after repeated warnings from top federal officials — and the president himself — that New Orleans was not safe enough to reopen. Among other things, Federal officials warned that Tropical Storm Rita could breach the city's temporarily patched-up levees and swamp the city all over again." The Washington Times (9/20) also reported the AP story.

Knight Ridder (9/20, Estwick, Nesmith, Frazier) reports that within "about an hour of" Nagin's announcement, "security tightened in several parts of the city." Nagin said "the hurricane was not providing him an excuse to follow the advice of federal officials, and pledged to resume his plan as soon as Rita's danger has passed."

The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Gold, Rosenblatt, Vartabedian) reports, "According to government forecasts Monday night, the storm could land anywhere from northern Mexico to Mississippi. But Nagin said his advisers had determined Rita most likely would strike near the island community of Galveston, Texas -- where authorities were planning evacuations starting Tuesday afternoon -- or pass to the west of New Orleans."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Brooks, Dade) reports yesterday's "announcement by the mayor was a major setback in efforts to bring life back to New Orleans, about 15% of which still is underwater three weeks after Katrina barreled past the city." Mr. Nagin "denied that criticism from the White House had anything to do with his reversal."

The Washington Times (9/20, Sammon) reports the "latest in a long line of disputes among local, state and federal officials over Hurricane Katrina was defused yesterday when New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin called off reopening the city, although he cited another storm for his capitulation rather than federal officials' litany of concerns." The "various levels of government have disagreed over when to call in federal troops and whether the entire operation should be federalized. They also have clashed over when and how to evacuate New Orleans and when to let residents return."

USA Today (9/20, Kelley, Dorell) reports "hundreds of residents of the city's Algiers section who returned to their homes Monday only to be told by Mayor Ray Nagin to be prepared to evacuate again as early as Wednesday because of Tropical Storm Rita." The Algiers area, "across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter and downtown, never flooded during Katrina and now has electricity and water service to most homes. Nagin announced last week that Algiers residents could begin returning Monday. However, hundreds ignored pre-storm evacuation orders and never left or have already returned." For some, the mayor's "abrupt reversal was another disheartening example of what they said was a disorganized and inept local response to Katrina."

Rita is expected to strengthen to hurricane strength and move west into the Gulf, with a small potential to hit the battered Southern states. USA Today (9/20, Brook) reports "Tropical Storm Rita was expected to become a hurricane and slam the Florida Keys today, then gather strength and threaten the entire Gulf Coast." Yesterday, "Rita was still a tropical storm late Monday with winds of 70 mph, but the National Weather Service predicted it would be a Category 2 hurricane today with winds of 100 mph as it closed in on the Keys."

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, lead story, 3:05, Gibson) reported Tropical Storm Rita is "the latest in a long list of storms that have made this hurricane season unprecedented, cruel and relentless. In many parts of the Florida Keys, there is a mandatory evacuation order in effect tonight." ABC (Kerley) added, "Call it the Katrina effect, the hospital that serves Key West is shut down tonight. An Air Force C-130 airlifted patients to safety. As this latest storm approached, shelters were closed and those unable to flee were bussed to Miami." Ed Rappaport, National Hurricane Center Deputy Director: "We're looking at further strengthening and likely a major hurricane in the central to western Gulf of Mexico by later in the week." Kerley: "That means Louisiana, just battered by Hurricane Katrina could be hit again."

DOJ_NMG_0006426

The CBS Evening News (9/19, lead story, 2:45, Schieffer) reported, "If projections hold, it could slam into a wide area of the Gulf Coast, the area that includes New Orleans and some of the heaviest-hit areas of Mississippi." CBS (Strassmann) added, "With memories of all that misery so fresh, and Rita on the way, evacuation was an easy sell for many people in the Florida Keys." NBC Nightly News (9/19, lead story, 3:15, Karins) reported, "Right now Houston is in the center of Rita's crosshairs, but everyone along the Texas and Louisiana coast should watch this one closely. As for New Orleans, a sharper northerly turn would mean at a minimum extremely heavy rain and a possible storm surge that once again could overwhelm that broken city."

The Washington Post (9/20, A3, Branigin) reports, "Rita is 'not an exact reprise' of Katrina, 'but it's probably pretty close,' said Frank Lepore, a spokesman for the National Hurricane Center in Miami. 'It's got similar characteristics, except it's just a little lower in latitude. The issue is what happens when it gets out over the very warm waters of the central Gulf.'"

Allen Says Officials Are Planning For Possibility Of Rita Touching New Orleans. Vice Admiral Thad Allen was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (9/19) about the approach of Tropical Storm Rita. Allen said, "We already had a tenuous situation in New Orleans with the infrastructure in the city being so badly damaged, and we know we have weakened levees. This storm is nothing to mess with. I had a meeting this afternoon with the governor of Louisiana, Governor Blanco and Russ Honore, who is my counterpart in DOD. And we're all actively planning contingencies right now and preparing for if this storm even brushes close to New Orleans." Allen added that "we need to keep a close watch on this and be prepared to evacuate click quickly if we need to do that."

Coast Guard Response To Katrina Lauded.

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 11, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "The rest of the Federal government may have fumbled on Hurricane Katrina, but if there is one true thing to say, it is that the US Coast Guard came through with flying colors, among other things rescuing 33,000 people." CBS (Orr) added, "While FEMA and local officials exchanged blame for a sluggish response, there were heroes at work," like "Coast Guard pilot Dan Taylor. In four days, his chopper crew saved 50 people." Unlike "many other Federal agencies, the Coast Guard was able to cut through bureaucratic red tape with a simple philosophy: Act first and get permission later. Crews on the scene assessed the needs and the risks in an urban danger zone." Former Coast Guard commander Stephen Flynn "says FEMA and other agencies need to build on the Coast Guard's success."

Red Cross Criticized Over Katrina Response.

The New York Times (9/20, Strom, Robertson) reports that "in New Orleans and the coastal flood plains of Mississippi, many people are complaining that the American Red Cross was missing in their worst hours of need and are worried that its billowing relief fund may bypass them entirely. The organization did not open shelters in flood-prone areas and was therefore unable to provide food and other necessities to people closest to the coast" hit by Katrina. The Times adds that "even some volunteers are disgusted. 'I will never, ever wear the Red Cross vest again,' said Betty Brunner, who started volunteering in 1969 when Hurricane Camille destroyed her house. … Time and again in past disasters, the Red Cross has raised more money than it has needed for relief. It has also been less than clear in the past about where its money goes, and it has rarely shared its money with other organizations that tackle long-term needs of victims."

Red Cross Chief To Brief Lawmakers Today. The Hill (9/20) reports American Red Cross President/CEO Marty Evans "will brief lawmakers today on the organization's recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region."

Wal-Mart Response To Hurricane Katrina Praised.

In a New York Times column (9/20), John Tierney says, "If President Bush feels compelled to put someone in charge of rebuilding the Gulf Coast, let me suggest a name: Lee Scott." Scott is the "chief executive of Wal-Mart, one of the few institutions to improve its image here after Katrina sent a 15-foot wave across the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain." If you "visit the Wal-Mart and the Sam's Club stores here, you hear shoppers who have been without power for weeks marveling that there are still generators in stock (and priced at $304.04). You hear about the trucks that rolled in right after the hurricane and the stuff the stores gave away: chain saws and boots for rescue workers, sheets and clothes for shelters, water and ice for the public." That's the "same assessment you hear from public officials in Louisiana, and there's even been talk of letting Wal-Mart take over FEMA's job. The company already has its own emergency operations center, where dozens of people began preparing for the hurricane the week before it hit by moving supplies and trucks into position."

DOJ_NMG_0006427

Kerry, Edwards Criticize Administration Response To Katrina. In separate speeches yesterday, Sen. John Kerry and former Sen. John Edwards criticized the Bush Administration's response to Hurricane Katrina. Reuters (9/20, Whitesides) reports that Kerry and Edwards "said the administration's inadequate response to the hurricane revealed a failure of competence and values, while the public outpouring of support for storm victims showed Americans wanted more from their government." Kerry "said the storm created 'a rare accountability moment' when not just the administration but all Americans could take stock of the country's direction." Edwards "introduced a series of proposals to build opportunities for the poorest Americans, including 'work bonds' to expand the earned income tax credit for the poor, a savings plan to help families buy a home, an increase in the minimum wage and programs to make college more affordable."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Blitzer) reported that Kerry accused Republicans "of turning the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast into 'a vast laboratory for right wing ideological experiments.' And former Vice Presidential Nominee John Edwards arguing, 'the administration views every American as an island' and so he contends it left Katrina victims to fend for themselves."

The Washington Post (9/20, A4, Balz) says that while both of the former running mates offered "withering criticism" of the Administration's handling of the disaster, Kerry's speech "was harsher by far, and it drew a sharp rebuttal from the Republican National Committee's Tracey Schmitt. 'Armchair-quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry,' she said. 'Such tactics haven't served him well in the past, and today is no exception.'"

The Hill (9/20, Allen) calls Kerry's remarks "a furious attack on the Bush administration. … In a brief interview, Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, called Kerry's pitch for cash 'repulsive.'"

Ronald Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/20), "Monday's speeches offered a reminder that Kerry and Edwards, rivals during the 2004 Democratic primaries, could find themselves competing for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination."

MoveOn Ad Criticizes Federal Response To Katrina. CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Blitzer) reported, "A new ad accusing President Bush of failing to make America safer after 9/11, and it points to the federal response to Katrina as evidence. The spot by the liberal interest group MoveOn.org begins airing tomorrow on CNN and on cable stations here in Washington and in New York. The Republican National Committee dismissing the ad as 'MoveOn's latest shameless political attack.'"

Confirmed Louisiana Death Toll Reaches 736, Number Of Missing Children Increasing. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 2, 0:10, Schieffer) reported, "90 more victims were added to the hurricane death toll in Louisiana today, bringing it to 736."

Meanwhile, CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Todd) reported that at the hotline set up to help hurricane victims locate missing loved ones, "for the 15th straight day…the numbers of missing children has gone up. The latest numbers that we were just handed, 2,393 at this hour, are still listed as missing. But there are many success stories, as well. Eight hundred and 83 cases have been resolved by the volunteers," who "have been working 16 hours a day. Many more yet to resolve, however."

Six Arrested For Using Internet To Lure Displaced Kids. CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/19, Zahn) reported, "Louisiana attorney general today announced six people have been arrested for allegedly using the Internet to entice and sexually exploit Louisiana children when they were displaced by Hurricane Katrina."

Louisiana AG Begins Probe Of 14 Nursing Home Deaths. Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti has launched an investigation into 14 deaths at a New Orleans nursing home which occurred after the elderly residents had not evacuated before Hurricane Katrina. USA Today (9/20, Frank) reports that Foti's office "has been besieged with complaints about patients being left at medical facilities during the hurricane or receiving shoddy treatment, said Kris Wartelle, a spokeswoman for Foti. She said state investigators are checking additional reports of patients and residents who died at 20 to 30 other hospitals and nursing homes. The nursing home under investigation was identified as Lafon Nursing Facility of the Holy Family in New Orleans. … Wartelle said Foti's office is 'close' to beginning probes into two hospitals where numerous other patients died. She identified them as Memorial Medical Center and Lindy Boggs Medical Center, both in New Orleans."

DOJ_NMG_0006428

Hospital's Behavior In Wake Of Katrina Draws Fire. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Riccardi, Barry) reports on Charlene Gonzalez, a nurse in Chalmette, Louisiana. Gonzalez "wanted to get out of town before Hurricane Katrina hit, but because she was a nurse at the only hospital in this low-lying waterside town, she would lose her job if she did not stay at her post." The Times adds that "after Gonzalez, her husband and more than 100 other employees and their families spent days trapped by rising floodwaters, the Pennsylvania-based corporation that owns Chalmette Medical Center, Universal Health Services, told its employees that they could count on only two more weeks of pay." Officials at UHS "say the anger is understandable after such a catastrophe, but they contend they did everything they could for their patients and employees. They say they tried to evacuate their hospital -- albeit at least a day after emergency officials say they urged it -- but that it was too late to get all the patients out."

Illegal Immigrants Avoid Hurricane Aid From Federal Government. The Washington Post (9/20, A6, Fears) reports, "Much has been said about the suffering of the poor in New Orleans, but Latino civil rights advocates and relief workers say those troubled Americans are better off than immigrants who live in Gulf states illegally, working in restaurants, casinos, farms and construction. Some have managed to get into shelters run by the Red Cross and Catholic Charities, which provide food and medical care, no questions asked. But when U.S. citizens in those shelters flock to cardboard tables where FEMA, Social Security and Internal Revenue Service agents sit, Latinos stay behind, watching from their cots, relief workers said. The Department of Homeland Security recently announced that information provided by illegal immigrants seeking federal aid could be used against them later in deportation proceedings."

Katrina Aftermath Said To Highlight Need For Clean Water. In a Washington Post op-ed (9/20, A23), Jan Eliasson, former Swedish ambassador to the United States and president of the United Nations General Assembly, and retired Rear Admiral Susan Blumenthal, a physician, say, "In the United States and Europe, people take it for granted that when they turn on their taps, clean water will flow out. But for those living in U.S. cities devastated by Hurricane Katrina, as in large parts of the world, obtaining safe water requires a constant struggle." Ensuring "access to safe water worldwide is imperative." But "most of all, water is a fundamental global health issue. Unsafe water and sanitation is now the single largest cause of illness worldwide, just as it has been a major threat to the health of people affected by Hurricane Katrina." If "action is not taken now, 135 million people could die of water-related diseases by the year 2020. That is a larger number than those expected to fall victim to the HIV/AIDS pandemic, a catastrophe that has already killed 23 million people worldwide."

High Court Could Have Cameras Under Grassley Bill. Roll Call (9/20, Mcardle) reports, "For the past 20 years, every time a vacancy arises in the Supreme Court, C-SPAN General Counsel Bruce Collins is teased by the possibility that new blood on the bench might mean the highest court in the land would reconsider its stance on allowing cameras into its halls. … But while Collins waits, hoping the court's two new justices will allow proceedings to be televised, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee is ready to force the matter." Roll Call continues, "According to a GOP Congressional source close to the issue, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) — who has said that Congress legally has authority over court administration issues — intends to drop new legislation, possibly as early as this week, that will push for opening the Supreme Court to television cameras. … Specter had discussed the possibility of a bill at last week's hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice when the issue was brought up by Members on both sides of the aisle." Roll Call adds, "On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) pointedly asked Roberts if he was against cameras in the courtroom 'like Justice [William] Rehnquist was.' … 'Well, you know, my new best friend, [former] Sen. [Fred] Thompson [R-Tenn.], assures me that television cameras are nothing to be afraid of,' Roberts responded. 'But I don't have a set view on that. I do think it's something that I would want to listen to the views of — if I were confirmed — to my colleagues.'" Roll Call notes, "For the past four years, Grassley and several other Senate co-sponsors have been pushing the Sunshine in the Courtroom Act. The bill, which was reintroduced to the 109th Congress in April, would give full discretion to the presiding judge of a case as to whether cameras or recording devices would be allowed during proceedings in federal trial and appellate courts, including the Supreme Court. In appellate courts, the most senior active judge — the chief justice in the case of the Supreme Court — would have discretion on the issue."

DOJ_NMG_0006429

Senate Set To Vote On Drug Reimportation. The Senate is set to vote on language that would ease access to prescription drugs imported from abroad. The Hill (9/20, Young) reports that the vote, which could occur during consideration of the agriculture-appropriations bill currently on the Senate floor, would fulfill "a promise made by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in July." Sen. David Vitter "has proposed an amendment to the agriculture spending bill that would block the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) from preventing people from importing prescription medicines. The language was introduced Thursday but had not been placed in the queue for a vote by press time yesterday. Frist hopes to wrap up the agriculture bill by the middle or end of this week, according to a spokesperson. … As part of an agreement with Vitter, Frist vowed to permit the amendment as a test vote for Senate support of relaxing restrictions on consumers' obtaining drugs at lower prices from countries such as Canada that use price controls to hold down the cost of medicines."

Social Security Reform Appears To Be Dead In Senate. Roll Call (9/20, Pierce) says that "there appear to be plenty of Republicans on Capitol Hill these days who are willing to serve as pallbearers" for President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security. With "last week's revelation that National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) thinks that voting on a Social Security overhaul would be political suicide for House Republicans in 2006, Senate leaders are doing little to quell a notion, floated by Reynolds, that any measure offering personal investment accounts under the government's retirement security program would be dead on arrival in the Senate." Roll Call adds, "Though Reynolds and others fear the repercussions of voting on Social Security at the ballot box, the crisis management in Washington over the botched recovery from Katrina is providing Republican leaders with a handy excuse for sidelining Social Security for the rest of this Congress."

Voinovich Offers Social Security Lock Box Legislation. The Washington Times (9/20, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, said yesterday that Social Security personal-account proposals aren't going anywhere this year, but that Congress should pass legislation to lock away federal trust funds, including Social Security dollars, to ensure government can't spend them. Mr. Voinovich introduced a bill that would require all specially designated government revenue, including Social Security, be saved for those purposes and not spent on other programs." Voinovich "said overall Social Security reform will not happen this year with other issues, such as hurricane-relief efforts, dominating the agenda."

FDA Denies Naming Alderson Acting Director Of Women's Office. The Washington Post (9/20, A21, Kaufman) reports, "One week ago, the Office of Women's Health of the Food and Drug Administration sent an e-mail notice to women's groups and others announcing the appointment of Norris Alderson as its new acting director. … Three days after the Alderson announcement, the FDA main press office sent out a very different announcement. It said that 20-year FDA veteran Theresa A. Toigo would be the new acting director of the women's health office, and that she would be a champion for women's health inside and outside the agency. Alderson -- and the statement announcing his appointment -- was never mentioned. Asked yesterday who exactly was running the office, FDA spokeswoman Suzanne Trevino said that Alderson had never been appointed acting director. She said that Toigo would take over from the departed Wood, and that her office knew nothing about the statement regarding Alderson, who is the agency's associate commissioner for science. … The seeming mystery thickened when several women's groups said that not only did they receive e-mails announcing Alderson's appointment, but also that he was also listed on a Health and Human Services directory last week as the acting director of the office. In addition, people who have spoken with women's health office staff said that Alderson was introduced to the staff last week as the new acting director, and that he even had some one-on-one discussions with staff members about future plans."

New FDA Chief Counsel Keeps Predecessor's Industry-Friendly Policies In Place. The Legal Times (9/20, Henning) reports, "Sheldon Bradshaw arrived at the Food and Drug Administration without the baggage lugged around by his predecessor. … The previous chief counsel at the FDA, Daniel Troy, was pilloried by critics who slammed his close ties to the drug industry. Troy made a name for himself suing the agency on behalf of drug and tobacco companies before moving to the government agency early in the Bush administration." The Times continues, "Bradshaw, who came to the FDA as chief counsel from the Justice Department in April, has escaped that kind of scrutiny, largely because he hasn't had those corporate relationships. But that doesn't necessarily mean a new day has dawned. … In fact, despite Troy's return to the private sector, his controversial legal policies remain in force at the agency. Like Troy, Bradshaw offers one-on-one meetings with the companies regulated by the agency, has kept low the number of warnings issued to companies violating regulations, and, perhaps most notably, has continued to intervene on behalf of drug companies in private civil lawsuits." The Times adds, "Last week, Bradshaw signed off on a brief agreeing with Pfizer Inc.'s claim that three years ago the FDA would not have allowed the drug company to warn consumers about a link between suicidal behavior and the use of its best-selling antidepressant, Zoloft, by adolescents, an argument Pfizer is using to ward off liability. … That approach and a lighter regulatory hand put the public at risk, consumer and public health advocates complain. And even some in the drug and medical-device industries find the regulatory regime under Troy, and now Bradshaw, discomforting, claiming that without strong FDA oversight, companies are being hauled into court more frequently by state attorneys general and private plaintiffs."

DOJ_NMG_0006430

NASA Unveils Plans For Return To Moon.

The New York Times (9/20, Leary) reports that Michael D. Griffin, NASA's "new administrator, detailed a $104 billion plan that he said would get astronauts to the Moon by 2018, serve as a steppingstone to Mars and beyond, and stay within NASA's existing budget." Coverage of Grifinn's press conference ran in print and electronic media outlets across the United States and abroad. The two most prevalent facts making headlines were the $104 billion expected cost of the effort and Griffin's language as he referred to the story as "Apollo on steroids."

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 10, 2:10, Gibson) said the plans "almost seem like back to the future. The goal would be to go back to the moon and then on to Mars. The vehicles to get there look a bit like the old Apollo program, abandoned decades ago for the shuttle. Indeed, NASA's chief called it Apollo on steroids." Meantime, the CBS Evening News (9/19, story 12, 2:10, Schieffer) reported, "The pressure may be on to cut Federal programs, but NASA today announced a huge new program, a $104 billion plan to go back to the moon. The question is, will it ever fly now that the Gulf Coast must be rebuilt?" CBS (Andrews) added, "It will take Americans to the moon and beyond, but it will look like it came from the '60s. … Just like in heyday of the 'Apollo' moon missions 36 years ago, astronauts will land on and take off from the moon using a separate lunar lander. But this time there will be four astronauts, not two, staying at least a week, not just two or three days. The CEV, upon return, will be able to land on the ground, and be reused up to ten times." Bill Harwood, CBS News space analyst: "It's easy to build and easy to operate. It's not a complex winged vehicle that has to fly on a runway. It's a big step forward for NASA."

The Houston Chronicle (9/20, Carreau) adds Griffin "defended the plan's $104 billion price tag, which will cover expenses through the first mission, in the face of new budget pressures to pay the soaring costs of the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort and the escalating expense of the Iraq war. 'The space program is a long-term investment in our future,' Griffin said. 'We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in the future. When we have a hurricane, we don't cancel the Air Force, we don't cancel the Navy. We're not going to cancel NASA.'"

The Washington Times (9/20, Chien) reports that the plan calls for the retirement of the space shuttle in 2010 and a new 14-person Crew Exploration Vehicle, which could fly as early as 2012 if additional funding becomes available or 2014 within NASA's current budget. 'This is the best mission statement NASA's had in 40 years,' NASA administrator Michael Griffin said."

The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Pae) reports that the "blueprint unveiled Monday is part of a broader initiative launched by President Bush 18 months ago, in which he called for returning humans to the moon as a steppingstone to a manned mission to Mars, perhaps as early as 2020."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Spotts) reports that the "new craft would be the cosmic equivalent of the suburban minivan -- a 'crew-exploration vehicle' capable of carrying six people to the International Space Station, or four people to the moon, or roughly 3-1/2 tons of cargo."

In an analysis of the new NASA plan, the New York Times (9/20, Broad) reports that while the original Apollo

DOJ_NMG_0006431

effort "to put men on the Moon" received widespread public support, "President Bush's plan to return humans there and then voyage onward to Mars is dividing space experts and generating skepticism about its feasibility."

Griffin Says The Effort Will Not Rely On New Money. USA Today (9/20, Watson) reports that the $104 billion if adjusted for inflation, amounts to "roughly 55% of the cost of the first moon landing in 1969." Griffin "said NASA's budget would not need to grow to pay for the new effort and vowed not to raid other programs for funds. Savings would come from retiring the space shuttle in 2010. 'This is not about new money,' Griffin said. 'This is about a budget which keeps NASA … approximately where it is today.'"

Shuttle-Derived Hardware A Major Selling Point Of Plan. The Washington Post (9/20, A3, Gugliotta) notes that while "the rocket technology is 'shuttle-derived,' the new plan abandons the concept of a winged, reusable spacecraft that can fly back to Earth and land at an airport. Griffin said the new 'crew exploration vehicle' can be reused perhaps 10 times, but most of the new program's apparatus, like Apollo's before it, will be jettisoned in space or burned up in Earth's atmosphere. Griffin also acknowledged that there will be a two-year period between the last space shuttle flight in 2010 and the first flight of the exploration vehicle, anticipated in 2012, during which the United States will have no ability to put humans in space."

NYTimes Says Plan Lacking Enough "Pizzazz To Inspire Public Support." The New York Times (9/20) editorializes "The proposed new space vehicles look like a sensible way to put astronauts and cargo into space after the shuttle fleet is retired and will be built to facilitate landings on both the Moon and Mars." The Times adds that Michael Griffin, "deserves credit for putting real flesh on what had been little more than an aspiration. Unfortunately, the new plan lacks the pizzazz to inspire public support and will be operating under budget constraints that make delays or overruns likely. The new crew exploration vehicle will be built around well-known space technologies, with booster rockets and engines derived from the shuttle program and a crew capsule like the one used in the lunar program, only bigger."

Author Decries Administration "War On Science." Author Chris Mooney writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/20), "The lamentation in the forthcoming New England Journal of Medicine is typical of a growing genre: complaints about the misuse of science by the Bush administration. It is merely the latest jeremiad, from a group of distinguished experts, about the loss of reason by our leaders. This particular editorial, titled "A Sad Day for Science at the FDA," concerned so-called Plan B emergency contraception (the "morning after" pill), but it just as well could have been about the science of global warming or mercury pollution." Mooney says that the Administration's "current war on science" is "undermining our government's most central mission: to serve and protect us. This mandate cannot be fulfilled without an abiding respect for professionalism, expertise and the integrity of scientific analysis."

OTHER NEWS:

Katrina Expected To Spark Lawsuits Against Insurers. The question of whether insurers, the federal government or individuals should bear the brunt of billions of dollars in damage to homes and businesses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama is likely to make Hurricane Katrina the US' most contentious disaster recovery ever. USA Today (9/20, Chu) reports, "What makes the aftermath of Katrina so ripe for dispute is a polarizing, hard-to-determine issue: Is the damage caused by wind-driven rain or flooding? And what if the hurricane causes a storm surge or flood? … The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) estimates 34% of households and 23% of businesses in the affected areas have federal flood insurance." USA adds, "Disputes over wind vs. flood damage occur after every hurricane. But 'if it's any indication by the calls we've gotten so far, then we think there are going to be many more lawsuits' this time, says [Joanne] Doroshow of the Center for Justice & Democracy."

Barbour Calls Legislature Back Into Session. Mississippi Governor Haley Barbour said yesterday the he is calling the state legislature back into session September 27 to begin addressing Mississippi's recovery from hurricane Katrina. USA Today (9/20) reports, "One item on Barbour's agenda is a proposed change in gambling laws to allow casinos to build on land rather than only over water. Another session item, Barbour said, will be a proposal to allow small businesses hurt by Katrina to apply for $25 million in local loans. Barbour said he is waiting on a recommendation from the Mississippi Gaming Commission before offering a proposal on changing gambling laws."

DOJ_NMG_0006432

Doctor Testifies To Vioxx, Heart Attack Link. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Groeller) reports on Dr. Benedict Lucchesi's second day of testimony, where he said "several researchers had warned Merck about Vioxx's potential to cause cardiac problems…before the painkiller went on sale in 1999. 'According to the slogan, "Merck puts people first," I think they should have known,' he said."

The Bloomberg (9/19) adds Lucchesi testified that Vioxx "may cause heart attacks with just one dose."

Crude Oil Prices Spike On Fears Rita Will Disrupt Supply. Crude oil prices surged yesterday on fears that Tropical Storm Rita would disrupt supply in the Gulf of Mexico. ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 7, :15, Gibson) reported, "The price shot up $4.39 to more than $67 a barrel, and that's the largest one-day spike in history." The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 9, 0:30, Schieffer) said it was "the biggest one-day jump ever." NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 3, 0:20, Williams) also said it was "the biggest one-day price jump ever."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Bahreee, Gold) adds "the storm's approach is slowing efforts to fix infrastructure damaged by Katrina." The US Mineral Management Service "reported yesterday that 44% of the daily output of oil and natural gas was still off-line, three weeks after Katrina came ashore near the Louisiana-Mississippi border. So far, the damage has prevented the output of the oil and natural-gas equivalent of about 56 million barrels, just shy of 5% of the region's annual total."

The Financial Times (9/20, Hoyos, Morrison, McNulty) says "the Port of Houston Authority, the 6th largest in the world, began gathering information with its partners about the pending storm, reviewing all plans and procedures for the hurricane." Felicia Griffin, spokeswoman, "said the port, which is ranked 1st in the US in foreign tonnage and second overall, after the port of southern Louisiana, was checking inventory to ensure it had basic equipment on hand, including flashlights and batteries."

The Washington Post (9/20, D1, Blum) reports, "The new storm 'could be coming in right exactly where Katrina didn't go,' said Michael Guido, director of commodity strategy in New York for French bank Societe Generale. 'It could be a bad situation for all the platforms that didn't get hit before.'" D. Mark Routt, an analyst with Energy Security Analysis Inc. of Wakefield, Mass., "said Houston is an 'extremely important hub' for pipelines and other oil industry operations, adding to concern about storm damage."

USA Today (9/20, Smith) reports on how Rita is affecting cleanup efforts for "15 oil spills unleashed by Hurricane Katrina." It is "the largest oil cleanup effort in state history, more than 10 times greater than the remediation of 550,000 gallons of oil spilled by the ship Westchester in the Mississippi River in November 2000. The biggest spill in U.S. history was 11 million gallons by the ship Exxon Valdez off Alaska in 1989."

Meanwhile, gasoline prices fell to $2.81 average per gallon. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 10, 0:10, Schieffer) reported "gasoline has now given up more than half its post-Katrina gain." USA Today (9/20, Healey) says "those numbers could turn fast. … Wholesale gasoline for delivery next month zoomed nearly 25 cents to about $2.03 a gallon."

OPEC Plans To Increase Production. The New York Times (9/20, Mouawad) reports, "OPEC delegates said Monday that the group planned to allow its members to provide up to two million barrels a day of additional crude oil if the market needs it." But "oil traders brushed aside the move and instead sent oil prices higher on worries of another possible hurricane."

Katrina Badly Damaged Gulf Oil Platforms. ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 8, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "It has been three weeks since Hurricane Katrina roared through the Gulf and today, we've obtained the first look at some of the massive damage it inflicted on the oil rigs. It is clear evidence of how defenseless the oil facilities are against the fury of a major hurricane." ABC (Kofman) added, "No one knows yet how badly Katrina damaged the underwater pipeline system, but a preliminary count has found that of 140 damaged platforms in the Gulf, many are beyond repair. 2% were destroyed by Katrina but production is off more than 50% because the damage to the oil industry goes far deeper than what you find out here at sea. All along the Mississippi, below New Orleans, you can see how Katrina has hobbled the oil industry. Oil refineries sit idle. At least four will be down for months. Storage tanks knocked off their foundations. Crews scrambling to clean up six different oil spills. The only road to the region is still underwater in parts, and blocked by those massive fishing boats in other parts."

Dow Falls 84 Points On Oil Price Spike. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 9, 0:30, Schieffer) reported the run in oil prices yesterday "rattled Wall Street. The Dow fell 84 points [to close at 10,557.63], the NASDAQ lost 15 [to close at 2145.26]." USA Today (9/20, Krantz) adds "the broad Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 6.89 points to 1231.02. The educational services, computer electronic retail and auto parts industries were the S&P's worst performers on Monday." Still, "the S&P 500 is alone among the three major stock market indexes in being up for the year at 1.6%." The New York Times/AP (9/20) and Wall Street Journal (9/20, Patterson) also report the stock numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0006433

Meanwhile, USA Today (9/20, Shell) says "tracking violent storms is quickly emerging as a new job requirement on Wall Street. After the massive financial fallout caused by Hurricane Katrina, a growing number of traders, analysts and portfolio managers now view the weather as a major risk factor. … With Tropical Storm Rita barreling down on the Florida Keys and likely to gain strength and become a hurricane, it's no surprise that investors are just as interested in where the next hurricane will hit as they are the direction of interest rates."

Fed Expected To Raise Rates By Quarter Point. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Whitehouse) reports, "The bond market has a message for Federal Reserve officials trying to gauge Hurricane Katrina's economic impact: Inflation probably will accelerate no matter what you do." Today, "the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee decides whether to keep raising short-term interest rates to fight inflation or pause for more data on how the economy has fared since Katrina. Most economists expect the Fed to raise its interest-rate target for the 11th time in 15 months -- by a quarter percentage point to 3.75% -- but will read the accompanying statement closely for signs of future moves."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20) editorializes that "easing up now would be exactly the wrong policy. T hose urging such an action include carry-traders who fear getting caught playing the yield curve, investors long on housing, and all kinds of well-intentioned folks who simply don't want to see the expansion end. We know how they feel. This market psychology always takes hold amid a Fed-tightening cycle -- and this time it is being exaggerated by the fallout from Katrina." The Journal also says "a rate hike now could actually have the beneficial effect of calming inflation fears and keeping long-term interest rates lower. If the Fed keeps prices stable, the animal spirits of the private sector will do the rest."

Agreement Calls For North Korea To Give Up Nuclear Weapons Program. Negotiators announced yesterday that North Korea has agreed to end its nuclear weapons program. The concession comes in exchange for American economic assistance and a US pledge not to launch a military attack against the communist regime. Most of the coverage of the deal is markedly skeptical about the North Koreans' intentions and the durability of the agreement. Comments by President Bush suggested the US government was also trying to lower expectations about it, describing it as merely as first step. As part of the reporting, some media outlets see a contradiction between the terms of the deal and previous White House positions.

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 3, 2:30, Karl), for example, said that for the "past four years, the White House insisted North Korea would get no rewards for stopping a nuclear weapons program the US said they shouldn't have in the first place. That, officials said, would be blackmail." The New York Times (9/20, Sanger), meanwhile, reports the accord "provided the bare minimum," but "even to get that, Mr. Bush had to blink slightly, acknowledging that at some point in the future, the United States would discuss with the North building new nuclear facilities -- something Washington has said it could never trust the North with."

USA Today (9/20, Slavin) adds "a year ago, US negotiators said energy assistance from North Korea's neighbors would come if it accounted for nuclear programs within three months and began to dismantle them. Such language is missing from the new deal, which says the United States will join other nations to provide energy." Monday's agreement "could lead to something like the 1994 deal, said Scott Snyder, a Korea expert at the Washington office of the Asia Foundation, a research group. The Bush administration had long criticized that deal."

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 3, 2:30, Gibson) also reported it was "perhaps, very possibly, a breakthrough," but "will the North Koreans follow through?" ABC (Karl) added, "The agreement, announced with fanfare, marks a major turnaround for both the United States and North Korea. The talks had been deadlocked, and there were fears North Korea would soon test one of its nuclear weapons. Now Kim Jong-Il's government promises to dismantle its entire nuclear weapons program and to let UN inspectors, whom he had thrown out of his country two years ago, back in." The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 5, 0:40, Schieffer) added, "Some doubt the North will live up to its end of the bargain, which calls for it to dismantling weapons and the programs to build them."

DOJ_NMG_0006434

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 8, 1:40, Williams) said that "at the White House today, President Bush cautioned it's not yet a done deal." Administration officials "say any new agreement will demand rigorous inspections and verification." Fox News' Special Report (9/19, Rosen) also said "Bush welcomed today's positive step, but expressed concern about the North's honoring its word."

The Financial Times (9/20, Fifield, Yeh) reports "Bush said the Korean deal was 'a step forward in making this world a more secure place' but insisted 'we've got to verify whether or not that happens.'" The "wide-ranging, though vague," agreement is "the first breakthrough in more than two years of tortuous six-party negotiations and came just as the differences between Pyongyang and Washington seemed intractable." It also "served to prove that Washington and Beijing, which hosted the talks, can co-operate on issues of mutual security interest." Bush "said he wanted to the thank the other partners in the six-party dialogue for working together. But he added: 'The question is, over time, will all parties adhere to the agreement?'" Scott McClellan, "the White House spokesman, made clear that the first step under the agreement was for North Korea to end its nuclear programmes."

The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Kessler, Cody) also says Bush "cautiously welcomed the agreement," and reports "the unexpected" deal "followed decisions by both the Pyongyang government and the Bush administration to compromise on positions they had clung to during nearly three years of crisis over North Korea's nuclear ambitions." The breakthrough accord "followed a compromise proposed by China aimed at persuading both countries to sign a document of principles." The New York Times (9/20, Kahn, Sanger) also describes Bush's reaction as "cautious."

North Korea's announcement that it will abandon its nuclear weapons programs received widespread coverage on local television yesterday. Most reports mentioned that the Bush Administration is pleased by the decision but remains "cautious." Some examples: KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (9/19, 4:43 p.m.) reported, "The White House says it is pleased with North Korea's agreement to end its nuclear weapons program. Still, at the same time there's caution about whether or not the nation will make good on its promise." The North "drove a hard bargain. In return for terminating its weapons programs, it will receive energy and oil aid and a guarantee Washington won't attack."

KARE-TV Minneapolis (9/19, 5:13 p.m.) reported, "North Korea is pledging to abandon all of its nuclear programs. … In return, North Korea will get electric power from South Korea, oil and aid from other countries and a pledge from the US to respect each other's sovereignty and right to a peaceful co-existence."

KSAZ-TV Phoenix (9/19, 5:17 p.m.) reported that "the agreement ends a 3 year standoff. In exchange for giving up its nuclear program, North Korea will receive energy assistance from other nations."

Knight Ridder (9/20, Johnson) says it was a "turnabout that came suddenly after years of failed talks." US "intelligence officials say North Korea harbors between six and nine nuclear weapons."

Accord Seen As Victory For Rice. The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Kirk, LaFranchi) adds the deal "is seen by some analysts as a clear victory for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's diplomatic approach over administration forces favoring a more confrontational approach."

The New York Times (9/20) editorializes, "Diplomacy, it seems, does work after all." The deal "became possible when Washington abandoned the confrontational tactics and name-calling associated with its former top antiproliferation official, John Bolton, and gave serious negotiation a chance." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "deserves most of the credit for that switch, which was made with exceptional skill by America's top negotiator at the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill." The Times adds, "The biggest winner of all from yesterday's agreement may well be the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty itself."

This Morning, North Korea Demanding A Nuclear Reactor. Adding to the media skepticism is a renewed North Korean demand which reportedly was not part of the original deal. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Fairclough, Robbins) says "a final deal ending Pyongyang's atomic ambitions is a long way off. Progress will require sweeping concessions from Pyongyang, including intrusive inspections to ensure the dismantling of its facilities." It will also "require important concessions from the Bush administration." This morning, "North Korea's foreign ministry issued a statement casting doubt on the country's willingness to act soon. A ministry spokesman said the US 'should not even dream' Pyongyang will give up its nuclear deterrent before America provides a reactor."

DOJ_NMG_0006435

The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Demick, Magnier, Efron) adds a North Korean demand "threw water on the deal" less than 24 hours "after diplomats announced a breakthrough." North Korea's demand "could be a deal breaker." Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "the chief US negotiator at the six-nation nuclear talks, made it clear at the opening of negotiations in Beijing last week that the idea of providing North Korea with a reactor before disarmament would be a 'nonstarter.'" A similar Washington Times/AP (9/20, Chang) article says the demand cast "doubt" on North Korea's commitment to the "breakthrough agreement." Both the United States and Japan "rejected the North's latest demand. 'This is not the agreement that they signed, and we'll give them some time to reflect,' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said." Japanese Foreign Minister Nobutaka Machimura "called the reactor demand 'unacceptable.'"

Hill "Had Misgivings" About Deal Because It "Hinted" At Discussions About Reactor. Under the headline "US-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open," the New York Times (9/20, Kahn, Sanger) reports the top US negotiator, Christopher Hill, "had misgivings" about the deal "because the vaguely worded agreement left unaddressed the date disarmament would happen, and hinted at a concession to North Korea that President Bush and his aides had long said they would never agree to: discussing at an appropriate time providing North Korea with a civilian nuclear power plant, senior administration officials said." The Times adds, "As described by senior Bush administration officials and Asian participants in the talks, Mr. Bush agreed to eventual discussions on providing a nuclear plant only after China turned over a draft of an agreement and told the Americans they had hours to decide whether to take it or leave it." The Times adds, "Several officials, who would not allow their names to be used because they did not want to publicly discuss Mr. Bush's political challenges, noted that Mr. Bush is tied down in Iraq, consumed by Hurricane Katrina, and headed into another standoff over Iran's nuclear program. The agreement, they said, provides him with a way to forestall, at least for now, a confrontation with another member of what he once famously termed 'the axis of evil."

More Commentary. Several editorials in major newspapers this morning praise the Administration's insistence on multi-party talks. In its editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/20) says that "though the Bush administration's handling of North Korea has hardly been a model of diplomacy, the president can claim some vindication for insisting on multilateral talks, instead of agreeing to one-on-one negotiations." In fact, "the Bush Administration wanted to involve other nations in the talks" precisely because they would "expose Pyongyang's paranoia to a wider audience" and "make it harder for North Korea to deny any agreement it did make." The Times argues that the latest developments in the negotiations "put more pressure on China to keep North Korea in line," and, in any case, the "the difficult work of applying" the original deal's principles will begin at scheduled talks in November. Those "talks just got harder. But the value of the agreement is that at least the principles are now clear."

USA Today (9/20) editorializes, "History isn't encouraging. … The trick is to avoid past pitfalls. The United States has partners because of its two-year insistence on including neighbors South Korea, China, Japan and Russia in the talks."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20) writes in an editorial that "this time there is one important reason to believe it could work, past deceptions notwithstanding: China's vital interest in a denuclearized Korean peninsula and continued good relations with the US and Japan."

The Washington Post (9/20) writes in an editorial the deal is a "surprising piece of good news." North Korea's agreement, adds the Post, "excuses it from the potential displeasure of China, which brokered the talks and supplies Pyongyang with food and energy. It allows for the continuation of rapidly improving relations with South Korea, including provision by the South of large new supplies of electricity."

North Korea Producing Counterfeit $100 Bills. The Washington Times (9/20, Gertz) reports, "North Korea's government is producing high-quality counterfeit $100 bills and is working with criminal groups in China to sell the fake US money internationally, US officials say. Some details of the production of what federal officials call 'supernotes' were disclosed after arrests last month in several US cities of people linked to a major Asian crime ring trafficking in fake money, arms, drugs and cigarettes." The Times adds, "A senior Bush administration official said one of the 10 indictments in the case contains the first disclosure of the North Korean government's role in the counterfeiting."

Russia, China Oppose US Effort To Refer Iran To Security Council. USA Today (9/20) reports, "U.S. and European diplomats resumed efforts to have Iran brought before the U.N. Security Council for sanctions, even as Russia called for a delay. … European Union diplomats and a U.S. official — who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitive nature of the negotiations — said China also remained opposed to referral. They said the West would probably force a vote. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she expects the Security Council to take up the matter 'at some point in time.'"

DOJ_NMG_0006436

El Baradei Criticizes Confrontational Approach To Iranian Nuclear Development. USA Today (9/20) reports, "The United Nations' chief nuclear inspector, Mohamed ElBaradei, said Monday that talks should replace international confrontation over Iran's nuclear activities. Negotiations proved their worth in getting North Korea to renounce its nuclear arms program, ElBaradei said. … Tehran says its nuclear program is for production of electricity, not nuclear weapons. ElBaradei criticized both Tehran's intransigence and U.S.-European calls for Security Council involvement as examples of 'confrontations and political brinkmanship.''

Pentagon Official Tells Taiwanese To Boost Defense Spending. The Washington Times (9/20, Gertz) reports Edward Ross, a senior Pentagon security cooperation official, "sharply criticized Taiwan's government for not moving ahead with an arms buildup to counter a mounting threat from China. Ross "also suggested in a speech that the United States might not defend Taiwan in a conflict with China unless Taipei does more to boost its defenses and national will. 'As the lone superpower, our interests are plentiful and our attention short,' Mr. Ross said. 'We cannot help defend you if you cannot defend yourself.' … The blunt speech, a copy of which was obtained by The Washington Times, was given at the annual U.S.-Taiwan Business Council-Defense Industry meeting in San Diego. Attendees included Huo Shou-yeh, Taiwan's vice defense minister, and other officials from the island."

Activist Fighting Forced Abortions Jailed In China. The Washington Post (9/20, A17, Pan) reports, "China said Monday that it has dismissed and detained officials in the eastern city of Linyi for abuses committed while enforcing the country's one-child policy. But the government provided no details and said nothing about the arrest this month of an activist who had campaigned against the use of forced abortion and sterilization there. … Jiang Tianyong, a lawyer involved in a class-action lawsuit against the Linyi officials, cast doubt on the government's statement and accused local authorities of continuing to hold Chen Guangcheng, the activist leading the lawsuit, under house arrest without due process."

US Wants To "Come Out Blazing" On UN Reforms. The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Regan) reports in its "Terrorism and Security" column, "After a week when most of the reforms it wanted to see initiated at the United Nations were stymied or watered down, The Sunday Times of London reports that the United States wants to 'come out blazing' on Monday and push for change. But it faces a new geopolitical world as it attempts to do this, according to a New York Times analysis; one where countries will ally with you on one issue, while at the same time strongly opposing you on other issues. What Bush faced from the well of the United Nations on Wednesday morning was a strange new geopolitical world, in which your allies on one issue are ganging up on you in the next room." The US "will get to see this week if it can still form the needed coalitions to push through its agenda, as the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) takes up the issue of Iran's nuclear program."

Coleman Calls For Annan To Be Replaced. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (9/20) titled, "The U.N. Must Look For a New Secretary-General, Sen. Norm Coleman writes, "Last week, world leaders met for what Kofi Annan described as a 'once-in-a-generation opportunity to take bold decisions in the areas of development, security, human rights and reform of the United Nations.' But a reading of the 'outcome document' world leaders are signing shows it to be yet another missed opportunity for UN reform. John Bolton pushed hard to improve the document and succeeded in modifying its most objectionable clauses. But what remains falls far short of 'bold.' … If the UN is to genuinely reform itself, it needs visionary and credible leadership. Mr. Annan, whose management failures are unambiguous, is simply too weak to muscle through an effective reform package. We should begin looking for new leadership now."

Schroeder, Merkel Try To Form Governing Coalitions. One day after elections, German politics remain deadlocked as both major parties continue to claim victory. USA Today (9/20, Knox) reports "competing claims" by Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his opponent, Angela Merkel "put Germany in a political deadlock and could stall efforts to revive the torpid economy." Merkel's party, the Christian Democratic Union, "won 35.2% of the vote in Sunday's elections, compared with 34.3% for Schroeder's Social Democratic Party." Merkel and Schroeder "scrambled to form alliances with other political parties that would put them in control. … Traditionally, Merkel's Christian Democrats have linked with the Free Democrats. Schroeder's Social Democrats have allied with the Greens. Merkel and Schroeder are trying to woo each other's ally." A majority coalition "must be in place by Oct. 18. The parliament has three chances to choose a chancellor. If it fails, President Horst Koehler can appoint a minority government or call new elections." The New York Times (9/20, Bernstein, Dempsey) adds "Christian Democratic officials said Monday that talks would be held with the Greens. … The chairman of the Greens, Reinhard Bütikofer, did not rule out an agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0006437

The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Tzortzis), Wall Street Journal (9/20, Walker, Crawford), Washington Post (9/20, A17, Whitlock), Knight Ridder (9/20, Schofield) and Washington Times (9/20, Kralev), run similar reports on the situation in Germany.

The Financial Times (9/20, Benoit) reports the euro "fell to a seven-week low against the dollar on Monday after Germany's election ended in a stalemate, casting doubt over the country's ability to enact the policy changes needed to bolster faltering economic growth." The New York Times (9/20, Smith) adds "Europe, weakened by the seeming collapse of its constitutional project in May, faces even more uncertainty after the election in Germany on Sunday, which left no party with a clear mandate."

In an analysis piece, the Wall Street Journal (9/20, Kempe) says "it will take some time and convoluted coalition negotiations before the world knows who won Sunday's German elections. But it's not too early to call the loser: Angela Merkel. … Political insiders say moving quickly to build a government is Angela Merkel's last chance of survival. Any delay will mean her political death, either by Chancellor Schroeder's hand or, just as likely, rivals within her own Christian Democratic party who have never been comfortable with the eastern German Protestant woman in a political leadership that is overwhelmingly male, western and Catholic."

FARC Reportedly Operating Along Venezuelan Border. The Washington Times (9/20, Behn) reports, "Colombian paramilitaries and Marxist guerrillas are running kidnapping, extortion and smuggling rackets as they infiltrate Urena and other communities near Venezuela's border, residents and officials say. 'There are more and more FARC in Apure and in Tachira [two western border states of Venezuela] present in the communities, and they are recruiting,' said Virginia Trimarco, regional representative of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). 'That makes people inside the country, and the Venezuelans, worried about security and selective killings,' she said. … Venezuelan cattle ranchers and a local state official -- who asked not to be named -- said the government of President Hugo Chavez turns a blind eye to FARC guerrillas operating in Venezuela, pushed to the border by the success of the U.S.-backed Plan Colombia, aimed at eradicating the cocaine trade in Colombia that funds the rebels."

Uzbek Government Accused Of Intimidating Human Rights Activists. The New York Times (9/20, Chivers) reports, "The government of Uzbekistan, stung by the outcry in the West over its bloody suppression of a prison break and anti-government demonstration in May, has engaged for months in a ferocious crackdown against those who have tried to expose the brutality, says a report released Monday by a prominent human rights organization. The report, by Human Rights Watch, the New York-based organization, says the crackdown included widespread arrests, threats and harassment and was directed at witnesses, survivors, human rights defenders, journalists and political workers."

The Washington Post (9/20, A18, Finn) reports, "The first 15 people charged with organizing an armed revolt in Andijan were to go on trial Tuesday in the Uzbek capital, Tashkent. Prosecutors allege that the 15 were part of a broad conspiracy, financed from abroad, that was designed to overthrow the government and replace it with an Islamic state. Prosecutors said another 106 people may face similar charges."

US Urged To Give Pakistan Trade Deal In Return For Women's Rights Assurances. The New York Times' Nicholas Kristoff (9/20) writes, "Our close ally President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan visited the U.S. last week and fretted aloud about a surprising problem: The 'easiest way' for Pakistani women to make money is to get raped, he said, so they're lining up to be raped and thus making him look bad. … That comment got Mr. Musharraf in hot water. So over the weekend, Mr. Musharraf denied that he had ever said any such thing." Kristoff continues, "The irony is that while he's a nitwit on social issues, General Musharraf has proved himself to be a good economic manager, and the 7 percent growth rates generated by his reforms will help undermine fundamentalism and sexual violence in the long run. During his visit, Mr. Musharraf pressed for a free-trade area between the U.S. and Pakistan, and that's a great idea to promote Pakistan's development. So let's give Mr. Musharraf a free-trade deal - but only on the condition that he clamp down not on Pakistani women fighting against rape, but on Osama bin Laden."

DOJ_NMG_0006438

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meeting with Local Officials and Business Leaders, Gulfport, Miss.; briefing on Tropical Storm Rita, New Orleans, La.; visit to Recovering Business, New Orleans, La.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Senate and House Full Committees. Joint hearings on legislative presentations by veterans affairs groups: American Legion. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full committee markup of pending legislation, including S 1582, a bill to reauthorize the U.S. Grain Standards Act. Location: Russell, room 328-A.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations, including Emil Henry Jr. to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for financial institutions; Scottie Theresa Neese to be director of the U.S. Mint; and Patrick O'Brien to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for terrorist financing. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing to receive testimony regarding the current state of climate change scientific research and the economics of strategies to manage climate change. Issues to be discussed include: the relationship between energy consumption and climate change, and the potential effects on the U.S. economy of climate change and strategies to control greenhouse gas emissions. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Supreme Court's Kelo ruling from New London, Conn. Witnesses include: Susette Kelo, of New London; Pastor Fred Jenkins of St. Luke's Pentecostal Church, North Hempstead, N.Y.; Eddie Perez, mayor of Hartford, Conn, representing National League of Cities; Hilary O. Shelton, director NAACP Washington bureau; and others. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Holds joint hearing on legislative presentations by veterans' affairs groups. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Disaster Prediction and Prevention Subcommittee. Hearing on ``The Lifesaving Role of Accurate Hurricane Prediction." Max Mayfield, director, National Hurricane Center; Windell Curole, general manager, South Lafourche Levee District; Mark Levitan, director, LSU Hurricane Center. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere, Peace Corps and Narcotics Affairs holds a hearing on ``China's Role in Latin America." Witnesses include: Charles Shapiro, principal deputy assistant secretary of State, Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs; Roger Pardo-Mauer, deputy assistant secretary of Defense for western hemisphere affairs; and others. Location: Dirksen, room 419.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. The House meets for morning hour and 2 p.m. for legislative business. Votes will be postponed until 6:30 p.m. Highlights: Suspensions (10 bills): 1) H.R. 3761 - Flexibility for Displaced Workers Act. 2) H.R. 2132 - To extend the waiver authority of the Secretary of Education with respect to student financial assistance during a war or other military operation or national emergency. 3) H.R. 3784 - To temporarily extend the programs under the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes. 4) H.R. 3765 - To extend through December 31, 2007, the authority of the Secretary of the Army to accept and expend funds contributed by non-Federal public entities to expedite the processing of permits. 5) H.R. 3649 - Sportfishing and Recreational Boating Safety Amendments Act of 2005. 6) H.R. 409 - Sierra National Forest Land Exchange Act of 2005 . 7) S. 1340 - A bill to amend the Pittman-Robertson Wildlife Restoration Act to extend the date after which surplus funds in the wildlife restoration fund become available for apportionment. 8) H.R. 394 - To direct the Secretary of the Interior to conduct a boundary study to evaluate the significance of the Colonel James Barrett Farm in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the suitability and feasibility of its inclusion in the National Park System as part of the Minute Man National Historical Park, and for other purposes. 9) H.Res. 441 - To congratulate the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Discovery crew. 10) H.Res. 450 - Recognizing Space Shuttle Commander Eileen Collins, Mission Specialist Wendy Lawrence, and the contributions of all other women who have worked with NASA following the successful mission of Space Shuttle Discovery on STS-114.

DOJ_NMG_0006439

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Senate and House Full Committees. Joint hearings on legislative presentations by veterans affairs groups: American Legion. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on implementation of the Microenterprise Results and Accountability Act. Jonathan Morduch, Associate Professor of Public Policy and Economics, Robert F. Wagner Graduate School of Public Service New York University; Susy Cheston, Senior Vice President, Opportunity International; Gary Plank, President-Elect, World Council of Credit Unions; Lawrence Yanovitch, Director of Policy and Technical Assistance, The Foundation for International Community Assistance. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

5 p.m. RULES _ Full committee markup to consider rules for floor debate for pending legislation, including HR 250, the Manufacturing Technology Competitiveness Act, and HR 2123, the School Readiness Act. Location: Capitol, H-313.

7 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

Other: BURUNDI PESIDENT PIERRE NKURUNZIZA _ Highlights: 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. Three weeks after his installation as President, the former rebel leader discusses the post-conflict reconstruction challenges confronting his country and outlines his government's prioriites and strategies. Woodrow Wilson Center, Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. Contact: 202-691-4000.

KING ABDULLA II OF JORDAN _ Highlights: Majority Leader Frist meets with King Abdulla II of Jordan. Room S-230.

CONTRACTORS CONFERENCE _ Associated General Contractors of America (AGC) holds its 2005 Legislative Midyear Meeting, featuring the latest information about the likely impact on the economy of Hurricane Katrina, a report from U.S. Army Corps officials on hurricane relief and reconstruction, and other matters. Highlights: 9 a.m. Charles Nottingham, Federal High Administration's associate administrator for policy discusses new highway bill, and Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., discusses transportation in the future. Location: Hyatt Regency, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

FEDERAL CREDIT UNIONS CAUCUS _ The National Association of Federal Credit Unions (NAFCU) holds the NAFCU 2005 Congressional Caucus. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. 9:15 a.m. Debbie Matz, board member, NCUA. 10 a.m. Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. 10:30 a.m. Treasury Secretary John Snow. 11 a.m. Rep. Mike Oxley, R-Ohio. 11:30 a.m. Sen. Tom Carper, D-Del. Location: Grand Hyatt Washington, 1000 H St. NW.

GENERIC PHARMACEUTICAL CONFERENCE _ The Generic Pharmaceutical Asosciation (GPhA) hosts its First Annual Policy Conference, focusing on Medicare, biodefense, generic biopharmaceuticals and other issues. Highlights: 8 a.m. Keynote, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. 12 p.m. Keynote, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. Location: Ritz-Carlton, 22nd and M Streets, NW.

AIR QUALITY CONFERENCE _ The Energy & Environmental Research Center holds the Air Quality V Conference, with keynote speakers Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., and Carl Bauer, acting director of the U.S. Department of Energy's National Energy Technology Laboratory. Others speakers include Jeffrey Holmstead, assistant administrator of air and radiation, EPA; Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D.; Rep. Earl Pomeroy, D-N.C.; and William Wehrum, EPA. Location: Marriott Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

TRADE TALKS _ Public events by U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Meets with Thailand's foreign minister, USTR Offices, 600 17th St. NW. 9:45 a.m. Meets with Ukrainian Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk., USTR Offices. 11:15 a.m. Meets with Korean trade minister. USTR Offices. 2:30 p.m. Meets with Uganda President Yoweri Museveni. USTR Offices. 7 p.m. Delivers Keynote speech to Coalition of Service Industries, St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K streets, NW.

SMALL BUSINESS-REGULATORY CONFERENCE _ 8 a.m. - 4 p.m. Over 25 national small business trade associations hold a conference on the Small Business and Regulatory Environment: 25 Years of the Regulatory Flexibility Act. Speakers and panelists include John Graham, OMB; Karen Kerrigan, Small Business and Entrepreneurship Council; Susan Dudley, Mercatus Center; others. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0006440

DRUG COUNTERFEITING _ 8:30 a.m. The Center for Medicines in the Public Interest and Pacific Research Institute hold the International Drug Counterfeiting Conference, releasing a new report saying counterfeit drug sales will reach $75 billion in 2010. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Breakfast keynote, Scott Gottlieb, deputy commissioner, FDA. 12:30 p.m. Lunch keynote, Arif Alikhar, director, DOJ IP Task Force. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Captiol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

AMERICAN DREAM FORUM _ Jobs for the Future forum on ``improving the path to better education and better jobs for all." Highlights: Keynote address by Patty Stonesifer, President and Chairman, Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. A ``Town Hall Discussion with David Gergen (Moderator), Professor of Public Service, John F. Kennedy School of Government, Harvard University and high-level public officials and corporate decision-makers.

THE RISE OF CHINA _ 9:30 a.m. - 6 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a conference on ``China's Emergence." Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

21ST CENTURY MEDICAID SYSTEM _ 10:30 a.m. - 5 p.m. The Center for Health Transformation holds a forum, ``Creating a 21st Century Medicaid System," with Newt Gingrich; Mark McClellan, Administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services; Gov. Mike Huckabee, R-Ark.; Gov. Mark Warner, D-Va.; Rep. Nathan Deal, R-Ga.; and Sen. Mel Martinez, F-Fla. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

HURRICANE KATRINA-ECONOMY _ 11 a.m. The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities (CBPP) holds conference call briefings at 11 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. to examine whether Congress, which is moving forward with immediate relief and reconstruction measures in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, should enact broad-based national legislation to stimulate the economy, with Robert Reischauer, president, Urban Institute; Peter Orszag, Brookings Institute; and Robert Greenstein, executive director, CBPP. Contacts: Michelle Bazie, 202-408-1080.

RURAL BROADBAND _ 8:30 a.m. The Rural Broadband Coalition and Hughes Networks Systems host a forum with representatives from the FCC and Department of Agriculture to discuss the availability of broadband Internet access to small businesses in rural America. Location: Rayburn, Room 2105.

US-MEXICO _ 8:30 a.m. CSIS hosts Luis Ernesto Derbez Bautista, Mexico's Secretary of Foreign Relations, discussing ``The State of US-Mexico Relations, the North American Agenda, and Mexico's Current Political Situation." Location: CSIS, B-1 Conference Center, 1800 K St. NW.

NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION _ 9 a.m. Georgetown University hosts a panel discussion on ``Nuclear Proliferation in the Age of Terror," with Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., and Christopher Shays, R-Conn.; Graham Allison, director of the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard University; Stephen Rademaker, assistant secretary of state for arms control; and moderator Robert Gallucci, dean, School of Foreign Service at Georgetown. Location: Georgetown University, Copley Formal Lounge.

ECONOMISTS-KATRINA _ 10 a.m. The ABA Economic Advisory Committee hosts economists from the nation's largest banks discussing post-Katrina economic conditions, including oil and home prices, via a telephone press conference, with Jim Chessen, ABA chief economist; Richard DeKaser, chief economist, National City Corporation; others. Contacts: Laura Fisher, 202-663-5466. Notes: Telephone press conference: 800-357-0498.

ISLAM AND TERROR _ 10 a.m. Homeland Security officer for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Daniel Sutherland delivers remarks at a forum on ``Islam and Terror: After London, Lessons for the United States." Location: Heritage Foundation, Lehrman Auditorium, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

MEDICARE _ 10 a.m. Kenneth Thorpe of Emory University discusses his new study, coauthored with Adam Atherly, titled ``Value of Medicare Advantage to Low-Income and Minority Medicare Beneficiaries." Location: Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, 12th Floor, 1310 G St. NW.

SPELLINGS-BROAD PRIZE _ 10:30 a.m. US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings will deliver remarks at the 2005 Broad Prize for Urban Education ceremony. Location: Library of Congress.

ARCTIC REFUGE COALITION _ 10:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. The coalition of groups working to save the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge holds a citizen action day, with thousands of Americans from across the country coming to the U.S. Capitol to urge lawmakers to protect America's Arctic Refuge from oil drilling. Participants include Robert Kennedy, Jr., Natural Resources Defense Council; Rt. Rev. Mark MacDonald, Episcopal Bishop for Alaska; Rabbi Richard Saperstein, Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life, Native American leaders and drummers, others. Location: West Front, US Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0006441

DEMOCRATS-KATRINA _ 10:50 a.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, along with Bishop Thomas Hoyt of the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church and President of the National Council of Churches, and Reverend Stephen John Thurston, President of the National Baptist Convention of America, Inc. will hold a brief media availability. Location: S-207, U.S. Capitol.

WINDFALL HEATING FUEL PRICES _ 11 a.m. Sens. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., and Chris Dodd, D-Conn., hold a press conference to discuss projected record winter heating fuel costs and legislation (The Windfall Profits Rebate Act of 2005 -- S. 1631) they are advancing to provide consumer relief in the form of consumer rebates. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

ENVIRONMENTAL ATTITUDES _ 12 p.m. Environmental leaders announce the formal launch of Duke University's Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy Solutions at a press conference, with William Reilly, former EPA administrator and chair of the Institute's Advisory Board; Sens. John McCain and Joe Lieberman; and pollsters Peter Hart and Bill McInturff. Location: Room 406, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

PROPERTY RIGHTS _ 12:30 p.m.Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, joins Suette Kelo, lead plaintiff in Kelo v. New London property rights case, others, for a media availability. Location: Room 226, Dirksen Building.

RELIGIOUS-ROBERTS _ 12:30 p.m. Faith and religious leaders from across the country will formally announce their opposition to the confirmation of Judge John Roberts as Chief Justice of the United States. Location: Room 512, Hart Senate Building.

DEMOCRATIC WHIP _ 1:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer holds his regular pen and pad briefing. Location: Capitol, H-306.

ENVIRONMENTAL POLICY _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. The Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute holds a panel discussion on ``The National Environmental Act Under Siege." Panelists include, Robert Dreher, deputy director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute; Johanna Polsenberg, senior legislative assistant to Rep. Tom Udall; Vince Sampson, deputy chief counsel for the House Resources Committee; and Gary Bass, director of OMB Watch. Location: Georgetown University Law Center, McDonough Hall, Room 201, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW.

KATRINA-LONG ISLAND _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Nassau County Executive Tom Suozzi and Suffolk County Executive Steve Levy will be meeting with the Long Island Congressional Delegation in Washington, D.C. to brief the delegation on their emergency-response plans for Long Island, and to outline the assistance they need from the Federal government. A press availability will follow at the conclusion of the meeting. Location: Room 2243, Rayburn House Office Building.

VOTING _ 2:15 p.m. Senators Dodd, Obama, and Rep. Lewis news conference on the Help AmericaVote Act. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery Studio.

DEMOCRATS-KATRINA-FRAUD _ 3 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Congressman Henry Waxman hold a news conference tomorrow to announce the introduction of legislation to create an anti-fraud commission to prevent fraud and abuse in the recovery and rebuilding effort in the Gulf Coast region. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

CHAMBLISS-ROBERTS _ 3:30 p.m. Senator Chambliss meets with Judge John Roberts. Photo-op at top of meeting. Media availability with Sen. Chambliss only following meeting. Location: Room SR-416, Russell.

IMMIGRATION REFORM _ 4:30 p.m. Leaders from the immigration communities, labor, business, and religious organizations kick off a series of rallies and town hall meetings in support of the Secure America and Orderly Immigration Act of 2005 (S. 1033/H.R. 4330) this fall. The first rally will be held today, with over 500 people expected to attend. Speakers include Reps. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz.; Luis Gutierrez, D-Ill.; Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz.; Janice Schakowsksy, D-Ill.; Karen Narasaki, executive director, NAPALC; Arturo Rodriguez, president, UFW; others. Location: Foundry United Methodist Church, 1500 16th St. NW.

PRO IMMIGRATION _ 4:30 p.m. Sen. John McCain joins Reps. Jeff Flake, Luis Gutierrez, other pro immigration rights figures, for rally calling for immigration reform. Location: Foundry United Methodist Church, 1500 16th St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0006442

PRESS ACCESS-PUBLIC EVENTS _ 4 p.m. A panel of lawyers and professors discuss press access and changing news coverage after New York Times reporter Judith Miller was jailed for refusing to reveal her source. Panelists include, Ronald Karp, who represented Montgomery Police Chief Charles Moose in his First Amendment fight to publish a book; David Bartlett, past president of the Radio and Television News Director's Association; Ford Rowan, former NBC News correspondent; and others. Location: Washington College of Law, Room 603, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

USTR PORTMAN-KEYNOTE _ 6 p.m. United States Trade Representative Robert Portman makes the keynote address at the Coalition of Service Industries annual Gala Dinner. In addition Rep. Gregory Meeks, D-N.Y., and Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Texas, are honored for their roles in promoting U.S. trade interests. Economists Barry Bosworth and Jack Triplett will also be recognized for their work in helping to better understand the role of services in the U.S. economy. Location: St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K Streets, NW.

JESSE HELMS TRIBUTE _ 6:30 p.m. National conservative leaders mark the publication of the newly released memoirs of former Sen. Jesse Helms at a dinner event hosted by Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., and Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C. Speakers include Bob Novak, Phyllis Schlafly, Beverly LaHaye, Paul Weyrich, David Keane, Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, Rev. Jerry Falwell, and Reed Larson. Location: Crystal Marriott Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

TIPPER GORE-AWARD _ 6:30 p.m. The Sewall-Belmont House and Museum honors Tipper Gore with the Alice Award at its gala awards dinner and reception in recognition of her commitment to mental health issues, education and the plight of the homeless. Joining the celebration are Karenna Gore Schiff, author and activist; Sen. Patty Murray; Sen. Debbie Stabenow; Rep. Lincoln Davis; musician Herbie Hancock; others. Location: Sewall-Belmont House & Museum, Capitol Hill.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"N. Korea Sets Condition On Nuclear Pact."
"Telling You What You Like."
"High-Tech Systems Feed Change In Parking Meters."
"New Orleans Mayor Tells Residents To Pack Up Again."
"Storm Strains Bush's Ties To Black Clergy."
"Back To Moon Via 'Apollo On Steroids.'"

USA Today:

"Guard Relief Hurt By Obsolete Equipment."
"Is Pakistan Doing Its Part In The War On Terrorism?"
"City Clears Out Again."
"President Sinking In Ratings."

New York Times:

"Mayor Suspends Flow Of People To New Orleans."
"U.S.-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open."
"Ex-Tyco Officers Get 8 To 25 Years."
"Ex-White House Aide Charged In Corruption Case."
"NASA Planning Return To Moon Within 13 Years."
"Many Women At Elite Colleges Set Career Path To Motherhood."

Washington Post:

"Storm Threat Halts Returns To New Orleans."
"British Smash Into Iraqi Jail To Free 2 Detained Soldiers."
"N. Korea, U.S. Gave Ground To Make Deal."
"Immigration Nominee's Credentials Questioned."
"New Antipsychotic Drugs Criticized."
"Bush Official Arrested In Corruption Probe."

Washington Times:

"North Korea Hedges On Nuclear Deal."
"New Storm Halts Reopening Of Big Easy."
"Local Heating Costs To Jump."
"Colombian Violence Spills Over."
"In Clarksburg, They Made The Lots Too Small."

Detroit Free Press:

"Newborn Donors Give Gift Of Life."
"My Identity Was Stolen; Yours Could Be Next."
"Family Ties Draw Evacuees North."
"Michigan's $500,000 Pioneers."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Guilty."
"Suit Slams Voter ID Law."
"It's The Neighborly Thing."
"Mogul Chips In $10 Million For Cobb Arts Center."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Tropical Storm Rita; New Orleans-Storm Dangers; North Korea-Nuclear Deal; Iraq-US Guards Killed; Afghan Election; Zawahiri Tape; Oil Prices; Tyco Execs Sentenced; NASA-New Moon Mission; Schools-Allergies.

DOJ_NMG_0006443

CBS: Tropical Storm Rita; Katrina-Death Toll; New Orleans-Storm Dangers; McCain-Katrina Costs; North Korea-Nuclear Deal; Iraq-British Commandos Jailed; Iraq-Tal Afar; Katrina-Missing Children; Oil Prices; Gas Prices; Katrina-Coast Guard; NASA-New Moon Mission; Tyco Exec Sentenced; Katrina-Students, Teachers.
NBC: Hurricane Rita; Rita-Florida Keys; Oil Prices; New Orleans-Storm Dangers; Bush-Katrina Cost; Americans-Katrina Cost; Katrina-Evacuee Family; North Korea-Nuclear Deal; Tyco Exec Sentenced; Katrina-Displaced Dolphins; Katrina Evacuees-Barber; NJ-New Orleans Saints.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Tropical Storm Rita; Oil Prices; CA-Beatty Gubernatorial Bid; North Korea Nukes.
CBS: Tropical Storm Rita; New Orleans-Repopulation Suspended; North Korea Nukes; NASA-Moon Mission.
NPR: Tropical Storm Rita; Hurricane Katrina Death Toll; Red Cross-Atlanta Hurricane Relief Center; CA-Wal Mart Lawsuit; Wall Street; North Korea Nukes; FEC-Club For Growth Suit.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Virginia Man Told Saudis He Planned Bush Assassination Plot ... 3
Maryland Man Charged With Aiding Terror Group ... 3
Al Arian Defense Attorneys Fighting US Plan To Introduce New Evidence ... 3
More Details Revealed In Possible Tennessee Terrorism Plot ... 3
Judge Orders Jordanian Terror Suspect Deported On Immigration Charge ... 3
In New Al Zawahiri Video, Al Qaeda Takes Credit For London Attack ... 4

Patriot Act:
DOJ Appealing Terror Probe Gag Order Ruling ... 4

War News:
Afghan Election Officials Estimate Turnout Was About 50% ... 4
Pakistani Crackdown On Islamists Seen As Mostly Ineffectual ... 4
British Troops Attack Basra Police In Bid To Free Inmates ... 5
NYTimes Employee Killed In Basra ... 5
Lynndie England To Fight Abu Ghraib Abuse Charges ... 5
Bush Urged To Take Responsibility For Iraq War Mistakes ... 5
National Guard Said To Lack Adequate Communications Systems ... 6
Army Halts Plan To Borrow Funds Dedicated For Improving Armor In Iraq ... 6

Corporate Scandals:
Former Top Tyco Executives Sentenced ... 6
AIG Shaped Corporate Haven In "Risk Capital" Bermuda ... 7

Criminal Law:
Former White House Official Arrested In Abramoff Probe ... 8
FBI Recruiting Agents For Porn Squad Detail ... 9
Gotti Jury Signals Possible Deadlock On Racketeering Charge ... 9
US Charges Three In Army Kickback Scheme ... 9
Three Sentenced To Prison For New Jersey Corruption Convictions ... 10
Former, Current New Mexico Treasurers Plead Not Guilty To Kickback Charges ... 10
New York Mayor Accused Of Internet Sex Charge Released On Bond ... 10
Philadelphia Imam Sentenced To Prison For Corruption Probe Conviction ... 10
More Than 100 Gang Suspects Arrested By Florida Task Force 11
Philadelphia FBI Agents Played Role In Art Theft Sting ... 11
Tennessee Couple Plead Guilty To Bilking Elderly In Ponzi Scheme ... 11
Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Attempted Extortion ... 11
Rapper Lil' Kim Reports To Philadelphia Detention Center To Begin Perjury Sentence ... 11
Psychologist Says Hinckley Should Be Allowed Overnight Visits 11
Jury Selection Begins In Trial Of Former Illinois Governor ... 12
FBI New Orleans SAC Laments High Rate Of New Orleans Political Corruption ... 12
Police Say DC Dog Walker Killed in 'Face-To-Face' Encounter . 12
FBI Searches Missing VCU Student's Car ... 12

Civil Law:
DOJ Settles False Claims Charges Against Office Depot ... 12
FEC Sues Club For Growth Over Campaign Finance Compliance ... 13
New Georgia Law May Jeopardize Asbestos Cases ... 13
Colorado AG Argues Against State Settlements With Tobacco Companies ... 13

Civil Rights:
Carter-Baker Panel Suggests 87 Election-Reform Changes ... 14
Suit Challenges Georgia's Voter ID Law ... 15
DOJ's Florida Voting Rights Suit Divides Hispanics ... 15
Disabled Groups Protest Congressional Spending Cuts ... 15
Senate Debate On Flag Burning Could Affect 2006 Races ... 16

Antitrust:
Ohio, Wisconsin Plan Minimum-Service Real State Laws ... 16
MasterCard To Issue No-Touch Cards ... 16
Verizon, Source Resources Settle Records Dispute ... 16
Regulators Near Approval Of Industry-Altering Phone Deals ... 16
File-Sharing Firms Seek Deal With Recording Industry ... 17
Financier Ross Eyes Auto Parts Manufacturers ... 17
StarPoint To Acquire Acclaim In Energy Deal ... 17
Norsk Hydro To Buy Spinnaker ... 17
Microsoft Buys Alacris ... 18

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Pombo Offers Amendments To Endangered Species Act ... 18
Losers In Eminent Domain Case Face $300,000 In Fees ... 18
Native American Nation Works To Stop Arctic Drilling ... 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Attorney: Internet Opens Doors For Drug Ring 18
Report: Congress To Investigate Orioles' Palmeiro..... 18
Report: Drugs In Iraq Called Threat To U.S.'s National Security 19
Former Haitian Anti-Narcotics Chief Faces Trial 19
Tucson Anti-Youth Violence Crackdown Yields Hundreds Of Arrests..... 19
Judge Rules US Marshals Service Must Release Defendants' Photos 19
Deadly Kansas Rig Blast Might Have Been Arson 19

Immigration:

Nominee To Head Immigration Bureau Criticized As Inexperienced 19
Conflict Looms Between White House, DeLay On Immigration Reform 20

Tax:

"Survivor" Winner Hatch Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Evasion 20

Congress-Administration:

Roberts Testimony Fuels Conservative Unease 20
White House Reportedly Changing Criteria For Second High Court Nominee..... 21
Debate Grows Over Paying For Katrina Reconstruction..... 22
Bush Proposes School Vouchers For All Displaced Students 23
Affirmative Action Requirement For Some Katrina Contractors Suspended..... 23
Black Ministers Say Bush's Outreach Since Katrina Undoing Political Damage 23
Government Forced To Look To Contractors With "Checkered Histories." 24
Hill GOP Drops Plans For Joint Katrina Probe 24
With Rita Looming, New Orleans Mayor Backs Off Repopulation Effort..... 25
Coast Guard Response To Katrina Lauded 27
Red Cross Criticized Over Katrina Response..... 27
Wal-Mart Response To Hurricane Katrina Praised 27
Kerry, Edwards Criticize Administration Response To Katrina.... 27
Confirmed Louisiana Death Toll Reaches 736, Number Of Missing Children Increasing..... 28
High Court Could Have Cameras Under Grassley Bill 29
Senate Set To Vote On Drug Reimportation 29
Social Security Reform Appears To Be Dead In Senate..... 29
FDA Denies Naming Alderson Acting Director Of Women's Office..... 29
NASA Unveils Plans For Return To Moon..... 30
Author Decries Administration "War On Science."..... 31

Other News:

Katrina Expected To Spark Lawsuits Against Insurers..... 31
Barbour Calls Legislature Back Into Session..... 31
Doctor Testifies To Vioxx, Heart Attack Link 31
Crude Oil Prices Spike On Fears Rita Will Disrupt Supply..... 32
Fed Expected To Raise Rates By Quarter Point..... 32
Agreement Calls For North Korea To Give Up Nuclear Weapons Program 33
Russia, China Oppose US Effort To Refer Iran To Security Council 35
Pentagon Official Tells Taiwanese To Boost Defense Spending 35
Activist Fighting Forced Abortions Jailed In China 35
US Wants To "Come Out Blazing" On UN Reforms..... 35
Schroeder, Merkel Try To Form Governing Coalitions..... 36
FARC Reportedly Operating Along Venezuelan Border..... 36
Uzbek Government Accused Of Intimidating Human Rights Activists..... 36
US Urged To Give Pakistan Trade Deal In Return For Women's Rights Assurances..... 37

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 37

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 41

DOJ_NMG_0006446

TERRORISM NEWS:

Virginia Man Told Saudis He Planned Bush Assassination Plot. The Washington Post (9/20, A14, Markon) reports, "A Falls Church man charged with conspiring with al Qaeda to kill President Bush told Saudi interrogators that he dreamed up the plot on his own but that it never got past the 'idea stage,' prosecutors say in court documents unsealed yesterday. 'I wanted to be the brain, the planner of the assassination, Ahmed Omar Abu Ali is quoted as saying. He likened himself to Mohamed Atta…according to the court papers, which quote from an FBI report detailing Abu Ali's interrogation by Saudi security officials while he was detained in the kingdom in June 2003." The Post notes, "The court filings were unsealed the same day as a federal judge in the District dismissed a civil lawsuit that Abu Ali's parents filed against the U.S. government last year" to press for his release from Saudi custody.

The New York Times (9/20, Lichtblau) reports DOJ said Abu Ali "represents one of the most dangerous terrorist threats that America faces in the perilous world after September 11, 2001: an Al Qaeda operative born and raised in the United States, trained and committed to carry out deadly attacks on American soil." The Times notes, "The case is a crucial test of the ability of American prosecutors to bring a case that relies heavily on intelligence gathered by foreign officials under disputed conditions."

Maryland Man Charged With Aiding Terror Group. The Washington Post (9/20, B4, Markon, Schulte) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Alexandria unveiled terrorism charges against a Maryland man yesterday, alleging that Ali Asad Chandia helped a foreign terrorist group acquire an electronic autopilot system and video equipment for use on model airplanes." Chandia "is also accused of shipping 50,000 paint balls to the group, Lashkar-i-Taiba." The Post notes, "The charges against Chandia…are an outgrowth of the 'Virginia jihad network' case, in which nine Muslim men have been convicted over the past two years of training overseas for holy war against the United States." The AP (9/20) adds, "Mohammed Ajmal Khan of Coventry, England, who prosecutors said is a senior official in Lashkar-e-Taiba, an Islamic rebel group fighting for independence in the India-controlled portion of Kashmir, is also charged. Mr. Khan is in custody in England."

The New York Times (9/20, Lichtblau) notes Chandia's lawyer, Marvin Miller, "declined to discuss the specific accusations…because he had not yet reviewed the indictment in detail, but he said the charges were groundless and amounted to 'a great case of guilt by association.' Mr. Miller said that Mr. Chandia was held as a material witness for several weeks in 2003 in connection with the Virginia jihad case but that talks to secure his cooperation lapsed when the government refused to offer him immunity."

Al Arian Defense Attorneys Fighting US Plan To Introduce New Evidence. The Tampa Tribune (9/20, Fechter) reports that at the terror-supporting trial of Sami al Arian "defense attorneys are fighting government plans to recall two computer experts to introduce evidence from an Islamic Jihad Web site called Qudsway .com. Assistant U.S. Attorney Terry Zitek said the FBI experts discovered new information after testifying in June. The evidence shows Salah Abu Hassanein, the recipient of many money transfers from" al Arian codefendant defendant Hatim Fariz, "used the Web page to communicate with Fariz and others. Agents also have determined that the Web site is based in Tehran, Iran, a country that provides the Islamic Jihad with the bulk of its funding." Fariz lawyer Allison Guagliardo "argued that the evidence is coming too late for the defense to prepare adequately. Their computer expert estimates needing four to six weeks to analyze the new material."

More Details Revealed In Possible Tennessee Terrorism Plot. WCPO-TV Cincinnati (9/19, Barry) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, "There is new information on an Egyptian college student being held under suspicions of terrorism in Tennessee. As 9News first reported on Sunday, it was a tip from a Batavia business that led the feds to" Mahmoud Maawad, "who is illegally in the country. … 9News uncovered items that seem to point to a far more extensive interest in aviation than first thought. … Besides a flight jacket and flight equipment that Maawad purchased, 9News found other items on the receipts, including aviation maps of his home airport in Memphis, Tennessee and cassettes on listening to control tower communications."

WLWT-TV Cincinnati (9/19, Hamrick) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, Hamilton County, Ohio, homeland security director Michael Snowden "said it's time to beef up safety measures at stores that sell pilot equipment." Snowden "said Maawad's case reveals carelessness in a system meant to protect American flyers after 9/11." Snowden noted, "Unfortunately, it's not that difficult to obtain identification, insignia badges -- those are all easily obtained."

Judge Orders Jordanian Terror Suspect Deported On Immigration Charge. WDTN-TV

DOJ_NMG_0006447

Dayton (9/19) reports on its Web site, an immigration judge in Monroe, Mich., on Monday ordered Jordanian Mohammed Obeid "to leave the country after being investigated for possible connections to terrorism." Obeid "was engaged to a Piqua (Ohio) woman when the FBI raided their home last summer, taking Obeid into custody. An immigration judge had ordered him jailed on accusations of marriage fraud. He'd been married to, then divorced from two different American women before meeting the Piqua woman. Authorities claimed he was marrying women just to stay in the country. The FBI claimed he was visiting terrorist related web sites at the couple's Piqua apartment."

In New Al Zawahiri Video, Al Qaeda Takes Credit For London Attack. CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Verjee) reported, "Osama bin Laden's top lieutenant, Ayman al Zawahiri, has appeared in a previously unseen videotape. It aired moments ago on the Arab news channel al-Jazeera. And al-Jazeera basically is reporting that al-Zawahiri plays down U.S. achievements in Afghanistan and he also claims responsibility for the London bombings." In the video, "al-Zawahiri appears to be being interviewed on this video and downplaying U.S. achievements in Afghanistan and claiming responsibility for the London bombing."

The AP (9/20, Michael) reports Al-Zawahri also "challenged the legitimacy of Afghanistan's parliamentary elections Sunday, saying they were held 'under the terror of the lords of war,' an apparent reference to the country's government. The election reference suggested the tape was made recently."

PATRIOT ACT:

DOJ Appealing Terror Probe Gag Order Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A13, Squeo) reports, "Even as Congress moves to renew much of the 2001 Patriot Act, a federal judge in Connecticut has set up a clash over one of the antiterror law's most contentious provisions. The Justice Department moved to block and is appealing a recent decision by U.S. District Judge Janet Hall that strikes down the gag orders imposed on recipients of so-called National Security Letters as part of a terrorism probe." The Journal notes, "In its appeals-court filing, the Justice Department cited the harm in 'alerting the target of the investigation that his activities are subject to scrutiny, and allowing the target to hide, move his activities to another provider, provide misinformation to the government or otherwise frustrate the FBI's investigation.'"

WAR NEWS:

Afghan Election Officials Estimate Turnout Was About 50%. USA Today (9/20, Wiseman) reports, "Turned off by the candidates, intimidated by the threat of violence and assuming a been-there, done-that attitude toward what had been the novelty of voting, hundreds of thousands of Afghans…sat out Sunday's elections. Vote counting begins today. Final results are expected in early October because some ballots are being delivered from remote regions. When the count is completed, the turnout is expected to come in well below that of last year's presidential election, in which 70% of eligible voters cast ballots. Chief electoral officer Peter Erben said Monday that early results suggest 6 million Afghans voted, about 50% of registered voters and well below expectations.

Provincial Afghans Frustrated By Lack Of International Aid. The New York Times (9/20, Gall, Sengupta) reports, "With widespread frustration over the pace by which the central government in Kabul is distributing reconstruction aid to the provinces, diplomats and election observers said, the test of credibility for the new Parliament will be its ability to deliver on the peace dividend, from roads and bridges to law and order. Speaking to reporters on Monday, the United States ambassador, Ronald E. Neumann, acknowledged that citizens' expectations for internationally financed reconstruction projects were running high, for everything from public works to a functional justice system. … The chief of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, Jean Arnault, said that to maintain their credibility, the executive and legislative branches would have to answer to a public increasingly frustrated about the lack of visible improvements."

The Washington Times (9/20, Gentile) reports, "Early returns show a lower-than-expected voter turnout for the embattled nation's widely anticipated parliamentary elections, electoral officials said yesterday. … Terrorist attacks early Sunday might have hurt turnout, even though the day passed relatively peacefully. Several polling stations visited by The Washington Times in Kabul late Sunday were devoid of the long lines seen earlier in the day. U.N. and Afghan electoral officials, working together in the elections, reported that polling stations in other provinces were packed all day and even stayed open past the 4 p.m. cutoff time to get those in line to vote."

Pakistani Crackdown On Islamists Seen As Mostly Ineffectual. USA Today (9/20, Wiseman) reports on a raid of an all-girls madrassa in Islamabad "meant to be a dramatic example of Pakistan's commitment to cracking down on Islamic extremism and religious schools that promote it.

DOJ_NMG_0006448

But the July 19 raid turned into a debacle. Caught without their veils, the teenage girls screamed — and then rallied. Grabbing mops, brooms, stones and knives, they drove the commandos out. … No one was arrested, and police even missed a chance to nab one of the mosque's top clerics." According to USA Today, "So goes Pakistan's campaign against homegrown religious extremism: considerable drama, few results. President Pervez Musharraf has taken huge risks…to hunt down al-Qaeda fugitives. … But his government has been reluctant to go after its former allies: the Taliban in Afghanistan and groups that have fought a proxy war against Indian troops in disputed Kashmir. It also has been slow to crack down on madrassas that teach intolerance and glorify jihad, or holy war. As a result, Pakistan is still turning out young militants burning to kill and die for their extreme interpretations of Islam."

British Troops Attack Basra Police In Bid To Free Inmates. The New York Times (9/20, Tavernise) reports, "Two British soldiers working under cover were arrested Monday in the southern city of Basra and then freed as a British armored vehicle blasted through the wall of their jail after an angry crowd began rioting outside, an Interior Ministry official said. The official said that the soldiers were undercover officers dressed as Iraqis and that Iraqi police officers had arrested them after the men fired at a traffic police officer." A British military spokesman "confirmed that 'two U.K. military personnel' had been detained early on Monday 'in a shooting incident' and that troops had used an armored fighting vehicle 'to gain entry' to the police station to release them." He "said…the police inside the station had refused to obey orders from the Interior Ministry to release the men. The incident came a day after British forces in Basra arrested three members of the Mahdi Army."

The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Knickmeyer, Finer) reports, "An Iraqi official said a half-dozen armored vehicles had smashed into the jail, the Reuters news agency reported. The provincial governor, Mohammed Walli, told news agencies that the British assault was 'barbaric, savage and irresponsible.' … In London, authorities said the two commandos were released after negotiations. But the BBC quoted British defense officials as saying a wall was demolished when British forces went to 'collect' the men." The Post adds, "Iraqi police cars circulated downtown, calling through loudspeakers for the public to help stop British forces from releasing the two. … Witnesses said they saw Basra police exchanging fire with British forces."

British Action Incites Rioters In Basra. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Daragahi) reports, "Violent street clashes erupted Monday between Shiite militia and British soldiers in the southern city of Basra, after British tanks stormed a local jail where two of their troops were being held. The daylong violence in Iraq's second-largest city raised troubling questions about the relationship between British forces in charge of security and their Iraqi counterparts, in what once was considered a relatively safe area of the country. … Two Iraqis were reportedly killed in the clashes, and several British soldiers were wounded. Television images of the street fighting showed Iraqis firebombing a tank, and a British soldier emerging with his uniform in flames."

NYTimes Employee Killed In Basra. The New York Times (9/20, Worth) reports Fakher Haider, "an Iraqi journalist and photographer working for The New York Times in Basra was found dead early Monday after being abducted from his home by a group of armed men wearing masks and claiming to be police officers, relatives and witnesses said." Haider "had worked for The Times since April 2003 and had recently reported on the growing friction and violence among Basra's rival Shiite militias, which are widely believed to have infiltrated the police. He did part-time for work for other news organizations, including Merbad TV, a local Basra station, and for publications including The Guardian of London and National Geographic. But his principal affiliation was with The Times." The Times notes, "Haider is the second journalist to be killed in Basra in the past two months. In August, Steven Vincent, an American freelance reporter who was writing a book about the city, was abducted along with his Iraqi interpreter, and he was later found dead."

Lynndie England To Fight Abu Ghraib Abuse Charges. The AP (9/20, Badger) reports, "Army Pfc. Lynndie England will abandon her earlier courtroom strategy and fight charges that she was a key participant in detainee abuse by guards at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, her lawyer said." England "was to go on trial Tuesday at Fort Hood, Texas, on seven counts of mistreating prisoners. She will be the last of a group of junior enlisted soldiers charged with Abu Ghraib abuses to have their cases resolved. Two have been convicted at trial, while six others made plea deals and received prison sentences of up to eight years."

Bush Urged To Take Responsibility For Iraq War Mistakes. In an op-ed for the New York Times (9/20) Nathaniel Fick, former Marine captain who led infantry platoons in Afghanistan and Iraq, writes, "President Bush's speech last week accepting responsibility for the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina was commendable, if overdue. … Consider the positive effects that would follow a similar presidential assumption of responsibility for American missteps in Iraq. By declaring that the buck stops at his desk, President Bush could begin a top-down rethinking of our military and political strategies since the 2003 invasion. He would also establish a standard of personal accountability for everyone in the chain of command, much as his statement last week prompted Gov. Kathleen Blanco of Louisiana to follow suit. And it just might galvanize enough bipartisan support to break the ideological gridlock that has limited changes in Iraq policy to marginal tweaks rather than a full reassessment."

DOJ_NMG_0006449

National Guard Said To Lack Adequate Communications Systems. USA Today (9/20, Moniz) reports, "Hurricane Katrina exposed serious weaknesses in the National Guard's communications systems, particularly a shortage of high-tech radios and satellite communications gear, the Guard's top general said Monday. If it's going to protect the USA while also fighting overseas, the Guard needs better equipment, Lt. Gen. Steven Blum, head of the National Guard Bureau, said in an interview with USA TODAY. … Much of the Guard's best communications equipment was being used by troops fighting in Iraq and wasn't available for units helping Gulf Coast states recover from the hurricane, Blum said."

Army Halts Plan To Borrow Funds Dedicated For Improving Armor In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A4, Rogers) reports, "The Pentagon reversed a plan to ease the Army's year-end cash crunch by borrowing from funds dedicated to buying better armored vehicles for troops in Iraq. The $300 million-plus transfer had met strong behind-the-scenes opposition in Congress over the past week. The skirmish underscores the budget pressure on the military, given the tempo of operations in the war, rising fuel costs and competing priorities like the Hurricane Katrina recovery. … 'They're desperate. They're under tremendous pressure,' said Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) a Marine veteran and senior member of the House Appropriations Committee, who had a heated telephone conversation last week with Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, about the request."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Top Tyco Executives Sentenced. ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 9, :25, Gibson) reported, "Two former top executives of Tyco International were sentenced today for their roles in one of the nation's major corporate scandals. Former CEO Dennis Koslowski and former finance chief Mark Swartz faced identical prison terms of 8 1/3 to 25 years, and a state judge ordered them to pay $422 million in fines and restitution."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 13, 0:30, Schieffer) reported, "Kozlowski, former CEO of Tyco, was convicted of stealing $150 million from the company to, among other things, throw lavish parties and furnish an apartment, including that infamous $6,000 shower curtain."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 9, 0:30, Williams) reported, "It was the extravagant spending, stealing, and lying to shareholders at Tyco that got former CEO Dennis Kozlowski in trouble."

The AP (9/20, Maull) reports, "L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former CEO of Tyco International, was sentenced Monday to eight and one-third years to 25 years in prison Monday for stealing hundreds of millions of dollars from the company." The AP continues, "His codefendant, former Tyco finance chief Mark Swartz, received the same sentence, which means they will be eligible for parole after eight years and four months. … The judge also ordered them to pay a total of $134 million in restitution. In addition, Kozlowski was fined $70 million and Swartz $35 million." The AP adds, "The sentences end a case that exposed the executives' extravagant lifestyle after pilfering some $600 million from the company including a $2 million toga birthday party for Kozlowski's wife on a Mediterranean island and an $18 million Manhattan apartment with a $6,000 shower curtain. … Kozlowski, 58, and Swartz, 44, were convicted in June after a four-month trial on 22 counts of grand larceny, falsifying business records, securities fraud and conspiracy. It was their second trial - the first ended in mistrial after a juror said she received threats following reports that she made an 'OK' signal to the defense team."

The New York Law Journal (9/20, Lin) reports, "In the course of their three-year-long prosecution, the two men, particularly Kozlowski, have become symbols of corporate greed and excess. But the judge put the case in straightforward terms in imposing sentence. … Despite many unusual characteristics and complications, he said, 'the heart of the case is basic larceny.'" The Journal adds, "First indicted in September 2002, the two executives were convicted in June on several counts of grand larceny, securities fraud, conspiracy and falsifying business records. The judge issued separate sentences on the other counts but said those would be served concurrently with the grand larceny sentence. … Justice Obus also ordered Kozlowski to pay $97 million in restitution to Tyco and $70 million in fines. Swartz was ordered to pay $37 million in restitution and $35 million in fines. … The restitution amounts were tied to the amounts of bonuses the two men were found to have stolen. The defense had maintained throughout the trial that the bonuses were legitimate and fully approved by Tyco's board of directors." The Journal notes, "Though tough, Obus' sentence was less than that requested by the prosecution. Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer had asked the court to impose the maximum sentence of 15 to 30 years 'to send the signal that, here in the financial capital of the world, we will not tolerate theft ... no matter who you are.'"

DOJ_NMG_0006450

The Financial Times (9/20, Bowe) reports, "After sentencing, Mr Kozlowski, 58, and Mr Swartz, 45, were led from the courtroom in handcuffs. They immediately began their sentence of eight years and four months to 25 years in state prison, depending on the decisions of parole officials." The Times adds, "Before the sentencing, Mr Kozlowski asked the judge to be 'as lenient as possible', while Mr Swartz asked to be quickly returned to his family. … But Manhattan prosecutor Owen Heimer said the men had committed theft and fraud on an 'unprecedented and staggering scale', the largest ever in the state."

The New York Times (9/20, Sorkin) reports, "The sentencing follows a parade of other substantial terms imposed on former chief executives convicted of white-collar crimes, most notably Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom, who received a prison term of 25 years, and John J. Rigas of the cable operator Adelphia Communications, who was sentenced to 15 years. Those sentences - in federal courts - were seen as sending a message to deter huge corporate frauds in the future. … The Tyco sentencing may be the last high-profile corporate misconduct before the most prominent one of them all: the trial next year of Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling of Enron."

USA Today (9/20, Mccoy) reports, "The former executives were taken to the jail adjoining the courthouse for initial processing, said Thomas Antenen, a spokesman for the New York City Department of Correction. … The prison terms Obus imposed fell short of the 15-year-to-30 year maximum sought by prosecutors, but far higher than the one-year-to-three-year minimum sought by the defense. John Coffee, a securities law expert at Columbia University Law School, said the two would have fared worse in federal court. … 'They will serve far less time,' Coffee said, 'but it will probably be more painful time. There is no Club Fed in the New York State Correctional system.'"

The Washington Post (9/20, D1, White) reports, "Prosecutors and many shareholder groups say long sentences are necessary to deter future abuses and restore investor confidence. But some defense lawyers question the extent to which a few high-profile cases will deter bad behavior at smaller public companies that present less tempting targets for prosecutors. 'Officers and directors of major corporations, multinational corporations, clearly get the message,' said defense attorney Jacob S. Frenkel. 'The question is whether the message has been conveyed thoroughly to officers and directors at small and mid-size companies.'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Maremont) reports, "Both defendants have said they will appeal. Mr. Kozlowski's lead attorney, Stephen Kaufman, said immediately after the sentencing hearing that he will be applying for bail for his client pending appeal. Charles Stillman, the lead attorney for Mr. Swartz, said he will be 'pursuing appropriate remedies for Mark's situation.' In New York, defendants can choose to bring bail applications before any judge, and often try to choose judges known for their leniency."

USA Today (9/20, McCoy) reports, "Before their convictions, former Tyco executives Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz were known for reaping multimillion-dollar corporate salaries. .. Within weeks, they'll have to get used to earning $1.05 a day in a maximum-security state prison. … 'They will be assigned a job, and that's what they'll earn,' said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the New York State Department of Correctional Services. … 'Every prisoner must work, in the laundry, in the kitchen or somewhere else.'" USA continues, "Lawyers for Kozlowski and Swartz hope to avoid that outcome for at least a while by seeking bail pending appeals of their clients' convictions. … They have a low chance of succeeding, because New York appeals courts generally 'are less willing to let individuals stay out,' said Ronald Blum, a former Manhattan prosecutor who is now a partner at the law firm Manatt Phelps & Phillips. … Unless defense lawyers prevail, the former executives would be transferred within 10 days from city custody — where they were to spend Monday night — to the state correction system. Foglia said Kozlowski and Swartz would likely first be sent to the Downstate Correctional Facility, roughly 60 miles north of New York City, for four to six weeks of processing and classification."

Editorials Praise Kozlowski, Swartz Sentences. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/20) calls the sentences imposed on "Tyco felons Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz," the conclusion of "one of the sorrier chapters in U.S. business history. And while it took a while -- the first Tyco trial ended in mistrial -- the outcome strikes us as just. Not because of their greed -- there's no law against lavish living yet -- but because of their crimes."

The New York Times (9/20) says the sentences are "no cause for celebration. Their lives ruined, they face hard jail time. But that does not change one fact: they deserve it and they should serve it. … The persistent myth that a robber in a suit and tie instead of jeans and a T-shirt deserves a prison with better amenities should be put to rest for good."

AIG Shaped Corporate Haven In "Risk Capital" Bermuda. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Simpson, Francis) reports, "When insurance tycoon Cornelius Vander Starr came ashore (in Hamilton, Bermuda) just after World War II to set up the overseas operation of the company now known as American International Group Inc., this British colony 900 miles off South Carolina was a remote trading post primarily inhabited by descendants of colonists, slaves and shipwreck survivors. … Over the next half-century, AIG executives helped island officials shape a legal landscape that made Bermuda what it boasts is 'the risk capital of world.'

DOJ_NMG_0006451

Some of these laws and regulations have helped AIG in particular; others have favored insurers generally. Together they transformed the 21-square-mile island into the global center of the offshore-insurance industry, claiming more than $200 billion in assets." The Journal continues, "AIG has profited handsomely in its custom-built corporate haven. Now the question is whether the company, even after helping to create a business nirvana, crossed the line of legality to obscure its activities there." The Journal adds, "In May, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer sued AIG and its former chairman, Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, alleging that for many years, the giant insurer improperly used affiliates in Bermuda to burnish its financial results -- either by hiding losses with the affiliates or claiming their gains as its own. In some instances, the suit alleges, AIG failed to disclose its relationships with Bermuda companies, as required by American law. … AIG is in preliminary settlement talks with Mr. Spitzer's office, people familiar with the situation said. Mr. Greenberg's lawyers have said that he has done nothing wrong and will fight the civil allegations. The most prominent figure in his industry, Mr. Greenberg, 80 years old, was forced out of AIG in March amid regulatory inquiries that go far beyond the company's activities in Bermuda. … Also at the center of the Bermuda storm is a Greenberg subordinate named L. Michael Murphy. A former lawyer for the Internal Revenue Service, Mr. Murphy used to reach his AIG office in Hamilton by rowing a small boat from his elegant home across the turquoise waters of a narrow harbor. Since the 1970s, he had helped write local laws and lobbied for Bermuda in Washington -- all to AIG's advantage. … But in March, the New York-based company fired Mr. Murphy for allegedly refusing to cooperate with AIG lawyers gathering information for investigators from New York and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In his suit, filed in a New York state court, Attorney General Spitzer says that Mr. Murphy tried to destroy evidence in Bermuda potentially relevant to a pending investigation of the company's accounting."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former White House Official Arrested In Abramoff Probe. A former White House budget official was arrested yesterday as part of a Federal probe involving GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The story received no coverage from the networks, but is being reported widely on print media, including front page stories in this morning's New York Times (9/20, A1, Shenon, Kornblut) and Washington Post (9/20, A1, Smith, Schmidt). The Times says David H. Safavian, former head of procurement policy at the Office of Management and Budget, resigned "abruptly last week." Yesterday he "was arrested…on charges of lying to investigators and obstructing a federal inquiry involving Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist who has been under scrutiny by the Justice Department for more than a year." The arrest "was the first to result from the wide-ranging corruption investigation of Mr. Abramoff, once among the most powerful and best-paid lobbyists in Washington and a close friend of Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader."

The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Smith, Schmidt) notes that at OMB, Safavian "set purchasing policy for the entire government." Like Abramoff, adds the Post, "Safavian is a veteran Washington player. He is a former lobbying partner of anti-tax crusader Grover Norquist and previously worked with Abramoff at another firm. Both he and Abramoff have represented gambling clients and Indian tribes with gambling interests."

The AP (9/20, Sherman) says Safavian allegedly "concealed from federal investigators that Abramoff was seeking to do business with GSA when Safavian joined him on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to an FBI affidavit and the officials." At the time, FBI agent Jeffrey A. Reising said in an affidavit, "a lobbyist -- identified separately as Abramoff -- had enlisted Safavian's help in trying to gain control of 40 acres of land at the Federal Research Center at White Oak in Silver Spring, Md., for a private high school that Abramoff helped establish and supported." Safavian "edited a letter the lobbyist was preparing to send to GSA, and arranged and attended a meeting involving a GSA official, the lobbyist's wife and others to discuss leasing the property, the affidavit said." Abramoff "told his wife to use her maiden name at the meeting because Safavian sought to play down Abramoff's involvement, the affidavit said, citing an e-mail from Abramoff." The Dallas Morning News (9/20, Mittelstadt, Hillman) adds that "while the 13-page affidavit refers only to 'Lobbyist A,' a government official, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that Mr. Abramoff is the lobbyist."

The Hill (9/20) says "Safavian and Abramoff worked together at Preston, Gates and the two traveled with Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and others" on the golf trip to Scotland. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Roche Jr., Neubauer) reports "Ney has said he had been told that the trip was paid for by the National Center for Public Policy Research. That group, however, has denied financing the junket to the famous St. Andrews golf course." According to the complaint, "'Indian tribal funds' paid for the trip."

Roll Call (9/20, Bresnahan) adds "Brian Walsh, a spokesman for Ney, said the Ohio Republican had no comment on Safavian's indictment other than to say that Ney himself has not been contacted himself by any of the handful of federal agencies or grand juries that are looking into Abramoff's business dealings." House Democrats "immediately pounced on this latest indictment as further evidence that Ney needs to be voted out of office in November 2006."

DOJ_NMG_0006452

The Federal Times (9/20, Gosier) reports, "Safavian was arrested Monday, the Justice Department said in a release. Deputy OFPP Administrator Robert Burton is serving as interim administrator, said Alex Conant, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, OFPP's parent agency."

Government Executive (9/20, Palmer) reports, "Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at OMB, convened a meeting Monday morning to inform agency employees of Safavian's arrest, according to a government source who asked to remain anonymous. Johnson told staff members to support Safavian's family, and cautioned them against responding to him should he attempt to contact them, the source said. … During his confirmation hearings for his position as OFPP chief, Safavian said he worked as a lobbyist and consultant for a variety of organizations, including the Embassy of Pakistan, Microsoft and several Native American groups. … Safavian also has strong ties to Capitol Hill. Before joining GSA, he served as chief of staff to Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, and also has worked for former Michigan House members William Schuette and Robert Davis, both Republicans."

FBI Recruiting Agents For Porn Squad Detail. The Washington Post (9/20, A21, Gellman) reports, "The FBI is joining the Bush administration's War on Porn. And it's looking for a few good agents." The Post continues, "Early last month, the bureau's Washington Field Office began recruiting for a new anti-obscenity squad. Attached to the job posting was a July 29 Electronic Communication from FBI headquarters to all 56 field offices, describing the initiative as "one of the top priorities" of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and, by extension, of 'the Director.' That would be FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III." The Post adds, "Mischievous commentary began propagating around the water coolers at 601 Fourth St. NW and its satellites, where the FBI's second-largest field office concentrates on national security, high-technology crimes and public corruption. … The new squad will divert eight agents, a supervisor and assorted support staff to gather evidence against 'manufacturers and purveyors' of pornography -- not the kind exploiting children, but the kind that depicts, and is marketed to, consenting adults. … 'I guess this means we've won the war on terror,' said one exasperated FBI agent, speaking on the condition of anonymity because poking fun at headquarters is not regarded as career-enhancing. 'We must not need any more resources for espionage.' … Among friends and trusted colleagues, an experienced national security analyst said, 'it's a running joke for us.'" The Post notes, "Public corruption, officially, is fourth on the FBI's priority list, after protecting the United States from terrorist attack, foreign espionage and cyber-based attacks. Just below those priorities are civil rights, organized crime, white-collar crime and 'significant violent crime.' The guidance from headquarters does not mention where pornography fits in. … 'The Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation's top priority remains fighting the war on terrorism,' said Justice Department press secretary Brian Roehrkasse. 'However, it is not our sole priority. In fact, Congress has directed the department to focus on other priorities, such as obscenity.' … At the FBI's field office, spokeswoman Debra Weierman expressed disappointment that some of her colleagues find grist for humor in the new campaign. 'The adult obscenity squad . . . stems from an attorney general mandate, funded by Congress,' she said. 'The personnel assigned to this initiative take the responsibility of this assignment very seriously and are dedicated to the success of this program.'"

Gotti Jury Signals Possible Deadlock On Racketeering Charge. The AP (9/20, Hays) reports, "A federal jury deliberating the case of John A. 'Junior' Gotti, the scion of the Gambino crime family charged with attacking a radio show host, indicated Monday that it was deadlocked on a racketeering charge against the son of the late mob boss." The AP continues, "In a note to U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin on the seventh day of deliberations, jurors asked what they should do if they were deadlocked over the question of Gotti's so-called withdrawal defense. … Gotti, 41, claims he quit the Gambino organized crime family before July 22, 1999, meaning the five-year statute of limitations would have expired on racketeering charges." The AP adds, "The judge told lawyers she planned to read the jurors a charge that would encourage them to keep deliberating until they reached an unanimous verdict. … Prosecutors allege Gotti ordered his Gambino crew to give radio personality Curtis Sliwa a severe beating in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air rants against his father, John Gotti."

US Charges Three In Army Kickback Scheme. The AP (9/20, Sherman) reports, "A civilian Army employee and two business owners were arrested in a kickback scheme to supply furnishings at a new Pentagon-run hotel in the Bavarian Alps that is used by troops on leave from Afghanistan and Iraq, the Justice Department said Monday." The AP continues, "Steven G. Potoski, 45, former contracting director at the Edelweiss Lodge and Resort in Garmisch, Germany, accepted more than $350,000 in bribes in cash, home renovations, trips, computers and tickets to such events as Oktoberfest and the Indianapolis 500, assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said. … Potoski, who lives in Garmisch, was arrested Friday, along with Alvan Vance McQueen, 56, of Shelbyville, Ind., and Ellis Abramson, 39, of Merrick, N.Y." The AP adds, "McQueen, owner of Flat Rock

DOJ_NMG_0006453

Furniture in Waldron, Ind., paid Potoski $45,000 in cash and other items as part of an agreement to inflate the cost of furniture for the hotel and split the extra money, according to a criminal complaint filed against McQueen in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis. … Abramson, president of Bramson House Inc., had a similar arrangement with Potoski for draperies and guest room bedspreads, according to a criminal complaint filed against Abramson in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y. … If convicted, the three men face up to 35 years in prison."

Three Sentenced To Prison For New Jersey Corruption Convictions. The Trenton Times (9/20, Knapp) reports US District Judge Garrett E. Brown Jr. on Monday "sentenced former MCIA Executive Director James R. Lambert Sr., 44, and Washington Township businessman Alex J. Abdalla, 52, to five months in federal prison, five months of house arrest with electronic monitoring, three years of probation and $6,000 in fines each for their guilty pleas to charges of mail fraud and conspiring to bribe former Ewing Mayor Alfred W. Bridges to use his influence to steer a private demolition contract in the township. Hamilton businessman and contractor Michael Maurio, 69, was sentenced to 23 months in federal prison and three years of probation for his part in the conspiracy to defraud the MCIA by submitting false statements in connection with the performance of a demolition project contract in Trenton." The Times notes, "U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie yesterday praised local FBI agents, special agents of the Internal Revenue Service criminal investigation unit and Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Bocian and Jeffrey S. Chiesa for their work in the case while deploring the corruption of defendants in the probe."

Probe Of Allegations Prosecutor Interfered With FBI Probe Cost County $107,000. The Asbury Park Press (9/20, Rizzo) reports, "The Monmouth County Board of Freeholders spent $107,000 for lawyers to represent nine members of the Prosecutor's Office in a federal grand jury investigation that went nowhere, according to the county counsel. Malcolm V. Carton said Monday that he concluded…that the grand jury probe into whether the prosecutor's office interfered with an FBI bribery sting fizzled out in June. 'It went no place,' Carton said. 'There was no indictment, just a lot of threats.'" The APP notes, "Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made."

Former, Current New Mexico Treasurers Plead Not Guilty To Kickback Charges. The AP (9/20, Fonseca) reports, "The New Mexico state treasurer and his predecessor pleaded not guilty Monday to federal racketeering charges involving kickbacks of cash, cars and expensive tickets to political fundraisers. Robert Vigil and former Treasurer Michael Montoya, both Democrats, are accused of steering state business to an investment adviser in exchange for nearly $700,000. … 'Mr. Vigil, from day one, has attempted to clean up this office, and that's what he has done,' said Vigil's attorney, Sam Bregman, who blamed the allegations on disgruntled former employees." The AP notes that "an FBI affidavit describes a wider scheme and says Vigil accepted an envelope stuffed with cash as recently as last month. … On Monday, Lt. Gov. Diane Denish urged Vigil to immediately take administrative leave while the case is pending."

The Washington Post (9/20, A2) also reports on the pleas in "Nation in Brief"

New York Mayor Accused Of Internet Sex Charge Released On Bond. The AP (9/20, Kates) reports, "Although a judge accused him of having 'deviant sexual urges,' Oswego Mayor John Gosek was released Monday with a set of conditions that include electronic monitoring, a curfew and other restrictions." Gosek "was arrested Friday at a Syracuse hotel on a charge that he used a cell phone to solicit sex from a minor." US Magistrate George Lowe "ordered Gosek to post $10,000 bond" and "prohibited Gosek from using cell phones and ordered him not to have contact with any minors. Gosek also must undergo counseling a condition Gosek requested, said his attorney James Eby."

Philadelphia Imam Sentenced To Prison For Corruption Probe Conviction. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/20, Anastasia) reports, "Imam Shamsud-din Ali, convicted earlier this year of racketeering charges that were part of a broader City Hall corruption probe, was sentenced today to 87 months in prison. … Considered one of the most influential Muslim leaders in the city, Ali declined to make any comment during the hearing or as he emerged from the courthouse later in the day. He will remain free on bail pending an appeal." The AP (9/20, Loviglio) notes that Ali's was "the latest in a string of convictions stemming from the FBI's sweeping probe of municipal corruption."

The Philadelphia Daily News (9/20, Caparella) adds that Muslim response to Ali's sentencing was mixed, with one "disgusted Muslim, upset that Ali is out on bail" saying, "Ali 'has one more year to con people out here." But "Ali loyalist, Asim Abdul Rashid, head of the Majlis Ash'Shura" said, "It's a travesty. If there's any fairness, he will win on appeal."

DOJ_NMG_0006454

More Than 100 Gang Suspects Arrested By Florida Task Force. The Tampa Tribune (9/20, Morelli) reports, "A sustained assault on street gangs in northwest Hillsborough County by a task force made up of federal agents and county deputies resulted in the arrest of more than 100 suspected gang members and the seizure of nearly $1 million in property. They didn't get everyone, though. As Sheriff David Gee announced the results of the sweeping six-month investigation Monday afternoon, workers at Morgan Woods Elementary School scrubbed bright orange gang graffiti off the walls and sidewalks. Undaunted by the graffiti…Gee said the sweep was a big blow to the street gangs in northwest Hillsborough because many of those arrested were leaders." The Tribune notes, "The gang task force included Hillsborough sheriff's deputies, FBI agents and U.S. attorney's office investigators, as well as an undercover Pasco County sheriff's detective who infiltrated one gang."

Philadelphia FBI Agents Played Role In Art Theft Sting. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/20, Smith) reports, "It was a helluva heist -- and a helluva sting that recovered a stolen Rembrandt painting worth $36 million. But the FBI says we'll have to wait a couple weeks to learn exactly what role one of its Philadelphia-based agents may have played in the end to one of history's most sensational art thefts. … 'The Philly connection has to do with the sting,' local FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said yesterday, teasing an Oct. 4 press session when reporters will be able to get the whole story. 'Let's just say maybe somebody here was involved in it, and they can talk about it.' … 'The task force was able to introduce an FBI undercover agent with substantial knowledge of art to pose as the buyer/broker for the stolen Rembrandt,' the FBI's Los Angeles field office said. Federal investigators at Philly are known for expertise in stolen art and cultural artifacts. They hosted a new national FBI task force on stolen art this year."

Swedes Expect Suspects Will Be Extradited This Week. The AP (9/20, Olsen) reports that the four suspects "will soon be extradited to Sweden where they will be prosecuted, officials said Monday." The AP notes, "The arrests last week were the result of a multinational operation that included several U.S. law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation. … In Sweden, Prosecutor Ronnie Jacobsson said he hoped the men would be handed over this week."

Tennessee Couple Plead Guilty To Bilking Elderly In Ponzi Scheme. The Knoxville News (9/20, Satterfield) reports, "A Morristown couple pleaded guilty Monday to bilking dozens of people, many of them elderly, in a multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme." Gary Lee Von Oesen and Geneva Retha Houston "admitted their respective roles in a host of financial crimes spanning 1996 to 2003 at a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greeneville before federal Judge J. Ronnie Greer." The News notes, "Von Oesen and Houston were nabbed last year after a probe led by FBI Agent Lane P. Rushing into allegations including mail fraud, securities fraud and money laundering."

Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Attempted Extortion. The Tyler Morning Telegraph (9/20, Knaupp) reports Kirkpatrick Lenord Moore of Tyler "pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to attempting to extort $120,000 from a local woman." Moore "admitted to receiving proceeds of extortion on Dec. 29 after he had left several threatening notes and phone calls to the woman." The Morning Telegraph notes, "FBI officials said they believe the woman had information regarding a felony suspect wanted in Smith County. Moore threatened to inform the FBI of the woman's knowledge and to accuse her of committing an offense regarding the information, according to a FBI affidavit."

Rapper Lil' Kim Reports To Philadelphia Detention Center To Begin Perjury Sentence. The AP (9/19, Matheson) reports, "Rapper Lil' Kim began serving a 366-day prison sentence at a federal detention center Monday for perjury and conspiracy stemming from a 2001 shootout outside a Manhattan radio station." The AP continues, "The 30-year-old entertainer, whose real name is Kimberly Jones, was whisked into the center past a throng of media, fans and passers-by at about 4:45 p.m. … Earlier, she had issued a statement saying she had 'unfortunately' been assigned to the concrete, high-rise Philadelphia facility instead of to a prison camp 'as discussed,' and added, 'I am not certain that this constitutes fair and equal treatment.' … Her lawyer, L. Londell McMillan, said a celebrity of his client's magnitude could be in danger in such a detention center, which he said was mainly designed as a temporary holding facility for inmates awaiting permanent assignment to a prison."

Psychologist Says Hinckley Should Be Allowed Overnight Visits. Psychologist Paul Montalbano, chief of pretrial services at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, testified yesterday that John Hinckley Jr., who tried to kill President Ronald Reagan in 1981, should be allowed to visit his parents and stay overnight with them at their home in Williamsburg, Virginia. The Washington Times (9/20, Wagner) reports that Montalbano said Hinckley's "mental state has improved since he shot President Reagan," and that he now "abides by rules and regulations. His rehabilitation would be increased if he were allowed to walk through the vast community around his parents' home, which includes six golf courses, shopping centers, a school and historical sites, the hospital psychologist testified." The Washington Post (9/20, A10, Cauvin) adds that Montalbano also testified that Hinckley "is lonely and longing for a close relationship." Montalbano said, "He wants to have a girlfriend. He wants intimate contact with a female." The Post adds that the "underlying question" at yesterday's hearings "appeared to be how Hinckley would handle courtship and respond to rejection out in the world, away from the structure and support of a hospital."

DOJ_NMG_0006455

Jury Selection Begins In Trial Of Former Illinois Governor. Jury selection began Monday in the trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, who is charged with racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud, tax fraud and lying to investigators. Reuters (9/20, Stern) reports, "Ryan, 71, is charged with steering state contracts to friends in exchange for free gifts, vacations, cash and loans to himself and his family while governor and, before that, during eight years as Illinois' secretary of state.'

The New York Times (9/20, Wilgoren) says the trial "caps a seven-year federal investigation that has led to 79 indictments and 73 convictions and is known as Operation Safe Road because of its roots exposing a scheme in which government employees traded commercial driver's licenses for bribes. Mr. Ryan's co-defendant is Lawrence K. Warner, a longtime lobbyist and close confidant."

The AP (9/20, Robinson) reports, "Jury selection for former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering trial got off to a slow start Monday with questions from defense attorneys focusing on possible bias resulting from media coverage of the scandal that has dominated state politics for seven years. … 'Because he was governor this is a highly unusual case,' Ryan attorney Dan Webb told the court. 'We should not end up with a jury that has people on it with biases against George Ryan.'" The AP continues, "Webb urged federal Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer not to put time limits on the questioning and she said she would wait until noon Tuesday before doing so to see if the pace picks up. … But she said it was necessary to get going." The AP adds, "After one day of jury selection, 14 of some 300 potential jurors had been interviewed and eight were placed in a pool for later consideration. Eleven of the 300 were dismissed for reasons ranging from health problems to job conflicts to blatant bias against the former governor."

FBI New Orleans SAC Laments High Rate Of New Orleans Political Corruption. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/19) about the Louisiana political corruption investigations, FBI New Orleans SAC Jim Bernazzani said, "As far from the FBI office, we have a tremendous working relationship with all government, whether it is state, federal or local, whether it is law enforcement or it's from the mayor's office or from the parish presidents. We have no problem with that. What we do have here, unfortunately, is a target-rich environment relative to select individuals who would abuse their office for personal profit. Within the FBI, New Orleans ranks 19th in size, but we are third in public corruption convictions. And the unintended consequence of public corruption is not only are they stealing from the people, but they are contributing to this violent crime landscape, in that companies from out of state will not invest in New Orleans, because they are sick and tired of the bribes and the kickbacks."

Police Say DC Dog Walker Killed in 'Face-To-Face' Encounter. The Washington Post (9/20, B3, Wilber, Henderson) reports police said yesterday that a man who was fatally shot while walking his dog in the Mount Pleasant section in Northwest Washington was killed in a "face-to-face" encounter with his assailant. The paper adds investigators said they had no motive or suspect in the slaying of Gregory C. Shipe, 34, a financial analyst for Ogilvy Public Relations. He was shot in the face about 10:40 p.m. Saturday in a crime that one top D.C. police official yesterday called "bizarre." Although none of Shipe's possessions, including his wallet, was missing, investigators speculated that he most likely was the victim of a botched robbery, authorities said. Police and neighbors said several robberies have taken place in the area recently. Police are offering a reward of up to $25,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of a suspect.

FBI Searches Missing VCU Student's Car. The Washington Times (9/20, Cella) reports that Richmond Police investigating the disappearance of a 17-year-old Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Marie Behl spent yesterday investigating leads they got from an examination of her car. Behl of Vienna, VA has been missing since Sept. 5. An off-duty police officer found Taylor's 1997 Ford Escort on Saturday in Richmond, about a mile and a half from her dorm. The Times adds Police said that there were Ohio license plates on the car and that the original Virginia tags were missing. Police said the car was turned over to the FBI for forensics processing. The Times said the Richmond Times-Dispatch reported yesterday that Taylor's scent was one of two that a police dog detected in the car and that the discovery is leading police to think that she might have been abducted.

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Settles False Claims Charges Against Office Depot. Federal Computer Week (9/20, Hardy)

DOJ_NMG_0006456

reports, "Office Depot has paid a $4.75 million settlement to the United States over allegations that the company sold products to government agencies in violation of the Trade Agreements Act." FCW continues, "The Justice Department, in announcing the settlement today, said Office Depot sold products from China, Taiwan and other countries that do not have reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, in violation of a provision of the company's General Services Administration schedule contract. … 'Federal contractors will be held accountable for their billing practices,' said Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general at Justice's Civil Division, in a written statement. 'This settlement is an example of the department's determination to ensure that federal funds are protected from fraud and abuse.'"

Reuters (9/20) reports, "Earlier this year OfficeMax Inc. agreed to pay $9.8 million to settle similar allegations."

FEC Sues Club For Growth Over Campaign Finance Compliance. The Washington Post/AP (9/20, Theimer) reports, "Federal election officials on Monday sued a political group to try to force it to comply with campaign finance limits, the first lawsuit of its kind to arise from controversial big-money fundraising during the 2004 elections." The AP continues, "The Federal Election Commission filed a complaint in U.S. District Court in Washington against the Club for Growth. The pro-Republican group spent at least $21 million in the 2003-04 election cycle. … The FEC contends the Club spent enough in federal races to require it to file with the commission as a political committee and abide by contribution and spending limits. It wants the court to fine the group and to order it to comply with campaign finance rules." The AP adds, "Club for Growth President Pat Toomey called the FEC lawsuit 'a bizarre interpretation of the Club's mission, the Constitution, the laws adopted by Congress and their own regulations governing nonprofit organizations.' … 'The Club's principal purpose is to advocate for and defend pro-growth policies,' Toomey said in a written statement. 'We have consulted with counsel every step of the way and have followed the law and regulations that govern our work.'"

The New York Times (9/20, Justice) reports, "The suit is the first major enforcement case to involve a '527 committee,' the independent political organizations that both Republicans and Democrats used to raise and spend hundreds of millions of dollars in the 2004 races. Commission officials describe it as a test case that could have a major impact on how future elections are financed. … 'This is one of the most important suits the commission has brought in the last decade,' said Michael Toner, the commission's Republican vice chairman."

The Washington Times (9/20, Dinan) notes that Club for Growth President Patrick J. Toomey "said yesterday's suit was part of a 'war on the First Amendment.' He said the FEC's suit was the result of a complaint by the" DSCC "that said the Club for Growth stepped over the line when it targeted Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat. 'The commission allowed it to lie inactive for nearly a year and a half and then resurrected it as a platform to seek to take away our members' rights and exact a huge civil penalty from the club,' Mr. Toomey said." The Times adds, "President Bush's campaign, key lawmakers who helped pass the 2002 changes and other political organizations sued the FEC last year for not enforcing its regulations on 527s. Those cases are pending in federal court."

New Georgia Law May Jeopardize Asbestos Cases. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (9/20, Pollak) reports, "Lawyers are gearing up for a constitutional challenge to a new state law that could remove nearly 3,000 asbestos cases from Fulton County dockets." The Report continues, "The law was designed to stem the tide of out-of-state asbestos claims being filed in Georgia, said its primary sponsor, Rep. David E. Ralston, R-Blue Ridge. … 'We were seeing a huge number of people that were nonresidents of Georgia and that had not been exposed to asbestos or silica in Georgia who were suing in Georgia courts,' said Ralston. 'That was a trend that was disturbing not only to me, but to others.'" The Report adds, "The vast majority of asbestos cases in Georgia have been filed in Fulton, with about 2,200 pending in state court before Judge Henry M. Newkirk and about 1,000 pending in superior court before Chief Judge Doris L. Downs, attorneys involved in the cases said. They estimated that out-of-state plaintiffs who were not exposed to asbestos in Georgia filed approximately 90 percent of those cases. … A lawyer defending the asbestos suits, E. Elaine Shofner of Hawkins & Parnell, noted that claims in Georgia courts have originated from Alabama, North Carolina, Wisconsin, Hawaii, Texas, Nebraska and Pennsylvania. … 'We became a dumping ground,' she said. … One plaintiffs' attorney, David P. Bevon of Motley Rice in Mount Pleasant, S.C., said out-of-state plaintiffs filed in Georgia because the law here was more favorable than in other states for injuries that occurred years or even decades ago. He also noted that some defendants, such as Georgia-Pacific, are based here."

Colorado AG Argues Against State Settlements With Tobacco Companies. Colorado State Treasurer Mark Hillman writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/20), "When politicians take campaign contributions from Big Tobacco, self-proclaimed watchdog groups yelp about impropriety. Yet for the past seven years, the industry has paid tens of billions of dollars to state governments to protect tobacco profits. Until recently, hardly anyone seemed to notice, much less care. Then, on Aug. 2, the non-profit Competitive Enterprise Institute filed a lawsuit arguing that the 1998 Master Settlement Agreement (MSA) between Big Tobacco and 46 state attorneys-general (AGs) violates the Constitution and establishes a cartel designed to circumvent antitrust law and quash competition. Hallelujah. I am a state treasurer and this suit could greatly reduce revenue to my state; and still I am enthusiastic. The billions generated by the settlement cloak the pernicious threat that activist AGs pose to the checks and balances on political power that govern our Constitutional system. Regulation and taxation policies are the rightful responsibility of the legislative and executive branches -- not the domain of states' chief law enforcement officers." Hillman adds, "The question facing the courts is not whether the MSA is good policy or whether tobacco companies are scoundrels. The larger issue is whether AGs can rightfully evolve into a law unto themselves, usurping the Constitutional roles of state legislators, governors, Congress and, ultimately, the voters themselves."

DOJ_NMG_0006457

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Carter-Baker Panel Suggests 87 Election-Reform Changes. Reuters (9/20) reports, "Electronic voting machines should have paper trails to keep track of votes cast and all voters should present photo IDs, a panel recommending ways to restore confidence in the U.S. election system said on Monday. The bipartisan Commission on Federal Election Reform, led by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker, made 87 recommendations for strengthening the integrity of a process shaken by voting controversies." Reuters notes, "The call for paper verification of votes on electronic machines drew praise from election reform advocates, but the call for photo identification was criticized as an invasion of privacy and something that would discourage some voters. That recommendation would require all prospective voters by the year 2010 to produce a photo ID card at the polling place -- either a driver's license or, for those without driver's licenses, an identification card issued by the state. The commission called on states to make distribution of the card simple and widespread."

The Washington Times (9/20, DeBose) adds, "The standard of identification recommended by the" commission "is essentially the same as those established by the recently passed federal Real ID Act, which outlines strict rules and procedures for the issuance of driver's licenses by the states. 'The Real ID is a logical vehicle because the National Voter Registration Act established a connection between obtaining a driver's license and registering to vote,' said the report drafted by the commission. … 'The Real ID card adds two critical elements for voting -- proof of citizenship and verification by using the full Social Security number.'" Carter and Baker "yesterday defended the recommendations, saying photo-identification already is required to board airplanes, cash checks and enter federal buildings. But Commissioner Spencer Overton, a George Washington University election law professor, dissented. 'The recommendation will exclude millions of Americans, and the disproportionate numbers of citizens who will be excluded are people of color,' he said."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A18, Harwood) relates that Carter and Baker "presented President Bush with their recommendations, which also included information-sharing to prevent voters from registering in more than one state" and "use of mobile offices to ease registration. … They said White House support will be critical to moving some portions through the Republican-controlled Congress, and signaled it may come soon." The Journal adds, "Last night the White House released a statement from the president praising the commission's 'excellent work' and pledging to work with Congress on its recommendations."

Editorials Criticize Voter-ID Recommendation. The Washington Post (9/20, A22) editorializes, "The report released yesterday by" the Commission on Federal Election Reform "contains a number of valuable proposals. But adopting one of the commission's recommendations -- that voters be required to present a government-issued voter ID at the polls -- would, on balance, do more harm than good. … This may not sound particularly burdensome. … Yet 12 percent of the voting-age population does not have a driver's license, and those without identification tend disproportionately to be minorities, the elderly and the poor." And, "for those who don't already have identification, the hurdle of assembling the necessary documentation and obtaining the cards could prove a deterrent to voting." The Post adds that "election administrators agree that absentee ballots pose a bigger risk of fraud, and in that case the commission would guard against fraud by having election officials match a signature on file. … Allowing voters to show alternative forms of identification or to sign a sworn affidavit of eligibility could go a significant way toward deterring fraud without imposing the burden of an inflexible photo ID requirement."

The New York Times (9/20) editorializes that the "bombshell recommendation" requiring "voters to have drivers' licenses or a government-issued photo ID" wouldn't "be a great burden for people who have drivers' licenses, but it would be for those who don't, and they are disproportionately poor, elderly or members of minorities. These voters would have to get special photo ID's and keep them updated. If they didn't have the ID's, their right to vote would be taken away. The commission recommends that the cards be free. But election administration is notoriously underfinanced, and it is not hard to imagine that states would charge for them." The Times adds, "There is very little evidence of voters' claiming to be people they are not. … But the report goes on to say that even if there is just a small amount of fraud, it should be stopped. True, but if the solution risks disenfranchising hundreds of thousands, or even millions, of voters, it is a very bad reform."

DOJ_NMG_0006458

Suit Challenges Georgia's Voter ID Law. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/20, Campos, Salzer) reports, "Voting and civil rights groups launched a legal assault Monday on the state's requirement that Georgians show a government-issued photo ID at the polls — a law they call the most restrictive of its kind in the country." The AJC continues, "A federal lawsuit filed on behalf of two African-American voters, the American Civil Liberties Union, NAACP, League of Women Voters, black legislators and others calls the new law a 'poll tax' that will rob black, elderly and rural people of their right to vote. … Supporters of the new law condemned the suit, arguing that the law will eliminate the likelihood of fraud at the polls. House Speaker Glenn Richardson (R-Hiram) called it a 'ludicrous lawsuit.' … 'This lawsuit is nothing more than liberal special interests using unconscionable scare tactics to frighten Georgia voters,' Richardson said." The AJC adds, "While long expected, the suit raises the stakes of a debate that has raged since last winter's session of the Legislature. The suit won't affect today's special elections in Cobb County and elsewhere, but opponents hope a judge throws out the law before elections being held in November in many Georgia cities."

The AP (9/19, Pettys) reports, "The suit was filed the same day a commission co-chaired by former President Carter, a Georgia native, recommended a national requirement that voters show photo IDs. … Opponents of photo IDs for voters say such requirements would disenfranchise minorities and the poor; backers say they're a good way to combat voter fraud. … 'Photographic identification as a requirement for voting is antidemocratic and prevents people from exercising their fundamental right to vote whether proposed by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia or the Carter-Baker commission,' said Daniel Levitas of the American Civil Liberties Union's voting rights project." The AP adds, "Plaintiffs in the suit — including Common Cause, the League of Women Voters, the Georgia Legislative Black Caucus and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People — contend the law violates the state and federal constitutions. … The law eliminates formerly accepted forms of voter identification, such as Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills."

DOJ's Florida Voting Rights Suit Divides Hispanics. The Orlando Sentinel (9/20, Sashin) reports, "The federal voting-rights lawsuit against Osceola County has become a wedge in the Hispanic community, dividing activists and candidates over the best way to gain political power." The Sentinel continues, "Some supporters of the suit, who filed a similar challenge against the city of Kissimmee, contend that single-member districts would give Hispanics a better shot at representation. … Other Hispanics say there's nothing keeping the right candidate from winning under the current at-large system, in which commissioners are elected by all the voters. Often, they say, Hispanic candidates undercut each other's campaigns, fail to get other Hispanics to vote or convey the wrong message. … 'Saying we should get this because we're Hispanic is not the answer. . . . There's a lot of people who are sick of it,' said Hector Lizasuain, a board member of several community organizations, including Give Kids Safe Shelter." The Sentinel adds, "The Justice Department filed suit against the county in July, alleging Osceola's practice of electing commissioners countywide discriminates against Hispanics because it dilutes their voting strength. The county's Hispanic population has tripled during the past decade. Although they make up 31 percent of registered voters, only one Hispanic has been elected as a county commissioner. … The federal government has suggested that Osceola could create five commission districts, with one made up of mostly Hispanic voters. … Armando Ramirez, who originally complained to the Justice Department and spearheaded the Kissimmee suit, and other activists say a single-member district system is the only way for a minority candidate with little money to get elected."

Disabled Groups Protest Congressional Spending Cuts. Roll Call (9/20, Hechinger) reports, "More than 500 disability-rights protesters from across the country, most in wheelchairs, descended on Congressional offices today to call for expanded patient rights under Medicaid and to express frustration with some Members' calls for deep cuts to social programs. Despite numerous arrests and a heavy Capitol Police presence, the protesters plan to stay on Capitol Hill throughout the week. … Most of those arrested were being held in Room 2128 in the Rayburn House Office Building to be processed, but arrests also were made in the Hart Senate and Cannon House office buildings. No official comment on the number of arrests is yet available." Roll Call notes, "In addition to general calls for enhancing disability rights, the protesters urged Members of Congress to sponsor and pass the Medicaid Community-Based Attendant Services and Supports Act, as well as the Money Follows the Person Act, both of which were proposed by ADAPT, the disability-rights organization leading Monday's protest and fight on the Hill. … 'We've tried being nice,' said Linda Anthony, an ADAPT spokeswoman. 'We've written Congressmen, we've phoned them, we've come to their offices to try to talk, but nothing works. We're done playing nice. We'd rather go to jail then go back to the nursing homes.'"

DOJ_NMG_0006459

Senate Debate On Flag Burning Could Affect 2006 Races. A flag burning amendment is likely to make it to the Senate floor before next year's elections, The Hill (9/20, Cusack, Lanham) reports. Republicans "will use the proposed amendment to the Constitution as political ammunition in 2006. Several targeted Democrats in the upper chamber oppose changing the Constitution to prohibit flag burning, including Sens. Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Robert Byrd (W.Va.)." The Hill adds, "The fate of a pending flag-burning amendment lies in the hands of a few senators. Because Sen. Orrin Hatch's (R-Utah) amendment would alter the Constitution, it needs 67 votes, two-thirds of the Senate, to pass. Including Hatch, the amendment has 58 co-sponsors. Based on previous votes, the measure has the likely support of 63 senators — if senators vote the way they have previously."

ANTITRUST:

Ohio, Wisconsin Plan Minimum-Service Real State Laws. Inman News (9/20, Roberts) reports, "Realtor associations in Wisconsin and Ohio are pushing for laws that establish new service requirements for real estate professionals while making room for real estate companies that offer a lesser range of services for lower fees." Inman continues, "In several other states, Realtor-backed efforts to establish a mandatory range of services for all real estate professionals – effectively banning some limited forms of real estate services – have drawn sharp criticism from antitrust officials at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. … But the Realtor groups in Wisconsin and Ohio say their proposals recognize and provide some protections for real estate business models that offer fewer services than traditional firms. In both of these states, Realtor associations formed task forces to study the law changes, with representation from limited-service real estate companies." Inman adds, "The Association of Real Estate License Law Officials, a group for real estate regulators, conducted a study that found that Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas and Utah have enacted some form of minimum-service legislation within the past couple of years. And other states, too, have earlier approved or are now pursuing minimum-service measures. … Federal officials opposed the Realtor-backed measures in Alabama, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas, charging that the legislation was anticompetitive and anti-consumer. But legislators and governors in all four states passed the measures despite these objections."

MasterCard To Issue No-Touch Cards. Reuters (9/19, Kelleher) reports, "A top executive with Mastercard Inc. said on Monday the company, the world's No. 2 credit-card association, expected to have 4 million so-called 'pay pass' cards in circulation by year's end." Reuters continues, "Speaking at an industry conference here, Ruth Ann Marshall, Americas president for MasterCard, said that Citibank, HSBC and Key Bank had all begun offering the cards, which are equipped with a radio-frequency chip that allows customers to pay for purchases by simply waving their cards at readers posted near cash registers or gas pumps. … Marshall said the pay-pass cards were 'easier to use than cash' and were one of the products MasterCard was counting on to increase revenue and profits as it faces a variety of challenges in the marketplace, including new rivals and regulatory scrutiny. … 'It's just one of the ... breakthroughs in technology that we're pursuing in order to increase convenience and boost usage,' Marshall said." Reuters adds, "MasterCard, owned by more than 1,000 banks, formally revealed its plans last week to go public early next year in an initial public offering. … In addition, to raising money to bolster its balance sheet, MasterCard said it believed the IPO would help quell criticism from merchants and others, who charge that its current structure -- which foes characterize as a cartel of competing banks setting transaction fees in concert -- represents a violation of U.S. antitrust laws."

Verizon, Source Resources Settle Records Dispute. The Washington Post (9/20, D5, Krim) reports that Source Resources Inc. of Cookeville, TN has reached an agreement with Verizon to stop selling personal cell phone records of individuals over the Internet and will provide information on how it acquired the data. The paper says the firm "was among dozens of companies advertising that for fees starting under $100, they would provide records of calls placed to and from any phone user." The Post adds, "Although phone records cannot lead to the type of financial fraud that can result when other types of personal data are stolen, experts said they can be exploited by criminals, such as stalkers or abusive spouses trying to locate their victims. Wireless carriers say cases of purloined records are rare and that they take measures to safeguard the information. But the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a leading privacy rights group, last month urged the Federal Communications Commission to crack down on carriers for having inadequate security." The paper notes Verizon Wireless sued Source Resources in July, after a Verizon Wireless customer complained that his records had been obtained from Source Resources without his permission.

Regulators Near Approval Of Industry-Altering Phone Deals. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Schatz, Wilke) reports that federal regulators "are nearing approval of two deals that would reshape the telephone industry and are in negotiations over likely divestitures and other conditions intended to preserve competition, especially in the huge market for corporate customers." The Journal adds, "Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin is pressing the FCC staff to deliver as early as tomorrow recommendations to approve Verizon Communications Inc.'s $8.5 billion purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications Inc.'s $16 billion takeover of AT&T Corp., people familiar with the situation say. FCC votes on the deals could come as early as the agency's Oct. 12 meeting." The paper continues, "At the same time, Justice Department investigators have concluded that the merging companies must sell some assets, moves they believe are needed to preserve competition for high-volume business customers, said lawyers close to the government review. Antitrust enforcers are negotiating with SBC and Verizon on the scope of those divestitures, these people said. That is a concern for SBC and Verizon, since a major goal of their acquisitions was to acquire lucrative corporate customers in order to sell more packages of telecom services. As a result of both the FCC and Justice Department reviews, regulators are concerned that consolidation will make it more difficult for business customers to get discounts on telecom services."

DOJ_NMG_0006460

File-Sharing Firms Seek Deal With Recording Industry. The New York Times (9/20, Hansell) reports, "At least five online file-sharing companies have started trying to reach an accord with the music industry to convert the free trading of copyrighted music on their networks to paid services, according to several recording industry and file-sharing executives. The most advanced discussions are between the recording industry and Grokster, a small California company that has been sued by the entertainment industry, recording industry executives said." The Times adds, "Grokster has agreed in principle to be acquired by Mashboxx, a new company backed by Sony that is trying to start a legal file-sharing service, a person involved in the negotiations said. Mashboxx has made overtures to some file-sharing companies including eDonkey, Morpheus and LimeWire, but negotiations are not active, the person said." The paper continues, "Separately, iMesh, a file-sharing service that last year reached an accord with the music industry to convert to a legal paid service, has made overtures to acquire a number of the other file-sharing services, on the condition that they settle their claims with the recording industry, said Robert E. Summer, the executive chairman of iMesh."

Financier Ross Eyes Auto Parts Manufacturers. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, McCracken) reports, "Billionaire Wilbur L. Ross, the New York-based financier who in recent years merged five faltering steel companies to create a steelmaker he later sold for a huge profit, says he has as much as $4.5 billion in capital to bank on his next venture -- buying up troubled auto-parts makers, possibly including unprofitable operations Visteon Corp. is about to jettison. Mr. Ross's investment group and other funds he is working have already snapped up half the bank debt of automotive supplier Collins & Aikman Corp., which is under Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection, and stakes in smaller suppliers in Europe and Asia. Another potential target he could be interested in includes the 23 plants and other facilities that Visteon is about to transfer back to former parent Ford Motor Co." The Journal adds Visteon and Ford last week announced an agreement under which Ford will take over 17 Visteon plants, plus six offices, research centers and other facilities in the US and Mexico on Oct. 1. The assets, with combined annual sales of more than $7 billion, by themselves would make up the world's 17th largest auto supplier by sales. Ford, which will have to spend between $450 million and $650 million this year and $300 million to $500 million after that for buyouts of hourly workers, has said it hopes to sell the businesses to investors or new owners.

StarPoint To Acquire Acclaim In Energy Deal. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Carlisle) reports, "StarPoint Energy Trust said it agreed to acquire Acclaim Energy Trust in a stock transaction, in an attempt to create one of the biggest entities in Canada's increasingly crowded energy-trust sector, with the financial clout to pursue larger acquisitions. Under the agreement, StarPoint unitholders would get 53% of the new trust, receiving one unit for each StarPoint unit held. Acclaim unitholders would receive 0.8333 of a new-trust unit for each Acclaim unit held. StarPoint and Acclaim unitholders also would receive shares in a company exploring for oil and natural gas, to be spun off from the combined entity's assets. Based on StarPoint's closing share price, Acclaim shareholders would receive equity valued at about $1.93 billion." The paper adds, "At a news conference, Acclaim President and Chief Executive J. Paul Charron, who has been named to the same post at the combined trust, said he expects the increase in size to give the trust a competitive edge in pursuing acquisitions in a heated international market for oil and natural-gas assets."

Norsk Hydro To Buy Spinnaker. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Talley) reports that Norway's Norsk Hydro ASA said it will acquire Spinnaker Exploration Co., of the US, for $2.45 billion "substantially accelerating the Norwegian company's international production growth and making the Gulf of Mexico a future core production area." The paper adds, "Both Norsk Hydro and analysts said the price is high but that the acquisition is necessary if Norsk Hydro is going to increase the low rate at which it replaces reserves. The Norwegian oil, gas, power and aluminum company said it will pay $65.50 a share for Spinnaker, which has oil and gas assets primarily in the Gulf of Mexico."

DOJ_NMG_0006461

Microsoft Buys Alacris. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Guth) reports, "Microsoft Corp. said it bought privately held Alacris Inc., a small maker of software for managing employees' access to corporate computer networks, to help improve the security of Microsoft's programs. Terms weren't disclosed. Ottawa-based Alacris's software manages smart cards, or plastic cards that store a person's identification data. The purchase is an extension of joint work by the two companies on security software called idNexus for managing smart cards." The paper adds, "Alacris is part of a recent wave of companies that are developing technologies for administrating the electronic 'identities' of computer-network users by means such as granting or removing their access. The Journal continues, "By purchasing Alacris, Microsoft intends to make it easier for users of its server software to administer smart cards -- handling tasks such as setting up people with cards and retiring cards when a person leaves a company. Under increased scrutiny by its customers over the security of its software, Microsoft has bought technologies in the past two years to help it fight Internet-borne attacks such as spyware and viruses."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Pombo Offers Amendments To Endangered Species Act. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo proposed amendments to the Endangered Species Act that would make it more difficult for the federal government to set aside land deemed crucial to the heath of endangered species. The New York Times (9/20, Barringer) reports that the proposed amendments "also increase the obligation of government agencies to tell landowners quickly if the law limits their development options, and to compensate them." The Times adds, "The measure, which drew quick denunciations from groups like Environmental Defense, Defenders of Wildlife and the Natural Resources Defense Council, was proposed by the House Resources Committee chairman, Representative Richard W. Pombo, Republican of California."

Losers In Eminent Domain Case Face $300,000 In Fees. The Washington Times (9/20, Price) reports, "Seven homeowners in New London, Conn., who narrowly lost a court battle to save their homes from condemnation say the city is still demanding as much as $300,000 in 'use and occupancy' fees dating to the November 2000 condemnation order. They say the demands are being made even though an eviction order from last week has been rescinded. It had been issued by the semi-public New London Development Corp. and had told the homeowners to move out in the next 30 to 90 days and pay $600 a month in rent while they continue to occupy the premises. An attorney for NLDC, which wants to demolish the homes to make room for private development, had told the homeowners' attorney last year that the city, for which NLDC has acted as an agent, expects to collect the occupancy fees."

Native American Nation Works To Stop Arctic Drilling. The Washington Post (9/20, C1, de la Torre) reports on the efforts of the Gwich'in, "a nation of 8,000 Native Americans" who make their home in Alaska, to prevent the passage of a budget bill that includes a provision allowing for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The Gwich'in "see the prospect of drilling as a sure sign of their own demise."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Attorney: Internet Opens Doors For Drug Ring. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/19, Smith) reports, "Dr. Akhil Bansal was one of 17 people indicted by a federal grand jury in Philadelphia last April for allegedly taking part in 'an international conspiracy to import and distribute' prescription drugs, using the Internet. Five additional defendants were charged in a 'related indictment' in New York. … 'This case shows us how the Internet has opened the door to an unregulated universe from which anyone with access to a computer can purchase anything from anti-anxiety drugs to anabolic steroids,' said U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan, the Philadelphia area's top federal lawman, when the cases were made public." Christine Konieczny is a Lower Merion police officer assigned to a DEA task force. "The drugs are manufactured abroad, do not bear required labels and warnings, and are being imported without Customs declarations or payment of duty," said Konieczny.

Report: Congress To Investigate Orioles' Palmeiro. The AP (9/20) reports, "Congressional investigators looking into whether [Baltimore Orioles first baseman] Rafael Palmeiro lied under oath are interviewing players who know him, including a Colorado outfielder suspended this year for steroids, The Associated Press has learned. Palmeiro testified to the House Government Reform Committee in March that he never had used steroids. The Baltimore Orioles slugger…was suspended by Major League Baseball for 10 days in August for failing a drug test." According to the AP, "a congressional source familiar with the committee's work, speaking to the AP on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said Monday that 'several active players' have spoken or will speak with the committee."

DOJ_NMG_0006462

Report: Drugs In Iraq Called Threat To U.S.'s National Security. The WashingtonTimes (9/19, Scarborough) reports, "Insurgents and foreign terrorists in Iraq are being financed in part by the illicit drug trade originating in Afghanistan and passing through Iraq to Europe, congressional and defense sources say. Money from Afghan-produced heroin is being used by terror cells to buy weapons and equipment, and pay Iraqi citizens to conduct attacks on U.S. troops and to plant deadly improvised explosive devices (IEDs), U.S. officials say." In a Sept. 8 letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde is reported to have written of an "emerging and dangerous growth of the illicit drug trade in Iraq, especially with heroin, now originating and pouring out of nearby Afghanistan. We can no longer ignore the threat to our national security from drugs in Iraq," the Illinois Republican is reported to have written in the letter obtained by The Washington Times.

Former Haitian Anti-Narcotics Chief Faces Trial. The AP (9/19, Anderson) reports, "A top Haitian police official in the government of ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide is facing trial on charges that he accepted thousands of dollars in bribes to help Colombian drug lords move huge loads of cocaine through the impoverished Caribbean country." Jury selection is expected to begin this week in the case against Evintz Brillant, "the only one of four former senior Haitian police officials who has not pleaded guilty in the investigation of drug trafficking inside the Aristide government." According to the U.S. DEA, "Brillant used his post as head of Haiti's top anti-drug police unit from 2001 to 2004 to help drug traffickers ship thousands of pounds of cocaine through Haiti, including the airport in the capital of Port-au-Prince, to the United States, Europe and elsewhere."

Tucson Anti-Youth Violence Crackdown Yields Hundreds Of Arrests. The Tucson Citizen (9/20, Teibel, Rowley) reports, "Tucson police made 356 arrests over the summer in specialized efforts to reduce the number of juveniles involved in crimes and to put a cap on a rash of murders. … Of that number, 194 of those arrested were juveniles while the rest were adults." The Citizen continues, "Operations Division South Capt. Perry Tarrant said the summer youth deployment, which lasted from May 27 to Aug. 20, was funded by a grant from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and a private grant from Kino Weed and Seed. … On July 28, police and ATF agents expanded the program to target adult troublemakers after there were four homicides in three days: one on July 23, one on the 24th and two on the 25th, said Assistant police Chief Kathleen Robinson." The Citizen adds, "The expanded special patrols had officers looking for such things as illegal gatherings in business parking lots, rowdy gatherings and drinking in public, considered precursors to killings. The patrols went on until Sept. 10, Robinson said. … From July 28 to Sept. 10 there were no homicides in the South Side patrol area, said Sgt. Kerry Fuller, a police spokeswoman. During the same period last year there were two, she said. … Citywide there have been 33 homicides this year. There were 38 by this time last year, Fuller said Friday afternoon."

Judge Rules US Marshals Service Must Release Defendants' Photos. The Detroit Free Press/AP (9/20) reports, "A federal judge has ruled that the U.S. Marshals Service must comply with media requests for photos of criminal defendants, but said it can take up to 20 days to process the requests under the Federal Freedom of Information Act." The AP continues, "The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor also said that the requests may be processed through the Marshals Service headquarters in Washington, rather than through its office in Detroit, the Free Press reported in a story on its Web site Monday." The AP adds, "The newspaper had asked in its lawsuit that the photos be provided through the Detroit office. Pictures previously requested in Detroit usually were provided the same day. … The Free Press and the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal sued the Marshals Service earlier this year after it stopped providing the photos on the grounds that it would invade the privacy of defendants."

Deadly Kansas Rig Blast Might Have Been Arson. The AP (9/20) reports, "Evidence of possible criminal activity has been found in a natural gas drilling rig explosion (in Independence, KS) that killed two workers and injured a third, authorities said Monday." The AP continues, "The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Kansas State Fire Marshal's office and the Montgomery County Sheriff's Department are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and conviction in the June 2 explosion. … 'If this tragedy was the result of a deliberate criminal act, we will not rest until whoever is responsible was brought to justice,' Sheriff Stan Veach said in a statement announcing the reward. … Paul Marquardt, an ATF spokesman in Kansas City, Mo., would not discuss the evidence in detail."

IMMIGRATION:

Nominee To Head Immigration Bureau Criticized As Inexperienced. The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Eggen, Hsu) reports, "The Bush administration is seeking to appoint a lawyer with little immigration or customs experience to head the troubled law enforcement agency that handles those issues, prompting sharp criticism from some employee groups, immigration advocates and homeland security experts. The push to appoint Julie Myers to head the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, part of the Department of Homeland Security, comes in the midst of intense debate over the qualifications of department political appointees involved in the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina. Concerns over Myers, 36, were acute enough at a Senate hearing last week that lawmakers asked the nominee to detail during her testimony her postings and to account for her management experience." Sen. George Voinovich "went so far as to tell Myers that her résumé indicates she is not qualified for the job. But Voinovich has since met with Myers and is now likely to support her, his spokeswoman said yesterday. Myers, who has attracted strong support from many former colleagues, told senators that she would draw upon the experiences of ICE veterans in running the agency." Myers said, "I realize that I'm not 80 years old. I have a few gray hairs, more coming, but I will seek to work with those who are knowledgeable in this area, who know more than I do."

DOJ_NMG_0006463

Conflict Looms Between White House, DeLay On Immigration Reform. The Hill (9/20, O'Connor) reports that the White House's "comprehensive immigration overhaul" laid out to congressional Republicans last week is "creating a potential conflict between the administration and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay," a supporter of "an incremental approach to reform. The comprehensive package would increase enforcement on the border, create new workplace requirements for employers and expand guest-worker programs inside and outside the United States." Rep. Jeff Flake said the White House "'insists on comprehensive reform,' putting the president at odds with DeLay and those congressional Republicans who would rather change the current immigration code one law at a time. As recently as last week, DeLay said he would prefer passing a bill to increase border security before taking up legislation to address workplace enforcement or the current guest-worker program."

TAX:

"Survivor" Winner Hatch Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Evasion. The AP (9/20) reports, "Richard Hatch, who won $1 million on the first season of the U.S. reality show 'Survivor,'" pleaded not guilty Monday "to charges that he failed to pay taxes on his winnings and other income." The AP continues, "Hatch has been charged with tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. He entered the plea in U.S. District Court. … A grand jury indictment filed earlier this month said Hatch filed false tax returns for 2000 and 2001 that omitted his income from the CBS show, $327,000 he was paid to co-host a radio show and $28,000 in rent on a property he owns." The AP adds, "Hatch, 44, also was accused of misusing $36,500 from a nonprofit camp he set up. … The former corporate trainer said the 10-count indictment was retribution for his refusal earlier this year to follow through with a plea deal."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Testimony Fuels Conservative Unease. The Hill (9/20, Bolton) reports a "rift has opened between conservatives in the nation's capital and those outside the Washington Beltway over John Roberts and his carefully worded testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week." The split has "divided those on the right who communicate regularly with the White House from conservative activists whose view of Roberts was shaped by the recently completed hearings." The "conservatives who are voicing concerns about Roberts behind the scenes" are "sending a message to President Bush that his next nominee to the Supreme Court should have a clear record and be unafraid to express boldly his or her beliefs. As result, political pressure is growing on Bush to nominate an outspoken conservative to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor." Ironically, "the aspects of Roberts's nomination that have frustrated Senate Democrats and liberal groups trying to inflict political damage on him — specifically the few writings expressing his legal views, and furthermore the reluctance to express those views in Senate hearings — have also frustrated conservatives."

Specter Says He'll Vote For Roberts. Reuters (9/20, Ferraro) reports Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "said on Monday he will vote for John Roberts to be U.S. chief justice even though it is uncertain what the conservative appeals court judge will do on the Supreme Court." Specter said, "It's my judgment that he's well qualified ... and I intend to vote aye when his nomination is called before the Senate." Reuters adds Specter "had been expected to back Roberts."

The Legal Intelligencer (9/20, Blumenthal) reports, "With U.S. Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter announcing his support Monday, the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States gained momentum." The Intelligencer continues, "The Pennsylvania Republican, in a speech on the Senate floor, said 'Judge Roberts' answers demonstrated that he would take a fair, non-ideological approach to the law.' In Specter's view, Roberts had not tipped his hand on whether he would vote to preserve or overturn Supreme Court precedent on a woman's right to end her pregnancy. … 'Notwithstanding his answers and my efforts to glean some realistic expectation from his words and body language, candidly it is not possible to predict or have a solid expectation of what Judge Roberts would do,' he said." The Intelligencer adds, "On Sunday, Specter -- who chaired last week's sometimes contentious confirmation hearings to generally positive reviews -- even suggested that Roberts serve as the template for President Bush's next nomination to the Supreme Court. … But local legal scholars said Bush faces a much tougher fight when he makes his choice for a new associate justice." The Intelligencer notes, "Gregory Magarian, a constitutional law professor at Villanova University School of Law and a former clerk for Justice John Paul Stevens, said Specter managed to run Roberts' hearing equitably. … 'Sen. Specter attempted to go after information but he didn't grandstand and he definitely didn't grease the wheels for him,' Magarian said. … But Magarian and Temple University's Beasley School of Law professor Mark Rahdert, a clerk for former Justice Harry A. Blackmun, both said Roberts' decision to not answer questions dealing with hot-button issues such as abortion could set a precedent for the next nominee. … 'He played that card more than any candidate I have seen in recent memory,' Rahdert said. 'And each time that happens in the future, nominees will have more room to not answer questions. It's one thing if it's an actual case that will wind up before the court. But he can answer questions about an area of the law and he chose not to do so.'"

DOJ_NMG_0006464

Liberal Groups Put Spotlight On Senators With White House Aspirations. The Hill (9/20, Allen) reports a "vote for Judge John Roberts could be well within the mainstream but that may not be where Democrats with an eye on the Oval Office are looking to swim, according to some political strategists and analysts." Democratic consultant Steve McMahon said, "If you're running for president, you need to take a hard look at voting no because that's where the Democratic base is." The Hill adds Democratic senators, "particularly those who harbor presidential aspirations, have plenty of reason to watch each other closely as a floor vote on Roberts's nomination to become chief justice of the United States approaches." Support for Roberts "could burnish a senator's centrist credentials and give room to oppose President Bush's pick to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy. But influential interest groups on the left — a source of strength in Democratic primaries — are pressuring their allies in the Senate to oppose Roberts." When the Roberts "roll call starts, those senators who are viewed as possible contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 — including Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), 2004 nominee John Kerry (Mass.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and perhaps others — will already be under a microscope. That is particularly true of Clinton, who has not publicly revealed her intentions on either Roberts or the 2008 race."

LA Times Urges Democrats To Confirm Roberts. The Los Angeles Times (9/20) editorializes, "As last week's confirmation hearings made clear," John Roberts "is an exceptionally qualified nominee, well within the mainstream of American legal thought, who deserves broad bipartisan support." He should therefore be confirmed as the next chief justice of the United States, and if "a majority of Democrats in the Senate vote against Roberts, they will reveal themselves as nothing more than self-defeating obstructionists."

White House Reportedly Changing Criteria For Second High Court Nominee. The New York Times (9/20, Kirkpatrick, Stolberg) reports the White House is "reshuffling its short list of potential Supreme Court nominees with a new emphasis on finding someone who will hold up under the pressure of what is expected to be fierce confirmation battle, several Republican allies close to the process said on Monday." The "shifting calculus reflects the increased stakes in replacing the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor as the court's swing vote as well as the expectation that the new nominee will be measured against Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who was hailed by both parties for his performance during almost 20 hours of confirmation hearings for the post of chief justice." The shift also "indicates that the administration expects some Democrats' pent-up frustration with what they labeled as Judge Roberts's evasiveness to spill over into the hearings for a new nominee. Republican aides briefed on the search said the White House was looking mainly at female jurists for Justice O'Connor's seat, but it has expanded its short list and it is examining the contenders anew in the expectation of a trial by fire." The "new criteria could hurt the chances of Judge Janice Rogers Brown," because Brown, "an African-American known for her fiery speeches to conservative crowds, might try to fight back against vigorous questioning. Other conservative strategists say that she also lacks experience on the federal bench and that supporting her highly ideological oratory might strain the solidarity of the Senate Republican caucus." Strategists "say the White House is evaluating whether" Judge Priscilla R. Owen's "reticence and mild manner would be a strength or a weakness under interrogation in the Senate." Others "said to remain under consideration include the contenders for the last vacancy, Judge Edith H. Jones and Judge Edith Brown Clement of the Fifth Circuit, as well as Judge Alice M Batchelder of the Sixth Circuit, Judge Karen Williams of the Fourth Circuit and Judge Consuelo M. Callahan of the Ninth Circuit. Judge Callahan, a Republican appointee, is Hispanic, and President Bush has made clear that he would like to name a Hispanic to the court."

USA Today Says Bush Should Appoint Woman Or Minority. USA Today (9/20) says that "with the retirement of"

DOJ_NMG_0006465

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, "the nation's highest court will lose more of a commodity already in very short supply — different life experiences. When President Bush nominates O'Connor's successor, he will have an opportunity to remedy that, and it should be a priority." In a "nation as diverse as America, a diversity of ideas and perspectives adds to the court's ability to wisely decide issues that change lives. If all nine justices see law and life from the same vantage point, their ideas will not be challenged, tested and honed into the best possible rulings." To those who "argue that merit and legal scholarship should be the only standards, the answer is it's easy to name a minority or female justice without compromising excellence or creating quotas."

Attorney Argues Merit Should Be Only Qualification. In a USA Today op-ed (9/20), Chicago attorney Thomas Heiden says, "The next nominee for the court should be chosen on the basis of merit (and not 'diversity,' however defined) for several important reasons: To maintain a bright line difference between law and politics. To re-emphasize that the function of the highest court is to maintain the rule of law. So that the court does not become an extension of our increasingly divided political culture, but that it stands as the independent counterweight to those influences." To "nominate a justice because he or she is a member of a group obviously signals that his or her decisions in certain cases will be influenced by membership in that group. To do so misperceives the court as a legislature and the justices as legislators."

Debate Grows Over Paying For Katrina Reconstruction. As cost estimates for Hurricane Katrina reconstruction increase, so does the volume of the debate over how to finance it. Some conservative Republicans are chafing at the prospects of a bloated Federal deficit, while Democrats have called for the elimination or reduction of the President's tax cuts.

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 5, 2:05, Gregory) reported, "The true cost of Katrina is only beginning to sink in: A $200 billion estimate, at least for reconstruction, much of it to be paid by taxpayers. That's on top of the roughly $200 billion taxpayers have already spent in Iraq to date. Conservatives are getting fed up, openly complaining about the return of big government under George W. Bush." Chris Edwards, Cato Institute: "We may never see a balanced budget in our lifetimes again if the President continues spending like this." Gregory: "Again today the White House warned that Katrina will swell the $333 billion deficit but so far has not asked Americans for any sizeable sacrifice." Some Republicans in Congress "are looking to cut costs. One target, the President's $700 billion prescription drug benefit for seniors set to hit the books next year." Sen. John McCain: "Let's go back to square one. $700 billion already on a broken entitlement program isn't going to work." Gregory: "Democrats have called on the President to roll back his tax cuts, something he's said he won't do."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 4, 2:30, Borger) reported, "McCain never liked the expensive prescription drug benefit in the first place, and now he tells us he wants Congress to kill it to help pay for Katrina and the war." McCain: "We've got to go back and look at the Medicare prescription. It was supposed to cost $400 billion. It's now up to $700 billion. Cancel it, go back to square one, and get prescription drugs to the truly needy."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 6, 2:00, Taibbi) reported, "Even in 'red state' Oklahoma, Republican politicians aren't convinced that on a national level, the party's figured the specifics about how to pay for the recovery. Sen. Tom Coburn says maybe this isn't the time to make President Bush's tax cuts permanent, or to fund all those pork barrel projects costing hundreds of millions." Sen. Tom Coburn: "This is a moral question. It's not just an economic question."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Chaddock) reports that the President's "call to spend 'whatever it takes' to rebuild the Gulf Coast set off alarm bells among some in his conservative base -- and stepped up a growing debate among Republicans at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue on how to fix the battered region in ways that promote conservative values. From vouchers for education and Medicaid to the creation of a giant 'opportunity zone' where Katrina struck, the Bush reconstruction effort -- which he called 'one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen' -- is reviving prospects for policy initiatives that GOP leaders say could make or break their party's future." But fiscal conservatives, "often outside of leadership, are calling for deep cuts in existing spending to pay the costs of reconstruction. They, too, see this as a fight for the soul of the Republican Party."

Cost Of Medicare Prescription Drug Program In Spotlight. The Washington Times (9/20, Lambro, Fagan) reports, "Some House and Senate members want President Bush to postpone his Medicare prescription-drug program to help pay for Hurricane Katrina relief as the fight over the deficit and the cost of rebuilding heats up. By targeting the Medicare program, which Congress passed in 2003 despite objections from some conservatives, the lawmakers are striking right at Mr. Bush's signature first-term domestic-policy achievement."

Roll Call (9/20, Bresnahan) reports that Republican Study Committee Chairman Rep. Mike Pence "said Congress must do something to rein in federal spending, even more now that the Gulf Coast recovery effort will add tens of billions of dollars to the federal budget. Pence vowed to continue to push for a vote on delaying implementation of the Medicare drug program, despite White House opposition." Pence said, "With all due respect to the White House and their intentions,

DOJ_NMG_0006466

House conservatives will vigorously pursue the one-year delay in the Medicare prescription drug entitlement."

Possible Greenspan Successor Sees "Modest" Economic Damage From Katrina. Reuters (9/20) reports that according to Glenn Hubbard, "who is cited as a possible candidate to head the U.S. Federal Reserve," economic damage from Katrina "is likely to be modest, making the case for huge government aid questionable. … In a Financial Times commentary on Monday, Hubbard said that federal fiscal aid should be used to cushion the blow to business and consumer confidence from a nasty regional shock. But overall the short-term hit to unemployment and production is likely to be modest, offset by rebuilding over the coming year, and long-term damage to energy supplies also seems unlikely."

Consultants Suggest Politicians "Tithe" For Relief From Campaign Funds. In a Los Angeles Times (9/20) op-ed, Gerald Rafshoon and Doug Bailey, the "opposing advertising consultants in the Carter-Ford presidential campaign in 1976," write, "Members of Congress have voted more than $60 billion in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, with the total estimated to eventually go as high as $200 billion. But that's (mostly) your money. What about their campaign money? … Washington should call a 90-day moratorium on campaign fundraising, and both parties -- and all congressional incumbents -- should tithe from their campaign funds for Katrina relief. That means 10% of their war chests should go to hurricane relief, or they should raise that amount and donate it to the relief effort instead of collecting still more for the 2006 campaign battles. While we're at it, how about extending the moratorium to political action committees and lobbyists and asking them to take what they have budgeted for the politicians and give it to Katrina relief instead."

Bush Proposes School Vouchers For All Displaced Students. The Washington Post (9/20, A8, Goldstein) reports that President Bush is proposing school vouchers for all students displaced by Katrina. The plan would let parents "enroll their children in a private or religious school this year at federal expense, even if they had gone to public schools back home, administration officials said yesterday." As the "new fine print of the proposal emerged, White House and Education Department spokesmen confirmed that the government payment -- as much as $7,500 per child -- would be given for a year to any displaced family that now prefers an alternative to public schools."

New Orleans Students, Teachers Face Tough Transition. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 14, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "For the students and teachers of New Orleans' schools, it is a tough transition getting beyond the devastation and back to education." CBS (Cowan) added, "The devastation of New Orleans is already in the history books, quite literally in classrooms all across the city. The desks, chairs, the children's artwork, even their report cards, were all lost to the rising water. This is the fate suffered by more than 186,000 school kids all across Louisiana. They'll all have to be moved to a new school -- new friends, new teachers. That in and of itself would be stressful enough, but imagine that on top of everything else that they've seen."

Affirmative Action Requirement For Some Katrina Contractors Suspended. The New York Times (9/20, Glater) reports the Labor Department "has temporarily suspended government requirements that its contractors have an affirmative action plan addressing the employment of women, members of minorities, Vietnam veterans and the disabled if the companies are first-time government contractors working on reconstruction in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." While employment lawyers "said it was not clear how strong an impact the exemption would have, the move comes as President Bush has tried to address the perception of unfairness in the government's response to the hurricane." The "goal of the exemption in the case of recovery work associated with Hurricane Katrina is to reduce the burden of paperwork on government contractors and so encourage more companies to jump into assisting with rebuilding from the storm damage. The exemption is to last for three months, unless it is extended."

Black Ministers Say Bush's Outreach Since Katrina Undoing Political Damage. Under the headline "Storm Strains Bush's Ties to Black Clergy," the Los Angeles Times (9/20, Wallsten, Hamburger) reports that for "many of the black ministers who have allied themselves with President Bush and a Republican strategy to boost the party's African American support, the government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina put a severe strain on new and still-fragile bonds of trust." But "just as some ministers had begun denouncing a government recovery effort that seemed to leave many blacks in the Gulf region behind, a number of those African American clergy say an aggressive outreach campaign by Bush and senior White House aides in recent days has begun reversing what might have been lasting political damage." In addition, the ministers and the "cadre of conservative policy analysts who consult with the White House" suggest that the "Katrina relief response, while tarnishing the GOP image in the short term, could foster a Republican-led battle against poverty that would give the party a list of new selling points for African American voters."

Several columns in today's opinion pages explore issues of race and social class, and their impact on the Katrina recovery efforts. In his Washington Post (9/20, A23) column, headlined "Incompetence, Not Racism," Richard Cohen writes, "If you told me that George W. Bush is a dummy, I would argue with you but understand why you thought so: all those idiotic statements. But if you told me, as some have been implying, that Bush is a racist or that he doesn't care about black people, I would not only say that you're wrong but add, 'Not the George Bush I know.' … In his first presidential campaign, I traveled with him and tried, as he might say, to look into his heart. Conveniently enough, he sometimes wears it on his sleeve -- never more so, as I discovered, than when he talks about poor kids and racial and ethnic minorities. His feelings for them -- especially for poor kids -- are genuine. … In general it was incompetence, not racism, that slowed the relief effort -- incompetence on the local and state levels, too, and incompetence on the part of black as well as white public officials."

DOJ_NMG_0006467

In his Washington Post (9/20, A23) column, E.J. Dionne Jr. writes, "If the rebuilding of New Orleans is to be something other than a new government disaster, a coalition of the skeptical and the visionary will have to stand together and confront the lobbyists and the corporate welfare artists. Fiscal conservatives in Congress are right to worry about the potential for -- yes -- waste, fraud and abuse if the federal government throws off tens of billions of dollars into a haphazard and ill-planned spending fest. … But because the rest of us are morally obligated to those whose lives have been damaged by natural calamity and government failure, it's a fact that the federal government will be spending a lot of money. That's why the fiscal conservatives need the visionaries."

Donna Brazile echoes that sentiment in her Roll Call (9/20) column, "One of the most difficult conversations I have endured in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is the discussion about race and poverty. … Katrina was an equal opportunity destroyer. She did not care whether you owned a home on the lakefront or rented an apartment in the 'projects.' This monster hurricane uprooted big elm trees and oak trees that lined our historic neighborhoods as though they were toothpicks." Brazile adds, "In the aftermath of all this destruction, Congress should hold a series of hearings that allow the victims to tell their stories to determine how to help them get a fresh start. … Based on my experience, the worst part of being a member of the chronic poor or the working poor is the uncertainty about how to maneuver the system. Add race to this equation, and you have a recipe for hopelessness."

Fueled By Katrina Aftermath, Bush Disapproval Rating Hits Record High In Gallup Poll. USA Today (9/20, Page) reports that President Bush's disapproval rating is increasing "in the wake of dismay over the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, the course of the Iraq war and the future of the economy." While Bush's overall approval rating in the latest USA Today/CNN/Gallup Poll "is 40%, equaling a previous low," his "disapproval is 58%, a new high." And by a "record 66%-31%, independents disapprove of the job Bush is doing as president. White House press secretary Scott McClellan says the president 'knows a leader must govern based on what he believes is right, not based on polls.' Bush is 'working to address the priorities that Americans are most concerned about,' he says."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/19, Malveaux) commented on the poll. Bush "will be back in the hurricane-damaged regions again tomorrow. That will be his fifth trip. And the latest poll shows that 58% believe that the President has been going for political reasons. They do not believe that he sincerely cares about the victims."

Government Forced To Look To Contractors With "Checkered Histories." The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Dreazen) reports on Texas ambulance provider GoldStar EMS, which "was on the ropes earlier this year, beset by legal problems." After Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast and the company won a subcontract from a government contractor to provide up to 45 ambulances a day in hurricane-damaged Louisiana. The contract "illustrates one of the unintended consequences of what is shaping up to be the largest government rebuilding effort in U.S. history. As the Bush administration rushes to rebuild Louisiana, it faces the prospect of turning to companies with checkered histories that even include disputes with other arms of the government. It's essentially a no-win situation: If officials don't get quick results, they're likely to be criticized for getting bogged down in bureaucracy. But if they push some of the contracting formalities aside, they may find themselves employing unreliable or unsavory companies."

Contractors Seek Protection From Liability. Some contractors working on the Katrina relief effort want Congress to limit their liability from lawsuits. The Washington Post (9/20, A7, Merle) reports that the contractors are "drafting legislation to seek such protection, industry officials said yesterday." The companies "have become concerned about the liability issue because of lawsuits filed against construction firms that helped clean up the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks."

Hill GOP Drops Plans For Joint Katrina Probe. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Curtius) reports, "Congressional Republicans signaled today that they have abandoned their plan to conduct a joint House-Senate probe of the government's response to Hurricane Katrina. In announcing a joint probe this month, the Republican leadership had said it would be the most efficient way to investigate the administration's much-criticized initial response to the hurricane. But today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) conceded that he could not overcome Democratic opposition to a joint investigation." The Democratic leadership "has refused to appoint members to a joint committee, citing the lack of equal representation of Democrats on the panel, and the lack of power to issue subpoenas that the majority opposed. Democrats also have insisted on an independent inquiry."

DOJ_NMG_0006468

Partisanship, Bureaucracy Blamed For Poor Congressional Response. In a USA Today (9/20) op-ed, Rutgers University political scientist Ross K. Baker writes, "In a well-ordered world, a calamity of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina ought to be the subject of a congressional investigation. From the earliest days of the republic, the House of Representatives and Senate had unquestioned responsibility for probing and, yes, finger-pointing in calamities' aftermath. That, sadly, is no longer true. Congress has fallen victim to a number of problems that have caused Americans to look elsewhere for answers. The first of these problems is the fractious spirit of partisanship that has so infected Capitol Hill that no conclusion Congress might reach about who was responsible for the botched response to Katrina would have much legitimacy in the eyes of Americans. … But it is more than partisanship that has impeded Congress' ability to avert or probe causes of disasters. The perverse arrangement of committees supervising agencies responsible for disaster relief also impairs the lawmakers."

With Rita Looming, New Orleans Mayor Backs Off Repopulation Effort. With Tropical Storm Rita headed into the Gulf Coast, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin relented in his efforts to repopulate the city amid fears that the city's weakened levee system would fail if hit by even a much weaker storm. Before Mayor Nagin changed course, President Bush weighed in on the issue, urging great caution in encouraging a return to the city. Virtually all of the media coverage notes that Mayor Nagin was under "growing political pressure from federal leaders" to halt the return, as the Washington Post (9/20, A1, Connolly) characterized the situation in a front page story.

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 2, 3:35, Gibson) reported, "This morning, President Bush stated what everyone is worried about, with another storm in the offing." President Bush: "There is deep concern about this storm causing more flooding in New Orleans. If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break. And so, therefore, we're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history." Gibson: "And so late today, the Mayor of New Orleans changed his mind, agreeing now with Federal authorities that it's too dangerous to let people back into the city." ABC (Woodruff) added, "With word that Rita could be approaching, the Mayor suddenly reversed course, suspending the return plan and ordering residents to leave."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 3, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "Federal officials had been telling the New Orleans Mayor he was moving too quickly to reopen the city, and today's news that a new storm is headed his way apparently convinced him they were right." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "Critics called" Nagin's "aggressive timetable a political pipe dream, and today it went up in smoke." With "mounting political pressure from the President, another storm headed to the Gulf, and reports that just six inches of rain could make the city levee break again, a once-confident Mayor did a complete 180."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 4, 2:25, Tibbles) reported, "The advance of another storm now has everyone, including the Mayor, in agreement that people should stay out of here for a while." Mayor Ray Nagin "says if Rita hits New Orleans, the pump stations won't be able to handle the rush of water." At the White House, "the President was even more blunt, laying out a worst-case scenario." President Bush: "If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break." Now, residents "are being told to get ready for another hurricane, and the governor insists evacuation orders will be followed." Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) Louisiana: "Well, there will be a mandatory evacuation, and I do believe that 100% of the people will listen this time."

USA Today (9/20, Parker, Levin) reports Mayor Nagin "reversed his call for people to return to the city and ordered most people out over worries that a new tropical storm could flood the city again." The announcement "came after President Bush and the federal government's Hurricane Katrina response team urged the mayor to reconsider his plans, saying the city was not safe." Earlier in the day, Nagin "had criticized Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen for publicly imploring him to stop people from returning. He called Allen a 'good man' but said, 'There's only one mayor of New Orleans, and I'm it.'"

The New York Times (9/20, Yardley) reports Nagin "called for a 'mandatory' evacuation of many of the residents who have returned or never left." The mayor "reversed himself hours after Mr. Bush had questioned whether it was safe for residents to return. The president reiterated warnings by Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, leader of the federal recovery effort, that the levee system was weakened, that the 911 emergency telephone system was not working, that the hospitals remained closed and that pollutants were in the air and water."

The AP (9/20, Loven) reports President Bush, "criticized for weeks for failing to react aggressively enough to Hurricane Katrina," yesterday "put some muscle behind concerns that a new tropical storm could again deluge New Orleans and the people being allowed to return to the ruined city. It worked. Six hours after Bush questioned New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's plan to bring as many as a third of the city's population back over the next week, Nagin reversed course and said he was suspending it." Besides the President's "public words, White House chief of staff Andrew

DOJ_NMG_0006469

Card pressed the point on the phone with Nagin. And Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, head of the federal government's hurricane response, delivered federal officials' concerns to Nagin later Monday — after appearing on numerous TV shows to express dismay with the city plan."

The AP (9/20, Rubinkam) reports Mayor Nagin's announcement "came after repeated warnings from top federal officials — and the president himself — that New Orleans was not safe enough to reopen. Among other things, Federal officials warned that Tropical Storm Rita could breach the city's temporarily patched-up levees and swamp the city all over again." The Washington Times (9/20) also reported the AP story.

Knight Ridder (9/20, Estwick, Nesmith, Frazier) reports that within "about an hour of" Nagin's announcement, "security tightened in several parts of the city." Nagin said "the hurricane was not providing him an excuse to follow the advice of federal officials, and pledged to resume his plan as soon as Rita's danger has passed."

The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Gold, Rosenblatt, Vartabedian) reports, "According to government forecasts Monday night, the storm could land anywhere from northern Mexico to Mississippi. But Nagin said his advisers had determined Rita most likely would strike near the island community of Galveston, Texas -- where authorities were planning evacuations starting Tuesday afternoon -- or pass to the west of New Orleans."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Brooks, Dade) reports yesterday's "announcement by the mayor was a major setback in efforts to bring life back to New Orleans, about 15% of which still is underwater three weeks after Katrina barreled past the city." Mr. Nagin "denied that criticism from the White House had anything to do with his reversal."

The Washington Times (9/20, Sammon) reports the "latest in a long line of disputes among local, state and federal officials over Hurricane Katrina was defused yesterday when New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin called off reopening the city, although he cited another storm for his capitulation rather than federal officials' litany of concerns." The "various levels of government have disagreed over when to call in federal troops and whether the entire operation should be federalized. They also have clashed over when and how to evacuate New Orleans and when to let residents return."

USA Today (9/20, Kelley, Dorell) reports "hundreds of residents of the city's Algiers section who returned to their homes Monday only to be told by Mayor Ray Nagin to be prepared to evacuate again as early as Wednesday because of Tropical Storm Rita." The Algiers area, "across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter and downtown, never flooded during Katrina and now has electricity and water service to most homes. Nagin announced last week that Algiers residents could begin returning Monday. However, hundreds ignored pre-storm evacuation orders and never left or have already returned." For some, the mayor's "abrupt reversal was another disheartening example of what they said was a disorganized and inept local response to Katrina."

Rita is expected to strengthen to hurricane strength and move west into the Gulf, with a small potential to hit the battered Southern states. USA Today (9/20, Brook) reports "Tropical Storm Rita was expected to become a hurricane and slam the Florida Keys today, then gather strength and threaten the entire Gulf Coast." Yesterday, "Rita was still a tropical storm late Monday with winds of 70 mph, but the National Weather Service predicted it would be a Category 2 hurricane today with winds of 100 mph as it closed in on the Keys."

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, lead story, 3:05, Gibson) reported Tropical Storm Rita is "the latest in a long list of storms that have made this hurricane season unprecedented, cruel and relentless. In many parts of the Florida Keys, there is a mandatory evacuation order in effect tonight." ABC (Kerley) added, "Call it the Katrina effect, the hospital that serves Key West is shut down tonight. An Air Force C-130 airlifted patients to safety. As this latest storm approached, shelters were closed and those unable to flee were bussed to Miami." Ed Rappaport, National Hurricane Center Deputy Director: "We're looking at further strengthening and likely a major hurricane in the central to western Gulf of Mexico by later in the week." Kerley: "That means Louisiana, just battered by Hurricane Katrina could be hit again."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, lead story, 2:45, Schieffer) reported, "If projections hold, it could slam into a wide area of the Gulf Coast, the area that includes New Orleans and some of the heaviest-hit areas of Mississippi." CBS (Strassmann) added, "With memories of all that misery so fresh, and Rita on the way, evacuation was an easy sell for many people in the Florida Keys." NBC Nightly News (9/19, lead story, 3:15, Karins) reported, "Right now Houston is in the center of Rita's crosshairs, but everyone along the Texas and Louisiana coast should watch this one closely. As for New Orleans, a sharper northerly turn would mean at a minimum extremely heavy rain and a possible storm surge that once again could overwhelm that broken city."

The Washington Post (9/20, A3, Branigin) reports, "Rita is 'not an exact reprise' of Katrina, 'but it's probably pretty close,' said Frank Lepore, a spokesman for the National Hurricane Center in Miami. 'It's got similar characteristics, except it's just a little lower in latitude. The issue is what happens when it gets out over the very warm waters of the central Gulf.'"

Allen Says Officials Are Planning For Possibility Of Rita Touching New Orleans. Vice Admiral Thad Allen was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (9/19) about the approach of

Tropical Storm Rita. Allen said, "We already had a tenuous situation in New Orleans with the infrastructure in the city being so badly damaged, and we know we have weakened levees. This storm is nothing to mess with. I had a meeting this afternoon with the governor of Louisiana, Governor Blanco and Russ Honore, who is my counterpart in DOD. And we're all actively planning contingencies right now and preparing for if this storm even brushes close to New Orleans." Allen added that "we need to keep a close watch on this and be prepared to evacuate click quickly if we need to do that."

Coast Guard Response To Katrina Lauded. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 11, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "The rest of the Federal government may have fumbled on Hurricane Katrina, but if there is one true thing to say, it is that the US Coast Guard came through with flying colors, among other things rescuing 33,000 people." CBS (Orr) added, "While FEMA and local officials exchanged blame for a sluggish response, there were heroes at work," like "Coast Guard pilot Dan Taylor. In four days, his chopper crew saved 50 people." Unlike "many other Federal agencies, the Coast Guard was able to cut through bureaucratic red tape with a simple philosophy: Act first and get permission later. Crews on the scene assessed the needs and the risks in an urban danger zone." Former Coast Guard commander Stephen Flynn "says FEMA and other agencies need to build on the Coast Guard's success."

Red Cross Criticized Over Katrina Response. The New York Times (9/20, Strom, Robertson) reports that "in New Orleans and the coastal flood plains of Mississippi, many people are complaining that the American Red Cross was missing in their worst hours of need and are worried that its billowing relief fund may bypass them entirely. The organization did not open shelters in flood-prone areas and was therefore unable to provide food and other necessities to people closest to the coast" hit by Katrina. The Times adds that "even some volunteers are disgusted. 'I will never, ever wear the Red Cross vest again,' said Betty Brunner, who started volunteering in 1969 when Hurricane Camille destroyed her house. … Time and again in past disasters, the Red Cross has raised more money than it has needed for relief. It has also been less than clear in the past about where its money goes, and it has rarely shared its money with other organizations that tackle long-term needs of victims."

Red Cross Chief To Brief Lawmakers Today. The Hill (9/20) reports American Red Cross President/CEO Marty Evans "will brief lawmakers today on the organization's recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region."

Wal-Mart Response To Hurricane Katrina Praised. In a New York Times column (9/20), John Tierney says, "If President Bush feels compelled to put someone in charge of rebuilding the Gulf Coast, let me suggest a name: Lee Scott." Scott is the "chief executive of Wal-Mart, one of the few institutions to improve its image here after Katrina sent a 15-foot wave across the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain." If you "visit the Wal-Mart and the Sam's Club stores here, you hear shoppers who have been without power for weeks marveling that there are still generators in stock (and priced at $304.04). You hear about the trucks that rolled in right after the hurricane and the stuff the stores gave away: chain saws and boots for rescue workers, sheets and clothes for shelters, water and ice for the public." That's the "same assessment you hear from public officials in Louisiana, and there's even been talk of letting Wal-Mart take over FEMA's job. The company already has its own emergency operations center, where dozens of people began preparing for the hurricane the week before it hit by moving supplies and trucks into position."

Kerry, Edwards Criticize Administration Response To Katrina. In separate speeches yesterday, Sen. John Kerry and former Sen. John Edwards criticized the Bush Administration's response to Hurricane Katrina. Reuters (9/20, Whitesides) reports that Kerry and Edwards "said the administration's inadequate response to the hurricane revealed a failure of competence and values, while the public outpouring of support for storm victims showed Americans wanted more from their government." Kerry "said the storm created 'a rare accountability moment' when not just the administration but all Americans could take stock of the country's direction." Edwards "introduced a series of proposals to build opportunities for the poorest Americans, including 'work bonds' to expand the earned income tax credit for the poor, a savings plan to help families buy a home, an increase in the minimum wage and programs to make college more affordable."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Blitzer) reported that Kerry accused Republicans "of turning the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast into 'a vast laboratory for right wing ideological experiments.' And former Vice Presidential Nominee John Edwards arguing, 'the administration views every American as an island' and so he contends it left Katrina victims to fend for themselves."

The Washington Post (9/20, A4, Balz) says that while both of the former running mates offered "withering criticism" of the Administration's handling of the disaster, Kerry's speech "was harsher by far, and it drew a sharp rebuttal from the Republican National Committee's Tracey Schmitt. 'Armchair-quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry,' she said. 'Such tactics haven't served him well in the past, and today is no exception.'"

DOJ_NMG_0006471

The Hill (9/20, Allen) calls Kerry's remarks "a furious attack on the Bush administration. … In a brief interview, Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, called Kerry's pitch for cash 'repulsive.'"

Ronald Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/20), "Monday's speeches offered a reminder that Kerry and Edwards, rivals during the 2004 Democratic primaries, could find themselves competing for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination."

MoveOn Ad Criticizes Federal Response To Katrina. CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Blitzer) reported, "A new ad accusing President Bush of failing to make America safer after 9/11, and it points to the federal response to Katrina as evidence. The spot by the liberal interest group MoveOn.org begins airing tomorrow on CNN and on cable stations here in Washington and in New York. The Republican National Committee dismissing the ad as 'MoveOn's latest shameless political attack.'"

Confirmed Louisiana Death Toll Reaches 736, Number Of Missing Children Increasing. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 2, 0:10, Schieffer) reported, "90 more victims were added to the hurricane death toll in Louisiana today, bringing it to 736."

Meanwhile, CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Todd) reported that at the hotline set up to help hurricane victims locate missing loved ones, "for the 15th straight day…the numbers of missing children has gone up. The latest numbers that we were just handed, 2,393 at this hour, are still listed as missing. But there are many success stories, as well. Eight hundred and 83 cases have been resolved by the volunteers," who "have been working 16 hours a day. Many more yet to resolve, however."

Six Arrested For Using Internet To Lure Displaced Kids. CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/19, Zahn) reported, "Louisiana attorney general today announced six people have been arrested for allegedly using the Internet to entice and sexually exploit Louisiana children when they were displaced by Hurricane Katrina."

Louisiana AG Begins Probe Of 14 Nursing Home Deaths. Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti has launched an investigation into 14 deaths at a New Orleans nursing home which occurred after the elderly residents had not evacuated before Hurricane Katrina. USA Today (9/20, Frank) reports that Foti's office "has been besieged with complaints about patients being left at medical facilities during the hurricane or receiving shoddy treatment, said Kris Wartelle, a spokeswoman for Foti. She said state investigators are checking additional reports of patients and residents who died at 20 to 30 other hospitals and nursing homes. The nursing home under investigation was identified as Lafon Nursing Facility of the Holy Family in New Orleans. … Wartelle said Foti's office is 'close' to beginning probes into two hospitals where numerous other patients died. She identified them as Memorial Medical Center and Lindy Boggs Medical Center, both in New Orleans."

Hospital's Behavior In Wake Of Katrina Draws Fire. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Riccardi, Barry) reports on Charlene Gonzalez, a nurse in Chalmette, Louisiana. Gonzalez "wanted to get out of town before Hurricane Katrina hit, but because she was a nurse at the only hospital in this low-lying waterside town, she would lose her job if she did not stay at her post." The Times adds that "after Gonzalez, her husband and more than 100 other employees and their families spent days trapped by rising floodwaters, the Pennsylvania-based corporation that owns Chalmette Medical Center, Universal Health Services, told its employees that they could count on only two more weeks of pay." Officials at UHS "say the anger is understandable after such a catastrophe, but they contend they did everything they could for their patients and employees. They say they tried to evacuate their hospital -- albeit at least a day after emergency officials say they urged it -- but that it was too late to get all the patients out."

Illegal Immigrants Avoid Hurricane Aid From Federal Government. The Washington Post (9/20, A6, Fears) reports, "Much has been said about the suffering of the poor in New Orleans, but Latino civil rights advocates and relief workers say those troubled Americans are better off than immigrants who live in Gulf states illegally, working in restaurants, casinos, farms and construction. Some have managed to get into shelters run by the Red Cross and Catholic Charities, which provide food and medical care, no questions asked. But when U.S. citizens in those shelters flock to cardboard tables where FEMA, Social Security and Internal Revenue Service agents sit, Latinos stay behind, watching from their cots, relief workers said. The Department of Homeland Security recently announced that information provided by illegal immigrants seeking federal aid could be used against them later in deportation proceedings."

Katrina Aftermath Said To Highlight Need For Clean Water. In a Washington Post op-ed (9/20, A23), Jan Eliasson, former Swedish ambassador to the United States and president of the United Nations General Assembly, and retired Rear Admiral Susan Blumenthal, a physician, say, "In the United States and Europe, people take it for granted that when they turn on their taps, clean water will flow out. But for those living in U.S. cities devastated by Hurricane Katrina, as in large parts of the world, obtaining safe water requires a constant struggle." Ensuring "access to safe water worldwide is imperative." But "most of all, water is a fundamental global health issue. Unsafe water and sanitation is now the single largest cause of illness worldwide, just as it has been a major threat to the health of people affected by Hurricane Katrina." If "action is not taken now, 135 million people could die of water-related diseases by the year 2020. That is a larger number than those expected to fall victim to the HIV/AIDS pandemic, a catastrophe that has already killed 23 million people worldwide."

DOJ_NMG_0006472

High Court Could Have Cameras Under Grassley Bill. Roll Call (9/20, Mcardle) reports, "For the past 20 years, every time a vacancy arises in the Supreme Court, C-SPAN General Counsel Bruce Collins is teased by the possibility that new blood on the bench might mean the highest court in the land would reconsider its stance on allowing cameras into its halls. … But while Collins waits, hoping the court's two new justices will allow proceedings to be televised, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee is ready to force the matter." Roll Call continues, "According to a GOP Congressional source close to the issue, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) — who has said that Congress legally has authority over court administration issues — intends to drop new legislation, possibly as early as this week, that will push for opening the Supreme Court to television cameras. … Specter had discussed the possibility of a bill at last week's hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice when the issue was brought up by Members on both sides of the aisle." Roll Call adds, "On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) pointedly asked Roberts if he was against cameras in the courtroom 'like Justice [William] Rehnquist was.' … 'Well, you know, my new best friend, [former] Sen. [Fred] Thompson [R-Tenn.], assures me that television cameras are nothing to be afraid of,' Roberts responded. 'But I don't have a set view on that. I do think it's something that I would want to listen to the views of — if I were confirmed — to my colleagues.'" Roll Call notes, "For the past four years, Grassley and several other Senate co-sponsors have been pushing the Sunshine in the Courtroom Act. The bill, which was reintroduced to the 109th Congress in April, would give full discretion to the presiding judge of a case as to whether cameras or recording devices would be allowed during proceedings in federal trial and appellate courts, including the Supreme Court. In appellate courts, the most senior active judge — the chief justice in the case of the Supreme Court — would have discretion on the issue."

Senate Set To Vote On Drug Reimportation. The Senate is set to vote on language that would ease access to prescription drugs imported from abroad. The Hill (9/20, Young) reports that the vote, which could occur during consideration of the agriculture-appropriations bill currently on the Senate floor, would fulfill "a promise made by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in July." Sen. David Vitter "has proposed an amendment to the agriculture spending bill that would block the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) from preventing people from importing prescription medicines. The language was introduced Thursday but had not been placed in the queue for a vote by press time yesterday. Frist hopes to wrap up the agriculture bill by the middle or end of this week, according to a spokesperson. … As part of an agreement with Vitter, Frist vowed to permit the amendment as a test vote for Senate support of relaxing restrictions on consumers' obtaining drugs at lower prices from countries such as Canada that use price controls to hold down the cost of medicines."

Social Security Reform Appears To Be Dead In Senate. Roll Call (9/20, Pierce) says that "there appear to be plenty of Republicans on Capitol Hill these days who are willing to serve as pallbearers" for President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security. With "last week's revelation that National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) thinks that voting on a Social Security overhaul would be political suicide for House Republicans in 2006, Senate leaders are doing little to quell a notion, floated by Reynolds, that any measure offering personal investment accounts under the government's retirement security program would be dead on arrival in the Senate." Roll Call adds, "Though Reynolds and others fear the repercussions of voting on Social Security at the ballot box, the crisis management in Washington over the botched recovery from Katrina is providing Republican leaders with a handy excuse for sidelining Social Security for the rest of this Congress."

Voinovich Offers Social Security Lock Box Legislation. The Washington Times (9/20, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, said yesterday that Social Security personal-account proposals aren't going anywhere this year, but that Congress should pass legislation to lock away federal trust funds, including Social Security dollars, to ensure government can't spend them. Mr. Voinovich introduced a bill that would require all specially designated government revenue, including Social Security, be saved for those purposes and not spent on other programs." Voinovich "said overall Social Security reform will not happen this year with other issues, such as hurricane-relief efforts, dominating the agenda."

FDA Denies Naming Alderson Acting Director Of Women's Office. The Washington Post (9/20, A21, Kaufman) reports, "One week ago, the Office of Women's Health of the Food and Drug Administration sent an e-mail notice to women's groups and others announcing the appointment of Norris Alderson as its new acting director. … Three days after the Alderson announcement, the FDA main press office sent out a very different announcement. It said that 20-year FDA veteran Theresa A. Toigo would be the new acting director of the women's health office, and that she would be a champion for women's health inside and outside the agency. Alderson -- and the statement announcing his appointment -- was never mentioned. Asked yesterday who exactly was running the office, FDA spokeswoman Suzanne Trevino said that Alderson had never been appointed acting director. She said that Toigo would take over from the departed Wood, and that her office knew nothing about the statement regarding Alderson, who is the agency's associate commissioner for science. … The seeming mystery thickened when several women's groups said that not only did they receive e-mails announcing Alderson's appointment, but also that he was also listed on a Health and Human Services directory last week as the acting director of the office. In addition, people who have spoken with women's health office staff said that Alderson was introduced to the staff last week as the new acting director, and that he even had some one-on-one discussions with staff members about future plans."

DOJ_NMG_0006473

New FDA Chief Counsel Keeps Predecessor's Industry-Friendly Policies In Place. The Legal Times (9/20, Henning) reports, "Sheldon Bradshaw arrived at the Food and Drug Administration without the baggage lugged around by his predecessor. … The previous chief counsel at the FDA, Daniel Troy, was pilloried by critics who slammed his close ties to the drug industry. Troy made a name for himself suing the agency on behalf of drug and tobacco companies before moving to the government agency early in the Bush administration." The Times continues, "Bradshaw, who came to the FDA as chief counsel from the Justice Department in April, has escaped that kind of scrutiny, largely because he hasn't had those corporate relationships. But that doesn't necessarily mean a new day has dawned. … In fact, despite Troy's return to the private sector, his controversial legal policies remain in force at the agency. Like Troy, Bradshaw offers one-on-one meetings with the companies regulated by the agency, has kept low the number of warnings issued to companies violating regulations, and, perhaps most notably, has continued to intervene on behalf of drug companies in private civil lawsuits." The Times adds, "Last week, Bradshaw signed off on a brief agreeing with Pfizer Inc.'s claim that three years ago the FDA would not have allowed the drug company to warn consumers about a link between suicidal behavior and the use of its best-selling antidepressant, Zoloft, by adolescents, an argument Pfizer is using to ward off liability. … That approach and a lighter regulatory hand put the public at risk, consumer and public health advocates complain. And even some in the drug and medical-device industries find the regulatory regime under Troy, and now Bradshaw, discomforting, claiming that without strong FDA oversight, companies are being hauled into court more frequently by state attorneys general and private plaintiffs."

NASA Unveils Plans For Return To Moon. The New York Times (9/20, Leary) reports that Michael D. Griffin, NASA's "new administrator, detailed a $104 billion plan that he said would get astronauts to the Moon by 2018, serve as a steppingstone to Mars and beyond, and stay within NASA's existing budget." Coverage of Grifinn's press conference ran in print and electronic media outlets across the United States and abroad. The two most prevalent facts making headlines were the $104 billion expected cost of the effort and Griffin's language as he referred to the story as "Apollo on steroids."

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 10, 2:10, Gibson) said the plans "almost seem like back to the future. The goal would be to go back to the moon and then on to Mars. The vehicles to get there look a bit like the old Apollo program, abandoned decades ago for the shuttle. Indeed, NASA's chief called it Apollo on steroids." Meantime, the CBS Evening News (9/19, story 12, 2:10, Schieffer) reported, "The pressure may be on to cut Federal programs, but NASA today announced a huge new program, a $104 billion plan to go back to the moon. The question is, will it ever fly now that the Gulf Coast must be rebuilt?" CBS (Andrews) added, "It will take Americans to the moon and beyond, but it will look like it came from the '60s. … Just like in heyday of the 'Apollo' moon missions 36 years ago, astronauts will land on and take off from the moon using a separate lunar lander. But this time there will be four astronauts, not two, staying at least a week, not just two or three days. The CEV, upon return, will be able to land on the ground, and be reused up to ten times." Bill Harwood, CBS News space analyst: "It's easy to build and easy to operate. It's not a complex winged vehicle that has to fly on a runway. It's a big step forward for NASA."

The Houston Chronicle (9/20, Carreau) adds Griffin "defended the plan's $104 billion price tag, which will cover expenses through the first mission, in the face of new budget pressures to pay the soaring costs of the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort and the escalating expense of the Iraq war. 'The space program is a long-term investment in our future,' Griffin said. 'We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in the future. When we have a hurricane, we don't cancel the Air Force, we don't cancel the Navy. We're not going to cancel NASA.'"

The Washington Times (9/20, Chien) reports that the plan calls for the retirement of the space shuttle in 2010 and a new 14-person Crew Exploration Vehicle, which could fly as early as 2012 if additional funding becomes available or 2014 within NASA's current budget. 'This is the best mission statement NASA's had in 40 years,' NASA administrator Michael Griffin said."

The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Pae) reports that the "blueprint unveiled Monday is part of a broader initiative launched by President Bush 18 months ago, in which he called for returning humans to the moon as a steppingstone to a manned mission to Mars, perhaps as early as 2020."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Spotts) reports that the "new craft would be the cosmic equivalent of the suburban minivan -- a 'crew-exploration vehicle' capable of carrying six people to the International Space Station, or four people to the moon, or roughly 3-1/2 tons of cargo."

DOJ_NMG_0006474

In an analysis of the new NASA plan, the New York Times (9/20, Broad) reports that while the original Apollo effort "to put men on the Moon" received widespread public support, "President Bush's plan to return humans there and then voyage onward to Mars is dividing space experts and generating skepticism about its feasibility."

Griffin Says The Effort Will Not Rely On New Money. USA Today (9/20, Watson) reports that the $104 billion if adjusted for inflation, amounts to "roughly 55% of the cost of the first moon landing in 1969." Griffin "said NASA's budget would not need to grow to pay for the new effort and vowed not to raid other programs for funds. Savings would come from retiring the space shuttle in 2010. 'This is not about new money,' Griffin said. 'This is about a budget which keeps NASA … approximately where it is today.'"

Shuttle-Derived Hardware A Major Selling Point Of Plan. The Washington Post (9/20, A3, Gugliotta) notes that while "the rocket technology is 'shuttle-derived,' the new plan abandons the concept of a winged, reusable spacecraft that can fly back to Earth and land at an airport. Griffin said the new 'crew exploration vehicle' can be reused perhaps 10 times, but most of the new program's apparatus, like Apollo's before it, will be jettisoned in space or burned up in Earth's atmosphere. Griffin also acknowledged that there will be a two-year period between the last space shuttle flight in 2010 and the first flight of the exploration vehicle, anticipated in 2012, during which the United States will have no ability to put humans in space."

NYTimes Says Plan Lacking Enough "Pizzazz To Inspire Public Support." The New York Times (9/20) editorializes "The proposed new space vehicles look like a sensible way to put astronauts and cargo into space after the shuttle fleet is retired and will be built to facilitate landings on both the Moon and Mars." The Times adds that Michael Griffin, "deserves credit for putting real flesh on what had been little more than an aspiration. Unfortunately, the new plan lacks the pizzazz to inspire public support and will be operating under budget constraints that make delays or overruns likely. The new crew exploration vehicle will be built around well-known space technologies, with booster rockets and engines derived from the shuttle program and a crew capsule like the one used in the lunar program, only bigger."

Author Decries Administration "War On Science." Author Chris Mooney writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/20), "The lamentation in the forthcoming New England Journal of Medicine is typical of a growing genre: complaints about the misuse of science by the Bush administration. It is merely the latest jeremiad, from a group of distinguished experts, about the loss of reason by our leaders. This particular editorial, titled "A Sad Day for Science at the FDA," concerned so-called Plan B emergency contraception (the "morning after" pill), but it just as well could have been about the science of global warming or mercury pollution." Mooney says that the Administration's "current war on science" is "undermining our government's most central mission: to serve and protect us. This mandate cannot be fulfilled without an abiding respect for professionalism, expertise and the integrity of scientific analysis."

OTHER NEWS:

Katrina Expected To Spark Lawsuits Against Insurers. The question of whether insurers, the federal government or individuals should bear the brunt of billions of dollars in damage to homes and businesses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama is likely to make Hurricane Katrina the US' most contentious disaster recovery ever. USA Today (9/20, Chu) reports, "What makes the aftermath of Katrina so ripe for dispute is a polarizing, hard-to-determine issue: Is the damage caused by wind-driven rain or flooding? And what if the hurricane causes a storm surge or flood? … The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) estimates 34% of households and 23% of businesses in the affected areas have federal flood insurance." USA adds, "Disputes over wind vs. flood damage occur after every hurricane. But 'if it's any indication by the calls we've gotten so far, then we think there are going to be many more lawsuits' this time, says [Joanne] Doroshow of the Center for Justice & Democracy."

Barbour Calls Legislature Back Into Session. Mississippi Governor Haley Barbour said yesterday the he is calling the state legislature back into session September 27 to begin addressing Mississippi's recovery from hurricane Katrina. USA Today (9/20) reports, "One item on Barbour's agenda is a proposed change in gambling laws to allow casinos to build on land rather than only over water. Another session item, Barbour said, will be a proposal to allow small businesses hurt by Katrina to apply for $25 million in local loans. Barbour said he is waiting on a recommendation from the Mississippi Gaming Commission before offering a proposal on changing gambling laws."

Doctor Testifies To Vioxx, Heart Attack Link. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Groeller) reports on Dr. Benedict Lucchesi's second day of testimony, where he said "several researchers had warned Merck about Vioxx's potential to cause cardiac problems…before the painkiller went on sale in 1999. 'According to the slogan, "Merck puts people first," I think they should have known,' he said."

The Bloomberg (9/19) adds Lucchesi testified that Vioxx "may cause heart attacks with just one dose."

DOJ_NMG_0006475

Crude Oil Prices Spike On Fears Rita Will Disrupt Supply. Crude oil prices surged yesterday on fears that Tropical Storm Rita would disrupt supply in the Gulf of Mexico. ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 7, :15, Gibson) reported, "The price shot up $4.39 to more than $67 a barrel, and that's the largest one-day spike in history." The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 9, 0:30, Schieffer) said it was "the biggest one-day jump ever." NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 3, 0:20, Williams) also said it was "the biggest one-day price jump ever."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Bahreee, Gold) adds "the storm's approach is slowing efforts to fix infrastructure damaged by Katrina." The US Mineral Management Service "reported yesterday that 44% of the daily output of oil and natural gas was still off-line, three weeks after Katrina came ashore near the Louisiana-Mississippi border. So far, the damage has prevented the output of the oil and natural-gas equivalent of about 56 million barrels, just shy of 5% of the region's annual total."

The Financial Times (9/20, Hoyos, Morrison, McNulty) says "the Port of Houston Authority, the 6th largest in the world, began gathering information with its partners about the pending storm, reviewing all plans and procedures for the hurricane." Felicia Griffin, spokeswoman, "said the port, which is ranked 1st in the US in foreign tonnage and second overall, after the port of southern Louisiana, was checking inventory to ensure it had basic equipment on hand, including flashlights and batteries."

The Washington Post (9/20, D1, Blum) reports, "The new storm 'could be coming in right exactly where Katrina didn't go,' said Michael Guido, director of commodity strategy in New York for French bank Societe Generale. 'It could be a bad situation for all the platforms that didn't get hit before.'" D. Mark Routt, an analyst with Energy Security Analysis Inc. of Wakefield, Mass., "said Houston is an 'extremely important hub' for pipelines and other oil industry operations, adding to concern about storm damage."

USA Today (9/20, Smith) reports on how Rita is affecting cleanup efforts for "15 oil spills unleashed by Hurricane Katrina." It is "the largest oil cleanup effort in state history, more than 10 times greater than the remediation of 550,000 gallons of oil spilled by the ship Westchester in the Mississippi River in November 2000. The biggest spill in U.S. history was 11 million gallons by the ship Exxon Valdez off Alaska in 1989."

Meanwhile, gasoline prices fell to $2.81 average per gallon. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 10, 0:10, Schieffer) reported "gasoline has now given up more than half its post-Katrina gain." USA Today (9/20, Healey) says "those numbers could turn fast. … Wholesale gasoline for delivery next month zoomed nearly 25 cents to about $2.03 a gallon."

OPEC Plans To Increase Production. The New York Times (9/20, Mouawad) reports, "OPEC delegates said Monday that the group planned to allow its members to provide up to two million barrels a day of additional crude oil if the market needs it." But "oil traders brushed aside the move and instead sent oil prices higher on worries of another possible hurricane."

Katrina Badly Damaged Gulf Oil Platforms. ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 8, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "It has been three weeks since Hurricane Katrina roared through the Gulf and today, we've obtained the first look at some of the massive damage it inflicted on the oil rigs. It is clear evidence of how defenseless the oil facilities are against the fury of a major hurricane." ABC (Kofman) added, "No one knows yet how badly Katrina damaged the underwater pipeline system, but a preliminary count has found that of 140 damaged platforms in the Gulf, many are beyond repair. 2% were destroyed by Katrina but production is off more than 50% because the damage to the oil industry goes far deeper than what you find out here at sea. All along the Mississippi, below New Orleans, you can see how Katrina has hobbled the oil industry. Oil refineries sit idle. At least four will be down for months. Storage tanks knocked off their foundations. Crews scrambling to clean up six different oil spills. The only road to the region is still underwater in parts, and blocked by those massive fishing boats in other parts."

Dow Falls 84 Points On Oil Price Spike. The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 9, 0:30, Schieffer) reported the run in oil prices yesterday "rattled Wall Street. The Dow fell 84 points [to close at 10,557.63], the NASDAQ lost 15 [to close at 2145.26]." USA Today (9/20, Krantz) adds "the broad Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 6.89 points to 1231.02. The educational services, computer electronic retail and auto parts industries were the S&P's worst performers on Monday." Still, "the S&P 500 is alone among the three major stock market indexes in being up for the year at 1.6%." The New York Times/AP (9/20) and Wall Street Journal (9/20, Patterson) also report the stock numbers.

Meanwhile, USA Today (9/20, Shell) says "tracking violent storms is quickly emerging as a new job requirement on Wall Street. After the massive financial fallout caused by Hurricane Katrina, a growing number of traders, analysts and portfolio managers now view the weather as a major risk factor. … With Tropical Storm Rita barreling down on the Florida Keys and likely to gain strength and become a hurricane, it's no surprise that investors are just as interested in where the next hurricane will hit as they are the direction of interest rates."

Fed Expected To Raise Rates By Quarter Point. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Whitehouse) reports, "The bond market has a message for Federal Reserve officials trying to gauge Hurricane Katrina's economic impact: Inflation probably will accelerate no matter what you do." Today, "the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee decides whether to keep raising short-term interest rates to fight inflation or pause for more data on how the economy has fared since Katrina. Most economists expect the Fed to raise its interest-rate target for the 11th time in 15 months -- by a quarter percentage point to 3.75% -- but will read the accompanying statement closely for signs of future moves."

DOJ_NMG_0006476

The Wall Street Journal (9/20) editorializes that "easing up now would be exactly the wrong policy. T hose urging such an action include carry-traders who fear getting caught playing the yield curve, investors long on housing, and all kinds of well-intentioned folks who simply don't want to see the expansion end. We know how they feel. This market psychology always takes hold amid a Fed-tightening cycle -- and this time it is being exaggerated by the fallout from Katrina." The Journal also says "a rate hike now could actually have the beneficial effect of calming inflation fears and keeping long-term interest rates lower. If the Fed keeps prices stable, the animal spirits of the private sector will do the rest."

Agreement Calls For North Korea To Give Up Nuclear Weapons Program. Negotiators announced yesterday that North Korea has agreed to end its nuclear weapons program. The concession comes in exchange for American economic assistance and a US pledge not to launch a military attack against the communist regime. Most of the coverage of the deal is markedly skeptical about the North Koreans' intentions and the durability of the agreement. Comments by President Bush suggested the US government was also trying to lower expectations about it, describing it as merely as first step. As part of the reporting, some media outlets see a contradiction between the terms of the deal and previous White House positions.

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 3, 2:30, Karl), for example, said that for the "past four years, the White House insisted North Korea would get no rewards for stopping a nuclear weapons program the US said they shouldn't have in the first place. That, officials said, would be blackmail." The New York Times (9/20, Sanger), meanwhile, reports the accord "provided the bare minimum," but "even to get that, Mr. Bush had to blink slightly, acknowledging that at some point in the future, the United States would discuss with the North building new nuclear facilities -- something Washington has said it could never trust the North with."

USA Today (9/20, Slavin) adds "a year ago, US negotiators said energy assistance from North Korea's neighbors would come if it accounted for nuclear programs within three months and began to dismantle them. Such language is missing from the new deal, which says the United States will join other nations to provide energy." Monday's agreement "could lead to something like the 1994 deal, said Scott Snyder, a Korea expert at the Washington office of the Asia Foundation, a research group. The Bush administration had long criticized that deal."

ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 3, 2:30, Gibson) also reported it was "perhaps, very possibly, a breakthrough," but "will the North Koreans follow through?" ABC (Karl) added, "The agreement, announced with fanfare, marks a major turnaround for both the United States and North Korea. The talks had been deadlocked, and there were fears North Korea would soon test one of its nuclear weapons. Now Kim Jong-Il's government promises to dismantle its entire nuclear weapons program and to let UN inspectors, whom he had thrown out of his country two years ago, back in." The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 5, 0:40, Schieffer) added, "Some doubt the North will live up to its end of the bargain, which calls for it to dismantling weapons and the programs to build them."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 8, 1:40, Williams) said that "at the White House today, President Bush cautioned it's not yet a done deal." Administration officials "say any new agreement will demand rigorous inspections and verification." Fox News' Special Report (9/19, Rosen) also said "Bush welcomed today's positive step, but expressed concern about the North's honoring its word."

The Financial Times (9/20, Fifield, Yeh) reports "Bush said the Korean deal was 'a step forward in making this world a more secure place' but insisted 'we've got to verify whether or not that happens.'" The "wide-ranging, though vague," agreement is "the first breakthrough in more than two years of tortuous six-party negotiations and came just as the differences between Pyongyang and Washington seemed intractable." It also "served to prove that Washington and Beijing, which hosted the talks, can co-operate on issues of mutual security interest." Bush "said he wanted to the thank the other partners in the six-party dialogue for working together. But he added: 'The question is, over time, will all parties adhere to the agreement?'" Scott McClellan, "the White House spokesman, made clear that the first step under the agreement was for North Korea to end its nuclear programmes."

The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Kessler, Cody) also says Bush "cautiously welcomed the agreement," and reports "the unexpected" deal "followed decisions by both the Pyongyang government and the Bush administration to compromise on positions they had clung to during nearly three years of crisis over North Korea's nuclear ambitions." The breakthrough accord "followed a compromise proposed by China aimed at persuading both countries to sign a document of principles." The New York Times (9/20, Kahn, Sanger) also describes Bush's reaction as "cautious."

North Korea's announcement that it will abandon its nuclear weapons programs received widespread coverage on local television yesterday. Most reports mentioned that the Bush Administration is pleased by the decision but remains "cautious." Some examples: KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (9/19, 4:43 p.m.) reported, "The White House says it is pleased with North Korea's agreement to end its nuclear weapons program. Still, at the same time there's caution about whether or not the nation will make good on its promise." The North "drove a hard bargain. In return for terminating its weapons programs, it will receive energy and oil aid and a guarantee Washington won't attack."

DOJ_NMG_0006477

KARE-TV Minneapolis (9/19, 5:13 p.m.) reported, "North Korea is pledging to abandon all of its nuclear programs. … In return, North Korea will get electric power from South Korea, oil and aid from other countries and a pledge from the US to respect each other's sovereignty and right to a peaceful co-existence."

KSAZ-TV Phoenix (9/19, 5:17 p.m.) reported that "the agreement ends a 3 year standoff. In exchange for giving up its nuclear program, North Korea will receive energy assistance from other nations."

Knight Ridder (9/20, Johnson) says it was a "turnabout that came suddenly after years of failed talks." US "intelligence officials say North Korea harbors between six and nine nuclear weapons."

Accord Seen As Victory For Rice. The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Kirk, LaFranchi) adds the deal "is seen by some analysts as a clear victory for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's diplomatic approach over administration forces favoring a more confrontational approach."

The New York Times (9/20) editorializes, "Diplomacy, it seems, does work after all." The deal "became possible when Washington abandoned the confrontational tactics and name-calling associated with its former top antiproliferation official, John Bolton, and gave serious negotiation a chance." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "deserves most of the credit for that switch, which was made with exceptional skill by America's top negotiator at the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill." The Times adds, "The biggest winner of all from yesterday's agreement may well be the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty itself."

This Morning, North Korea Demanding A Nuclear Reactor. Adding to the media skepticism is a renewed North Korean demand which reportedly was not part of the original deal. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Fairclough, Robbins) says "a final deal ending Pyongyang's atomic ambitions is a long way off. Progress will require sweeping concessions from Pyongyang, including intrusive inspections to ensure the dismantling of its facilities." It will also "require important concessions from the Bush administration." This morning, "North Korea's foreign ministry issued a statement casting doubt on the country's willingness to act soon. A ministry spokesman said the US 'should not even dream' Pyongyang will give up its nuclear deterrent before America provides a reactor."

The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Demick, Magnier, Efron) adds a North Korean demand "threw water on the deal" less than 24 hours "after diplomats announced a breakthrough." North Korea's demand "could be a deal breaker." Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "the chief US negotiator at the six-nation nuclear talks, made it clear at the opening of negotiations in Beijing last week that the idea of providing North Korea with a reactor before disarmament would be a 'nonstarter.'" A similar Washington Times/AP (9/20, Chang) article says the demand cast "doubt" on North Korea's commitment to the "breakthrough agreement." Both the United States and Japan "rejected the North's latest demand. 'This is not the agreement that they signed, and we'll give them some time to reflect,' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said." Japanese Foreign Minister Nobutaka Machimura "called the reactor demand 'unacceptable.'"

Hill "Had Misgivings" About Deal Because It "Hinted" At Discussions About Reactor. Under the headline "US-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open," the New York Times (9/20, Kahn, Sanger) reports the top US negotiator, Christopher Hill, "had misgivings" about the deal "because the vaguely worded agreement left unaddressed the date disarmament would happen, and hinted at a concession to North Korea that President Bush and his aides had long said they would never agree to: discussing at an appropriate time providing North Korea with a civilian nuclear power plant, senior administration officials said." The Times adds, "As described by senior Bush administration officials and Asian participants in the talks, Mr. Bush agreed to eventual discussions on providing a nuclear plant only after China turned over a draft of an agreement and told the Americans they had hours to decide whether to take it or leave it." The Times adds, "Several officials, who would not allow their names to be used because they did not want to publicly discuss Mr. Bush's political challenges, noted that Mr. Bush is tied down in Iraq, consumed by Hurricane Katrina, and headed into another standoff over Iran's nuclear program. The agreement, they said, provides him with a way to forestall, at least for now, a confrontation with another member of what he once famously termed 'the axis of evil."

More Commentary. Several editorials in major newspapers this morning praise the Administration's insistence on multi-party talks. In its editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/20) says that "though the Bush administration's handling of North Korea has hardly been a model of diplomacy, the president can claim some vindication for insisting on multilateral talks, instead of agreeing to one-on-one negotiations." In fact, "the Bush Administration wanted to involve other nations in the talks" precisely because they would "expose Pyongyang's paranoia to a wider audience" and "make it harder for North Korea to deny any agreement it did make." The Times argues that the latest developments in the negotiations "put more pressure on China to keep North Korea in line," and, in any case, the "the difficult work of applying" the original deal's principles will begin at scheduled talks in November. Those "talks just got harder. But the value of the agreement is that at least the principles are now clear."

DOJ_NMG_0006478

USA Today (9/20) editorializes, "History isn't encouraging. … The trick is to avoid past pitfalls. The United States has partners because of its two-year insistence on including neighbors South Korea, China, Japan and Russia in the talks."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20) writes in an editorial that "this time there is one important reason to believe it could work, past deceptions notwithstanding: China's vital interest in a denuclearized Korean peninsula and continued good relations with the US and Japan."

The Washington Post (9/20) writes in an editorial the deal is a "surprising piece of good news." North Korea's agreement, adds the Post, "excuses it from the potential displeasure of China, which brokered the talks and supplies Pyongyang with food and energy. It allows for the continuation of rapidly improving relations with South Korea, including provision by the South of large new supplies of electricity."

North Korea Producing Counterfeit $100 Bills. The Washington Times (9/20, Gertz) reports, "North Korea's government is producing high-quality counterfeit $100 bills and is working with criminal groups in China to sell the fake US money internationally, US officials say. Some details of the production of what federal officials call 'supernotes' were disclosed after arrests last month in several US cities of people linked to a major Asian crime ring trafficking in fake money, arms, drugs and cigarettes." The Times adds, "A senior Bush administration official said one of the 10 indictments in the case contains the first disclosure of the North Korean government's role in the counterfeiting."

Russia, China Oppose US Effort To Refer Iran To Security Council. USA Today (9/20) reports, "U.S. and European diplomats resumed efforts to have Iran brought before the U.N. Security Council for sanctions, even as Russia called for a delay. … European Union diplomats and a U.S. official — who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitive nature of the negotiations — said China also remained opposed to referral. They said the West would probably force a vote. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she expects the Security Council to take up the matter 'at some point in time.'"

El Baradei Criticizes Confrontational Approach To Iranian Nuclear Development. USA Today (9/20) reports, "The United Nations' chief nuclear inspector, Mohamed ElBaradei, said Monday that talks should replace international confrontation over Iran's nuclear activities. Negotiations proved their worth in getting North Korea to renounce its nuclear arms program, ElBaradei said. … Tehran says its nuclear program is for production of electricity, not nuclear weapons. ElBaradei criticized both Tehran's intransigence and U.S.-European calls for Security Council involvement as examples of 'confrontations and political brinkmanship.''

Pentagon Official Tells Taiwanese To Boost Defense Spending. The Washington Times (9/20, Gertz) reports Edward Ross, a senior Pentagon security cooperation official, "sharply criticized Taiwan's government for not moving ahead with an arms buildup to counter a mounting threat from China. Ross "also suggested in a speech that the United States might not defend Taiwan in a conflict with China unless Taipei does more to boost its defenses and national will. 'As the lone superpower, our interests are plentiful and our attention short,' Mr. Ross said. 'We cannot help defend you if you cannot defend yourself.' … The blunt speech, a copy of which was obtained by The Washington Times, was given at the annual U.S.-Taiwan Business Council-Defense Industry meeting in San Diego. Attendees included Huo Shou-yeh, Taiwan's vice defense minister, and other officials from the island."

Activist Fighting Forced Abortions Jailed In China. The Washington Post (9/20, A17, Pan) reports, "China said Monday that it has dismissed and detained officials in the eastern city of Linyi for abuses committed while enforcing the country's one-child policy. But the government provided no details and said nothing about the arrest this month of an activist who had campaigned against the use of forced abortion and sterilization there. … Jiang Tianyong, a lawyer involved in a class-action lawsuit against the Linyi officials, cast doubt on the government's statement and accused local authorities of continuing to hold Chen Guangcheng, the activist leading the lawsuit, under house arrest without due process."

US Wants To "Come Out Blazing" On UN Reforms. The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Regan) reports in its "Terrorism and Security" column, "After a week when most of the reforms it wanted to see initiated at the United Nations were stymied or watered down, The Sunday Times of London reports that the United States wants to 'come out blazing' on Monday and push for change. But it faces a new geopolitical world as it attempts to do this, according to a New York Times analysis; one where countries will ally with you on one issue, while at the same time strongly opposing you on other issues. What Bush faced from the well of the United Nations on Wednesday morning was a strange new geopolitical world, in which your allies on one issue are ganging up on you in the next room." The US "will get to see this week if it can still form the needed coalitions to push through its agenda, as the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) takes up the issue of Iran's nuclear program."

DOJ_NMG_0006479

Coleman Calls For Annan To Be Replaced. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (9/20) titled, "The U.N. Must Look For a New Secretary-General, Sen. Norm Coleman writes, "Last week, world leaders met for what Kofi Annan described as a 'once-in-a-generation opportunity to take bold decisions in the areas of development, security, human rights and reform of the United Nations.' But a reading of the 'outcome document' world leaders are signing shows it to be yet another missed opportunity for UN reform. John Bolton pushed hard to improve the document and succeeded in modifying its most objectionable clauses. But what remains falls far short of 'bold.' … If the UN is to genuinely reform itself, it needs visionary and credible leadership. Mr. Annan, whose management failures are unambiguous, is simply too weak to muscle through an effective reform package. We should begin looking for new leadership now."

Schroeder, Merkel Try To Form Governing Coalitions. One day after elections, German politics remain deadlocked as both major parties continue to claim victory. USA Today (9/20, Knox) reports "competing claims" by Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his opponent, Angela Merkel "put Germany in a political deadlock and could stall efforts to revive the torpid economy." Merkel's party, the Christian Democratic Union, "won 35.2% of the vote in Sunday's elections, compared with 34.3% for Schroeder's Social Democratic Party." Merkel and Schroeder "scrambled to form alliances with other political parties that would put them in control. … Traditionally, Merkel's Christian Democrats have linked with the Free Democrats. Schroeder's Social Democrats have allied with the Greens. Merkel and Schroeder are trying to woo each other's ally." A majority coalition "must be in place by Oct. 18. The parliament has three chances to choose a chancellor. If it fails, President Horst Koehler can appoint a minority government or call new elections." The New York Times (9/20, Bernstein, Dempsey) adds "Christian Democratic officials said Monday that talks would be held with the Greens. … The chairman of the Greens, Reinhard Bütikofer, did not rule out an agreement."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Tzortzis), Wall Street Journal (9/20, Walker, Crawford), Washington Post (9/20, A17, Whitlock), Knight Ridder (9/20, Schofield) and Washington Times (9/20, Kralev), run similar reports on the situation in Germany.

The Financial Times (9/20, Benoit) reports the euro "fell to a seven-week low against the dollar on Monday after Germany's election ended in a stalemate, casting doubt over the country's ability to enact the policy changes needed to bolster faltering economic growth." The New York Times (9/20, Smith) adds "Europe, weakened by the seeming collapse of its constitutional project in May, faces even more uncertainty after the election in Germany on Sunday, which left no party with a clear mandate."

In an analysis piece, the Wall Street Journal (9/20, Kempe) says "it will take some time and convoluted coalition negotiations before the world knows who won Sunday's German elections. But it's not too early to call the loser: Angela Merkel. … Political insiders say moving quickly to build a government is Angela Merkel's last chance of survival. Any delay will mean her political death, either by Chancellor Schroeder's hand or, just as likely, rivals within her own Christian Democratic party who have never been comfortable with the eastern German Protestant woman in a political leadership that is overwhelmingly male, western and Catholic."

FARC Reportedly Operating Along Venezuelan Border. The Washington Times (9/20, Behn) reports, "Colombian paramilitaries and Marxist guerrillas are running kidnapping, extortion and smuggling rackets as they infiltrate Urena and other communities near Venezuela's border, residents and officials say. 'There are more and more FARC in Apure and in Tachira [two western border states of Venezuela] present in the communities, and they are recruiting,' said Virginia Trimarco, regional representative of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). 'That makes people inside the country, and the Venezuelans, worried about security and selective killings,' she said. … Venezuelan cattle ranchers and a local state official -- who asked not to be named -- said the government of President Hugo Chavez turns a blind eye to FARC guerrillas operating in Venezuela, pushed to the border by the success of the U.S.-backed Plan Colombia, aimed at eradicating the cocaine trade in Colombia that funds the rebels."

Uzbek Government Accused Of Intimidating Human Rights Activists. The New York Times (9/20, Chivers) reports, "The government of Uzbekistan, stung by the outcry in the West over its bloody suppression of a prison break and anti-government demonstration in May, has engaged for months in a ferocious crackdown against those who have tried to expose the brutality, says a report released Monday by a prominent human rights organization. The report, by Human Rights Watch, the New York-based organization, says the crackdown included widespread arrests, threats and harassment and was directed at witnesses, survivors, human rights defenders, journalists and political workers."

DOJ_NMG_0006480

The Washington Post (9/20, A18, Finn) reports, "The first 15 people charged with organizing an armed revolt in Andijan were to go on trial Tuesday in the Uzbek capital, Tashkent. Prosecutors allege that the 15 were part of a broad conspiracy, financed from abroad, that was designed to overthrow the government and replace it with an Islamic state. Prosecutors said another 106 people may face similar charges."

US Urged To Give Pakistan Trade Deal In Return For Women's Rights Assurances. The New York Times' Nicholas Kristoff (9/20) writes, "Our close ally President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan visited the U.S. last week and fretted aloud about a surprising problem: The 'easiest way' for Pakistani women to make money is to get raped, he said, so they're lining up to be raped and thus making him look bad. … That comment got Mr. Musharraf in hot water. So over the weekend, Mr. Musharraf denied that he had ever said any such thing." Kristoff continues, "The irony is that while he's a nitwit on social issues, General Musharraf has proved himself to be a good economic manager, and the 7 percent growth rates generated by his reforms will help undermine fundamentalism and sexual violence in the long run. During his visit, Mr. Musharraf pressed for a free-trade area between the U.S. and Pakistan, and that's a great idea to promote Pakistan's development. So let's give Mr. Musharraf a free-trade deal - but only on the condition that he clamp down not on Pakistani women fighting against rape, but on Osama bin Laden."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meeting with Local Officials and Business Leaders, Gulfport, Miss.; briefing on Tropical Storm Rita, New Orleans, La.; visit to Recovering Business, New Orleans, La.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Senate and House Full Committees. Joint hearings on legislative presentations by veterans affairs groups: American Legion. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full committee markup of pending legislation, including S 1582, a bill to reauthorize the U.S. Grain Standards Act. Location: Russell, room 328-A.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations, including Emil Henry Jr. to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for financial institutions; Scottie Theresa Neese to be director of the U.S. Mint; and Patrick O'Brien to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for terrorist financing. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing to receive testimony regarding the current state of climate change scientific research and the economics of strategies to manage climate change. Issues to be discussed include: the relationship between energy consumption and climate change, and the potential effects on the U.S. economy of climate change and strategies to control greenhouse gas emissions. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Supreme Court's Kelo ruling from New London, Conn. Witnesses include: Susette Kelo, of New London; Pastor Fred Jenkins of St. Luke's Pentecostal Church, North Hempstead, N.Y.; Eddie Perez, mayor of Hartford, Conn, representing National League of Cities; Hilary O. Shelton, director NAACP Washington bureau; and others. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Holds joint hearing on legislative presentations by veterans' affairs groups. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Disaster Prediction and Prevention Subcommittee. Hearing on ``The Lifesaving Role of Accurate Hurricane Prediction." Max Mayfield, director, National Hurricane Center; Windell Curole, general manager, South Lafourche Levee District; Mark Levitan, director, LSU Hurricane Center. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere, Peace Corps and Narcotics Affairs holds a hearing on ``China's Role in Latin America." Witnesses include: Charles Shapiro, principal deputy assistant secretary of State, Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs; Roger Pardo-Mauer, deputy assistant secretary of Defense for western hemisphere affairs; and others. Location: Dirksen, room 419.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. The House meets for morning hour and 2 p.m. for legislative business. Votes will be postponed until 6:30 p.m. Highlights: Suspensions (10 bills): 1) H.R. 3761 - Flexibility for Displaced Workers Act. 2) H.R. 2132 - To extend the waiver authority of the Secretary of Education with respect to student financial assistance during a war or other military operation or national emergency. 3) H.R. 3784 - To temporarily extend the programs under the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes. 4) H.R. 3765 - To extend through December 31, 2007, the authority of the Secretary of the Army to accept and expend funds contributed by non-Federal public entities to expedite the processing of permits. 5) H.R. 3649 - Sportfishing and Recreational Boating Safety Amendments Act of 2005. 6) H.R. 409 - Sierra National Forest Land Exchange Act of 2005 . 7) S. 1340 - A bill to amend the Pittman-Robertson Wildlife Restoration Act to extend the date after which surplus funds in the wildlife restoration fund become available for apportionment. 8) H.R. 394 - To direct the Secretary of the Interior to conduct a boundary study to evaluate the significance of the Colonel James Barrett Farm in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the suitability and feasibility of its inclusion in the National Park System as part of the Minute Man National Historical Park, and for other purposes. 9) H.Res. 441 - To congratulate the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Discovery crew. 10) H.Res. 450 - Recognizing Space Shuttle Commander Eileen Collins, Mission Specialist Wendy Lawrence, and the contributions of all other women who have worked with NASA following the successful mission of Space Shuttle Discovery on STS-114.

DOJ_NMG_0006481

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Senate and House Full Committees. Joint hearings on legislative presentations by veterans affairs groups: American Legion. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on implementation of the Microenterprise Results and Accountability Act. Jonathan Morduch, Associate Professor of Public Policy and Economics, Robert F. Wagner Graduate School of Public Service New York University; Susy Cheston, Senior Vice President, Opportunity International; Gary Plank, President-Elect, World Council of Credit Unions; Lawrence Yanovitch, Director of Policy and Technical Assistance, The Foundation for International Community Assistance. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

5 p.m. RULES _ Full committee markup to consider rules for floor debate for pending legislation, including HR 250, the Manufacturing Technology Competitiveness Act, and HR 2123, the School Readiness Act. Location: Capitol, H-313.

7 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

Other: BURUNDI PESIDENT PIERRE NKURUNZIZA _ Highlights: 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. Three weeks after his installation as President, the former rebel leader discusses the post-conflict reconstruction challenges confronting his country and outlines his government's prioriites and strategies. Woodrow Wilson Center, Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. Contact: 202-691-4000.

KING ABDULLA II OF JORDAN _ Highlights: Majority Leader Frist meets with King Abdulla II of Jordan. Room S-230.

CONTRACTORS CONFERENCE _ Associated General Contractors of America (AGC) holds its 2005 Legislative Midyear Meeting, featuring the latest information about the likely impact on the economy of Hurricane Katrina, a report from U.S. Army Corps officials on hurricane relief and reconstruction, and other matters. Highlights: 9 a.m. Charles Nottingham, Federal High Administration's associate administrator for policy discusses new highway bill, and Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., discusses transportation in the future. Location: Hyatt Regency, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

FEDERAL CREDIT UNIONS CAUCUS _ The National Association of Federal Credit Unions (NAFCU) holds the NAFCU 2005 Congressional Caucus. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. 9:15 a.m. Debbie Matz, board member, NCUA. 10 a.m. Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. 10:30 a.m. Treasury Secretary John Snow. 11 a.m. Rep. Mike Oxley, R-Ohio. 11:30 a.m. Sen. Tom Carper, D-Del. Location: Grand Hyatt Washington, 1000 H St. NW.

GENERIC PHARMACEUTICAL CONFERENCE _ The Generic Pharmaceutical Asosciation (GPhA) hosts its First Annual Policy Conference, focusing on Medicare, biodefense, generic biopharmaceuticals and other issues. Highlights: 8 a.m. Keynote, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. 12 p.m. Keynote, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. Location: Ritz-Carlton, 22nd and M Streets, NW.

AIR QUALITY CONFERENCE _ The Energy & Environmental Research Center holds the Air Quality V Conference, with keynote speakers Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., and Carl Bauer, acting director of the U.S. Department of Energy's National Energy Technology Laboratory. Others speakers include Jeffrey Holmstead, assistant administrator of air and radiation, EPA; Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D.; Rep. Earl Pomeroy, D-N.C.; and William Wehrum, EPA. Location: Marriott Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

TRADE TALKS _ Public events by U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Meets with Thailand's foreign minister, USTR Offices, 600 17th St. NW. 9:45 a.m. Meets with Ukrainian Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk., USTR Offices. 11:15 a.m. Meets with Korean trade minister. USTR Offices. 2:30 p.m. Meets with Uganda President Yoweri Museveni. USTR Offices. 7 p.m. Delivers Keynote speech to Coalition of Service Industries, St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K streets, NW.

SMALL BUSINESS-REGULATORY CONFERENCE _ 8 a.m. - 4 p.m. Over 25 national small business trade associations hold a conference on the Small Business and Regulatory Environment: 25 Years of the Regulatory Flexibility Act. Speakers and panelists include John Graham, OMB; Karen Kerrigan, Small Business and Entrepreneurship Council; Susan Dudley, Mercatus Center; others. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0006482

DRUG COUNTERFEITING _ 8:30 a.m. The Center for Medicines in the Public Interest and Pacific Research Institute hold the International Drug Counterfeiting Conference, releasing a new report saying counterfeit drug sales will reach $75 billion in 2010. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Breakfast keynote, Scott Gottlieb, deputy commissioner, FDA. 12:30 p.m. Lunch keynote, Arif Alikhar, director, DOJ IP Task Force. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Captiol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

AMERICAN DREAM FORUM _ Jobs for the Future forum on ``improving the path to better education and better jobs for all." Highlights: Keynote address by Patty Stonesifer, President and Chairman, Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. A ``Town Hall Discussion with David Gergen (Moderator), Professor of Public Service, John F. Kennedy School of Government, Harvard University and high-level public officials and corporate decision-makers.

THE RISE OF CHINA _ 9:30 a.m. - 6 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a conference on ``China's Emergence." Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

21ST CENTURY MEDICAID SYSTEM _ 10:30 a.m. - 5 p.m. The Center for Health Transformation holds a forum, ``Creating a 21st Century Medicaid System," with Newt Gingrich; Mark McClellan, Administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services; Gov. Mike Huckabee, R-Ark.; Gov. Mark Warner, D-Va.; Rep. Nathan Deal, R-Ga.; and Sen. Mel Martinez, F-Fla. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

HURRICANE KATRINA-ECONOMY _ 11 a.m. The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities (CBPP) holds conference call briefings at 11 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. to examine whether Congress, which is moving forward with immediate relief and reconstruction measures in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, should enact broad-based national legislation to stimulate the economy, with Robert Reischauer, president, Urban Institute; Peter Orszag, Brookings Institute; and Robert Greenstein, executive director, CBPP. Contacts: Michelle Bazie, 202-408-1080.

RURAL BROADBAND _ 8:30 a.m. The Rural Broadband Coalition and Hughes Networks Systems host a forum with representatives from the FCC and Department of Agriculture to discuss the availability of broadband Internet access to small businesses in rural America. Location: Rayburn, Room 2105.

US-MEXICO _ 8:30 a.m. CSIS hosts Luis Ernesto Derbez Bautista, Mexico's Secretary of Foreign Relations, discussing ``The State of US-Mexico Relations, the North American Agenda, and Mexico's Current Political Situation." Location: CSIS, B-1 Conference Center, 1800 K St. NW.

NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION _ 9 a.m. Georgetown University hosts a panel discussion on ``Nuclear Proliferation in the Age of Terror," with Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., and Christopher Shays, R-Conn.; Graham Allison, director of the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard University; Stephen Rademaker, assistant secretary of state for arms control; and moderator Robert Gallucci, dean, School of Foreign Service at Georgetown. Location: Georgetown University, Copley Formal Lounge.

ECONOMISTS-KATRINA _ 10 a.m. The ABA Economic Advisory Committee hosts economists from the nation's largest banks discussing post-Katrina economic conditions, including oil and home prices, via a telephone press conference, with Jim Chessen, ABA chief economist; Richard DeKaser, chief economist, National City Corporation; others. Contacts: Laura Fisher, 202-663-5466. Notes: Telephone press conference: 800-357-0498.

ISLAM AND TERROR _ 10 a.m. Homeland Security officer for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Daniel Sutherland delivers remarks at a forum on ``Islam and Terror: After London, Lessons for the United States." Location: Heritage Foundation, Lehrman Auditorium, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

MEDICARE _ 10 a.m. Kenneth Thorpe of Emory University discusses his new study, coauthored with Adam Atherly, titled ``Value of Medicare Advantage to Low-Income and Minority Medicare Beneficiaries." Location: Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, 12th Floor, 1310 G St. NW.

SPELLINGS-BROAD PRIZE _ 10:30 a.m. US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings will deliver remarks at the 2005 Broad Prize for Urban Education ceremony. Location: Library of Congress.

ARCTIC REFUGE COALITION _ 10:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. The coalition of groups working to save the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge holds a citizen action day, with thousands of Americans from across the country coming to the U.S. Capitol to urge lawmakers to protect America's Arctic Refuge from oil drilling. Participants include Robert Kennedy, Jr., Natural Resources Defense Council; Rt. Rev. Mark MacDonald, Episcopal Bishop for Alaska; Rabbi Richard Saperstein, Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life, Native American leaders and drummers, others. Location: West Front, US Capitol.

DEMOCRATS-KATRINA _ 10:50 a.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, along with Bishop Thomas Hoyt of the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church and President of the National Council of Churches, and Reverend Stephen John Thurston, President of the National Baptist Convention of America, Inc. will hold a brief media availability. Location: S-207, U.S. Capitol.

WINDFALL HEATING FUEL PRICES _ 11 a.m. Sens. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., and Chris Dodd, D-Conn., hold a press conference to discuss projected record winter heating fuel costs and legislation (The Windfall Profits Rebate Act of 2005 -- S. 1631) they are advancing to provide consumer relief in the form of consumer rebates. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

DOJ_NMG_0006483

ENVIRONMENTAL ATTITUDES _ 12 p.m. Environmental leaders announce the formal launch of Duke University's Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy Solutions at a press conference, with William Reilly, former EPA administrator and chair of the Institute's Advisory Board; Sens. John McCain and Joe Lieberman; and pollsters Peter Hart and Bill McInturff. Location: Room 406, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

PROPERTY RIGHTS _ 12:30 p.m.Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, joins Suette Kelo, lead plaintiff in Kelo v. New London property rights case, others, for a media availability. Location: Room 226, Dirksen Building.

RELIGIOUS-ROBERTS _ 12:30 p.m. Faith and religious leaders from across the country will formally announce their opposition to the confirmation of Judge John Roberts as Chief Justice of the United States. Location: Room 512, Hart Senate Building.

DEMOCRATIC WHIP _ 1:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer holds his regular pen and pad briefing. Location: Capitol, H-306.

ENVIRONMENTAL POLICY _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. The Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute holds a panel discussion on ``The National Environmental Act Under Siege.'' Panelists include, Robert Dreher, deputy director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute; Johanna Polsenberg, senior legislative assistant to Rep. Tom Udall; Vince Sampson, deputy chief counsel for the House Resources Committee; and Gary Bass, director of OMB Watch. Location: Georgetown University Law Center, McDonough Hall, Room 201, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW.

KATRINA-LONG ISLAND _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Nassau County Executive Tom Suozzi and Suffolk County Executive Steve Levy will be meeting with the Long Island Congressional Delegation in Washington, D.C. to brief the delegation on their emergency-response plans for Long Island, and to outline the assistance they need from the Federal government. A press availability will follow at the conclusion of the meeting. Location: Room 2243, Rayburn House Office Building.

VOTING _ 2:15 p.m. Senators Dodd, Obama, and Rep. Lewis news conference on the Help AmericaVote Act. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery Studio.

DEMOCRATS-KATRINA-FRAUD _ 3 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Congressman Henry Waxman hold a news conference tomorrow to announce the introduction of legislation to create an anti-fraud commission to prevent fraud and abuse in the recovery and rebuilding effort in the Gulf Coast region. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

CHAMBLISS-ROBERTS _ 3:30 p.m. Senator Chambliss meets with Judge John Roberts. Photo-op at top of meeting. Media availability with Sen. Chambliss only following meeting. Location: Room SR-416, Russell.

IMMIGRATION REFORM _ 4:30 p.m. Leaders from the immigration communities, labor, business, and religious organizations kick off a series of rallies and town hall meetings in support of the Secure America and Orderly Immigration Act of 2005 (S. 1033/H.R. 4330) this fall. The first rally will be held today, with over 500 people expected to attend. Speakers include Reps. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz.; Luis Gutierrez, D-Ill.; Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz.; Janice Schakowsksy, D-Ill.; Karen Narasaki, executive director, NAPALC; Arturo Rodriguez, president, UFW; others. Location: Foundry United Methodist Church, 1500 16th St. NW.

PRO IMMIGRATION _ 4:30 p.m. Sen. John McCain joins Reps. Jeff Flake, Luis Gutierrez, other pro immigration rights figures, for rally calling for immigration reform. Location: Foundry United Methodist Church, 1500 16th St. NW.

PRESS ACCESS-PUBLIC EVENTS _ 4 p.m. A panel of lawyers and professors discuss press access and changing news coverage after New York Times reporter Judith Miller was jailed for refusing to reveal her source. Panelists include, Ronald Karp, who represented Montgomery Police Chief Charles Moose in his First Amendment fight to publish a book; David Bartlett, past president of the Radio and Television News Director's Association; Ford Rowan, former NBC News correspondent; and others. Location: Washington College of Law, Room 603, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

USTR PORTMAN-KEYNOTE _ 6 p.m. United States Trade Representative Robert Portman makes the keynote address at the Coalition of Service Industries annual Gala Dinner. In addition Rep. Gregory Meeks, D-N.Y., and Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Texas, are honored for their roles in promoting U.S. trade interests. Economists Barry Bosworth and Jack Triplett will also be recognized for their work in helping to better understand the role of services in the U.S. economy. Location: St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K Streets, NW.

JESSE HELMS TRIBUTE _ 6:30 p.m. National conservative leaders mark the publication of the newly released memoirs of former Sen. Jesse Helms at a dinner event hosted by Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., and Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C. Speakers include Bob Novak, Phyllis Schlafly, Beverly LaHaye, Paul Weyrich, David Keane, Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, Rev. Jerry Falwell, and Reed Larson. Location: Crystal Marriott Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington, Va.

TIPPER GORE-AWARD _ 6:30 p.m. The Sewall-Belmont House and Museum honors Tipper Gore with the Alice Award at its gala awards dinner and reception in recognition of her commitment to mental health issues, education and the plight of the homeless. Joining the celebration are Karenna Gore Schiff, author and activist; Sen. Patty Murray; Sen. Debbie Stabenow; Rep. Lincoln Davis; musician Herbie Hancock; others. Location: Sewall-Belmont House & Museum, Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0006484

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"N. Korea Sets Condition On Nuclear Pact."
"Telling You What You Like."
"High-Tech Systems Feed Change In Parking Meters."
"New Orleans Mayor Tells Residents To Pack Up Again."
"Storm Strains Bush's Ties To Black Clergy."
"Back To Moon Via 'Apollo On Steroids.'"

USA Today:
"Guard Relief Hurt By Obsolete Equipment."
"Is Pakistan Doing Its Part In The War On Terrorism?"
"City Clears Out Again."
"President Sinking In Ratings."

New York Times:
"Mayor Suspends Flow Of People To New Orleans."
"U.S.-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open."
"Ex-Tyco Officers Get 8 To 25 Years."
"Ex-White House Aide Charged In Corruption Case."
"NASA Planning Return To Moon Within 13 Years."
"Many Women At Elite Colleges Set Career Path To Motherhood."

Washington Post:
"Storm Threat Halts Returns To New Orleans."
"British Smash Into Iraqi Jail To Free 2 Detained Soldiers."
"N. Korea, U.S. Gave Ground To Make Deal."
"Immigration Nominee's Credentials Questioned."
"New Antipsychotic Drugs Criticized."
"Bush Official Arrested In Corruption Probe."

Washington Times:
"North Korea Hedges On Nuclear Deal."
"New Storm Halts Reopening Of Big Easy."
"Local Heating Costs To Jump."
"Colombian Violence Spills Over."
"In Clarksburg, They Made The Lots Too Small."

Detroit Free Press:
"Newborn Donors Give Gift Of Life."
"My Identity Was Stolen; Yours Could Be Next."
"Family Ties Draw Evacuees North."
"Michigan's $500,000 Pioneers."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Guilty."
"Suit Slams Voter ID Law."
"It's The Neighborly Thing."
"Mogul Chips In $10 Million For Cobb Arts Center."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Tropical Storm Rita; New Orleans-Storm Dangers; North Korea-Nuclear Deal; Iraq-US Guards Killed; Afghan Election; Zawahiri Tape; Oil Prices; Tyco Execs Sentenced; NASA-New Moon Mission; Schools-Allergies.
CBS: Tropical Storm Rita; Katrina-Death Toll; New Orleans-Storm Dangers; McCain-Katrina Costs; North Korea-Nuclear Deal; Iraq-British Commandos Jailed; Iraq-Tal Afar; Katrina-Missing Children; Oil Prices; Gas Prices; Katrina-Coast Guard; NASA-New Moon Mission; Tyco Exec Sentenced; Katrina-Students, Teachers.
NBC: Hurricane Rita; Rita-Florida Keys; Oil Prices; New Orleans-Storm Dangers; Bush-Katrina Cost; Americans-Katrina Cost; Katrina-Evacuee Family; North Korea-Nuclear Deal; Tyco Exec Sentenced; Katrina-Displaced Dolphins; Katrina Evacuees-Barber; NJ-New Orleans Saints.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Tropical Storm Rita; Oil Prices; CA-Beatty Gubernatorial Bid; North Korea Nukes.
CBS: Tropical Storm Rita; New Orleans-Repopulation Suspended; North Korea Nukes; NASA-Moon Mission.
NPR: Tropical Storm Rita; Hurricane Katrina Death Toll; Red Cross-Atlanta Hurricane Relief Center; CA-Wal Mart Lawsuit; Wall Street; North Korea Nukes; FEC-Club For Growth Suit.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0006485

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Tuesday, September 20, 2005 8:48 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: Department of Justice News Clips 9/20/05
Attachments: dojclips050920.pdf; dojclips050920.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Al Qaeda Suspect Tells Of Bush Plot (WP) 4
U.S. Details Charges Against Student Linked To Plot Against Bush (NYT) 5
Md. Man Charged In Terror Case (WP) 6
College Park Man Charged In Plot To Aid Terrorist Group (WT/AP) 7
U.S. Says Maryland Man Aided Pakistani Terror Group (NYT) 7
Prosecutors, Al-Arian Defense Dispute Payment (TAMPTRIB) 8
More Details: Possible Terror Plans (WCPO-TV) 9
SAFETY MEASURES QUESTIONED (NBC5CINN) 10
Man With Local Ties Ordered To Leave The U. S. (WDTN-TV) 10
Al Qaeda Admits To London Bombings (WT/AP) 11

Patriot Act:

Gag-Rule Decree Sets Off A Clash Over Patriot Act (WSJ) 11

War News:

Estimate Puts Afghan Turnout At 50% For Vote (USAT) 12
Afghan Electorate's Message: The Provinces Need Public Works And Restoration Of Order (NYT) 13
Voter Turnout At About 50 Percent (WT) 14
Is Pakistan Doing Its Part In The War On Terrorism? (USAT) 15
British Army Storms Basra Jail To Free 2 Soldiers From Arrest (NYT) 17
British Smash Into Iraqi Jail To Free 2 Detained Soldiers (WP) 18
Shiite Militia, British Soldiers Clash (LAT) 19
Reporter Working For Times Abducted And Slain In Iraq (NYT) 20
England Now To Fight Abu Ghraib Charges (AJC/AP) 21
An Honest Victory (NYT) 22
Guard Relief Hurt By Obsolete Equipment (USAT) 24
Army Abandons Plan To Borrow From Funds For Troops' Vehicles (WSJ) 24

Corporate Scandals:

Ex-Tyco Execs Receive Prison Sentences (FINDLAW/AP) 25
Former Tyco Executives Sentenced To Up To 25 Years In Prison (LAW) 26
Tyco's Kozlowski To Spend Up To 25 Years In Jail (FT) 27
Ex-Tyco Officers Get 8 To 25 Years (NYT) 28
Ex-Tyco Chiefs Whisked Off To Prison (USAT) 30
Ex-Tyco Officers Sentenced (WP) 30
Tyco Figures Will Be Jailed At Least 7 Years (WSJ) 32
Ex-Tyco Execs Face $1-a-day Pay But Could Get Bail For Appeals (USAT) 33
Tyco Endgame (WSJ) 34
The Crime And The Time (NYT) 34
In Bermuda, AIG Helped Shape A Legendary Corporate Haven (WSJ) 35

Criminal Law:

Ex-White House Aide Charged In Corruption Case (NYT) 38
Bush Official Arrested In Corruption Probe (WP) 40
Former White House Official Arrested (AJC/AP) 41
Former White House Budget Official Arrested (DMN) 42
Official, Abramoff Associate Arrested (HILL) 43
Bush Appointee Is Arrested In Obstruction Case (LAT) 43
Ex-OMB Official Hit With Charges (RC) 45
Top Federal Procurement Official Arrested (FEDTIMES) 46
Key OMB Official Arrested (GOVEXEC) 47
Recruits Sought For Porn Squad (WP) 47
U.S. Jury Signals Possible Deadlock In John A. `Junior' Gotti Mafia Case (FINDLAW/AP) 48
Three Arrested In Army Kickback Scheme (AP-Y2) 49
Three More Sentenced For Corruption (TTNJ) 49
Probe Cost County $107,000 For Lawyers (APP) 51
New Mexico Treasurer Pleads Not Guilty (AP) 56

Abu Ghraib Guard To Fight Abuse Charges (WP) 56
Oswego Mayor Allowed To Go Home, To Work While Sex Case Pending (AP) 57
Prominent Imam Sentenced To 87 Months (PHI) 58
Philly Cleric Sentenced For Corruption (AP) 59
ALI RECEIVES 7-YEAR JAIL SENTENCE (PHI) 59
Task Force Takes War On Gangs To County (TAMPTRIB) . 61
European Art Thieves Busted With FBI's Help (PHI) 61
Four Face Extradition In Rembrandt Case (WP) 62
Pair Pleads Guilty In Scams (KNOXNS) 63
MAN PLEADS GUILTY TO EXTORTION CHARGES (TMT) 63
Lil' Kim Reports To Detention Center In Philadelphia (AP) 64
Psychologist Endorses Overnights Visits For Hinckley (WT) .. 65
Hinckley Wants Girlfriend, Psychologist Says In Court (WP) .. 65
Jury Selection Begins In Ex-Illinois Gov's Trial (REU-Y2) 67
Racketeering And Fraud Trial Begins For Illinois Ex-Governor (NYT) 67
Ryan Trial Off To Slow Start As Potential Jurors Are Grilled About Bias (AP) 69
D.C. Killing Was 'Face-to-Face,' Police Say (WP) 70
Missing Girl's Car Offers Leads (WT) 71

Civil Law:

Office Depot, Feds Settle False Claims Case (FCW) 72
Office Depot Pays $4.75 Mln To Settle Claims Case (REU) .. 72
FEC Sues Pro-Republican Political Group (WP/AP) 72
F.E.C. Sues Republican Group Over Political Contributions (NYT) 73
FEC Sues GOP 527 Group For Violating Finance Laws (WT) 74
New State Law May Nix Asbestos Cases (LAW) 75
Unconstitutional Cartel (WSJ) 76

Civil Rights:

Bipartisan Panel Recommends U.S. Election Changes (REU-Y2) 77
Panel Recommends Photo ID For Voters (WT) 78
Panel On Elections Proposes Changes (WSJ) 79
Reforming The Vote (WP) 79
Denying Access To The Ballot (NYT) 80
Suit Slams Voter ID Law Plaintiffs Assail Ga. Requirement As Illegal 'Poll Tax' (AJC) 80
Rights Groups Challenge Photo ID Law (AP) 82
Single-member Districts Divide Osceola's Hispanics (ORS) 82
Tired Of 'Being Nice,' Disabled Group Storms Hill (RC) 83
Flag Issue May Burn Brightly In '06 Races (HILL) 84

Antitrust:

More States Plan Minimum-service Real Estate Laws (INMAN) 85
MasterCard Says Millions No-touch Cards To Be Issued (REU) 87
Verizon Wireless, Records Vendor Settle (WP) 88
U.S. Is Close To Approving Deals Altering The Telephone Industry (WSJ) 89
File-Sharing Services Seek Pact With Record Studios (NYT) 90
Financier Weighs Visteon's Assets For Parts Venture (WSJ) .. 91
StarPoint To Buy Acclaim In Joining Of Energy Trusts (WSJ) 92
Norway's Norsk Hydro To Acquire Spinnaker Of U.S. For $2.45 Billion (WSJ/DJN) 93
Microsoft Acquires Alacris To Beef Up Software Security (WSJ) 93

Environment/Indian Affairs:

House Bill Would Limit U.S. Power To Protect Species (NYT) 94
Losers In Eminent Domain Case Face Hefty Fees (WT) 95
Alaska Natives Offer A Herd Of Reasons To Block Oil Drilling (WP) 96

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds: Internet Drugs Ring Cracked (PHDN) 97
Congress To Probe Orioles' Palmeiro (AP) 98
Afghan Heroin Tied To Terror (WT) 98
Drug Trial To Begin For Former Haitian Anti-narcotics Chief (BRAH) 99
194 Youths Arrested In Crackdown On Violence (TUCCIT) . 100
Federal Judge Rules That Marshals Service Must Release Photos Of Defendants (FREEP) 101
Deadly Rig Blast May Have Been Criminal (NYPOST/AP) 101

Immigration:

Immigration Nominee's Credentials Questioned (WP) 101
DeLay Must Bridge Gap With Bush (HILL) 103

Tax:

American `Survivor' Winner Pleads Innocent To Tax Evasion (FINDLAW/AP) 104

Congress-Administration:

Right Rift Over Roberts (HILL) 104
Specter Backs U.S. Chief Justice Nominee Roberts (REU-Y2) 106
Roberts Seen As The Warm-Up In High Court Battle (LAW) . 107
For '08 Dems, A Tough Choice Lies Just Ahead (HILL) 108
Confirm Roberts (LAT) 109

DOJ_NMG_0006488

White House Is Said To Shift Names On List For 2nd Seat (NYT) 110
Diversity Changes The Way Justices See The World (USAT) 111
Choice Should Be Blind ... (USAT) 111
Cost Of Katrina Relief Splits Republican Ranks (CSM) 112
Deficit Foes: Defer New Drug Benefit To Offset Katrina Cost (WT) 113
RSC Pressing For Deep Cuts (RC) 114
Possible Fed Candidate Proposes Hurricane Relief Plan (REU-Y2) 115
If The Politicians Really Want To Help ... (LAT) 116
Bush Proposes Vouchers For All Displaced Students (WP) . 117
Contractors Get Affirmative Action Exemption (NYT) 118
Black Clergy Wary Of Bush's Courtship (LAT) 119
Incompetence, Not Racism (WP) 120
Visions Of The New New Orleans (WP) 121
Can You Hear Us Now? Let Poor Americans Speak For Themselves (RC) 122
President Sinking In Ratings (USAT) 123
Some Firms Hired In Katrina's Wake Have Checkered Pasts (WSJ) 124
Federal Contractors Seek Liability Shields (WP) 126
House GOP Scraps Plan For Joint Probe On Hurricane Response (LAT) 127
Congress — Again — Misses The Boat (USAT) 127
Storm Threat Halts Returns To New Orleans (WP) 129
City Clears Out Again (USAT) 130
Mayor Suspends Flow Of People To New Orleans (NYT) ...131
Bush Questions Reopening Of New Orleans (AJC/AP) 132
New Orleans Suspends Reopening Of City (AJC/AP) 134
New Storm Halts Reopening Of Big Easy (WT/AP) 135
Reopening Of Parts Of New Orleans Delayed (KRT) 136
New Orleans Mayor Halts Return Of City's Residents (LAT) 138
New Orleans Mayor Reverses Plan To Reopen Parts Of The City (WSJ) 139
Officials At All Levels Butt Heads Over Hurricane Relief Operations (WT) 140
Weary, Wary Residents Trek Back Into The City (USAT) 141
Rita Rages Toward Florida Keys (USAT) 142
Florida Keys Are Ordered Evacuated As Rita Nears (WP) 143
As Its Coffers Swell, Red Cross Is Criticized On Gulf Coast Response (NYT) 144
Red Cross Official To Meet With Lawmakers (HILL) 146
From FEMA To WEMA (NYT) 146
Kerry, Edwards See Chance For Change After Katrina (REU-Y2) 147
Kerry, Edwards Criticize Bush Over Response To Hurricane (WP) 148
Kerry Blasts Bush On Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina (HILL) 150
Kerry And Edwards Say Bush's Actions Have Been A Disaster (LAT) 150
La. Begins Probe Into 14 Nursing Home Deaths (USAT) 151
Nurse Says Hospital Owner Left Her 'High And Dry' (LAT) 152
For Illegal Immigrants, Some Aid Is Too Risky (WP) 154
Dying For A Drink Of Clean Water (WP) 156
Cameras Headed To Court? (RC) 157
Senate Poised For Test Vote On Drug Reimportation (HILL) 158
Social Security Appears To Be DOA In Senate (RC) 159
Inside Politics (WT) 160
FDA Rethinks Women's Chief (WP) 162
Is FDA's New Chief Counsel A Change In Name Only? (LEGT IMES) 163
NASA Planning Return To Moon Within 13 Years (NYT) 166
NASA Aims For A Return To Moon By 2018 (Houston Chronicle) 167
NASA 'Vision' Sees Man On Moon, Mars (WT) 169
Back To Moon Via 'Apollo On Steroids' (Los Angeles Times) 169
A Retro Look To Next US Spacecraft (CSM) 171
Space Vision: The Experts Split Again (NYT) 172
NASA Details Plan For Craft That Will Fly To The Moon (USAT) 173
NASA Unveils $104 Billion Plan To Return To The Moon By 2018 (Washington Post) 174
NASA's Back-to-the-Future Plans (NYT) 175
Bush And The Mad Scientists (LAT) 176

Other News:

Wind Or Flood? Fights With Insurers Loom (USAT) 177
Mississippi Governor Calls Special Session (USAT) 180
Witness Says Researchers Warned Merck On Vioxx (WSJ). 180
At Vioxx Trial, Witness Says Short-Term Use Posed A Risk (NYT/BLOOM) 181
Oil Prices Rise As Gulf Storm Looms (WSJ) 182
New US Hurricane Threat Sends Energy Prices Soaring (FT) 183
Oil Prices Spike As Storm Nears (WP) 183
Storm Makes Oil Cleanup Crews Uneasy (USAT) 184
Gas Prices Fall, But Storm Worries Push Oil Higher (USAT) 185
OPEC Set To Open Oil Taps Full Blast (NYT) 186
Fears Of New Storm Send Oil Soaring (USAT) 188
Shares Tumble On Worries Over New Storm And Rates (NYT/AP) 188

DOJ_NMG_0006489

Rita Fears Drag On Stocks (WSJ) 189
Stock Trackers Become Master Storm Trackers (USAT)....190
Bond Market Signals Little Faith In Fed To Slow March Of Inflation (WSJ)....191
Greenspan And Katrina (WSJ)....192
Yes, Parallel Tracks To North, But Parallel Tracks Don't Meet (NYT)....192
N. Korea, U.S. Both Bend A Bit For A Deal (USAT)....194
Bush Hails North Korea Nuclear Accord (FT)....195
N. Korea, U.S. Gave Ground To Make Deal (WP)....195
U.S.-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open (NYT) 197
North Korea Pledges To Exchange Nukes For Other Benefits (KRT)....199
North Korea's Agreement To Scrap Its Nukes (CSM)....201
Diplomacy At Work (NYT)....202
North Korea Agrees To Give Up Nuclear Arms (WSJ)....203
N. Korea's Reactor Demand Could Be A Deal-Breaker (LAT)204
North Korea Hedges On Nuclear Deal (WT/AP)....205
Diplomacy And Double Talk (LAT)....206
'Wonderful Step' In Korea? (USAT)....207
Progress In Beijing (WSJ)....207
Accord With North Korea (WP) 208
Arrest Ties Pyongyang To Counterfeit $100 Bills (WT)....209
U.N. Nuclear Inspector Calls For Talks On Iran (USAT) 210
Taiwan Slammed On Lax Defense (WT) 211
China Terse About Action On Abuses Of One-Child Policy (WP)....212
US Having A Hard Time Finding Allies For UN Reform (CSM)....212
The U.N. Must Look For A New Secretary-General (WSJ) ...213
Germany In Limbo As 2 Stake Claim To Chancellorship (USAT)....215
After German Election, Deadlock Hardens (NYT)....216
Who Will Take Germany's Top Office? (CSM) 217
Germany Faces Leadership Standoff (WSJ) 218
Maneuvering Begins For A New German Government (WP)220
Germany's Political Impasse May Take Weeks To Solve, Observers Say (KRT)....221
Tied German Rivals Try To Forge Coalitions (WT)....222
Euro Falls As Germany Splits After Poll Stalemate (FT)....223
Europe's Direction Is Unclear, Much As Germany's Is After Vote (NYT)....224
Merkel Is The Big Loser In Germany's Elections (WSJ)....225
Colombian Violence Spills Over (WT) 226
Rights Report Details Uzbek Crackdown After Uprising In May (NYT)....228
Uzbekistan Accused Of Coercion In Protest Probe (WP) 229
Lining Up To Be Raped? (NYT)....230

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al Qaeda Suspect Tells Of Bush Plot (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

A Falls Church man charged with conspiring with al Qaeda to kill President Bush told Saudi interrogators that he dreamed up the plot on his own but that it never got past the "idea stage," prosecutors say in court documents unsealed yesterday.

"I wanted to be the brain, the planner" of the assassination, Ahmed Omar Abu Ali is quoted as saying. He likened himself to Mohamed Atta, who led the terror cell that carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, according to the court papers, which quote from an FBI report detailing Abu Ali's interrogation by Saudi security officials while he was detained in the kingdom in June 2003.

"My idea was . . . I would walk on the street as the President walked by, and I would get close enough to shoot him, or I would use a car bomb," Abu Ali is quoted as saying.

Abu Ali, 24, also said during the same interrogation that he "wanted to be in al Qaeda so bad that I decided to go to Afghanistan for jihad." He said he was unable to get a visa to travel there but did join an al Qaeda cell in Saudi Arabia.

The court filings were unsealed the same day as a federal judge in the District dismissed a civil lawsuit that Abu Ali's parents filed against the U.S. government last year. The lawsuit was part of a highly public campaign by Abu Ali's family to win his release from Saudi custody. It asked the court to order that Abu Ali be returned to the United States and alleged that U.S. authorities were involved in his imprisonment there and expected he would be tortured.

DOJ_NMG_0006490

But U.S. District Judge John D. Bates said the issues raised by the lawsuit were moot because Abu Ali is back in the United States and in custody on the criminal charges. Bates said his ruling does not prevent the family from filing another civil suit over Abu Ali's treatment.

Morton Sklar, an attorney for Abu Ali's parents, said the civil lawsuit is not moot. "The issues of Ahmed's unlawful detention in Saudi Arabia for 20 months and his torture in Saudi Arabia are highly relevant to his criminal case," said Sklar, executive director of the World Organization for Human Rights USA, which filed the lawsuit. He would not say whether the ruling will be appealed.

Abu Ali is charged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria with conspiracy to kill Bush and other terrorism counts. Prosecutors say he has admitted to plotting with al Qaeda to conduct a Sept. 11-style terrorist attack in the United States.

Defense attorneys are also pursuing the torture allegation in the criminal case, arguing that any statements Abu Ali made while in Saudi custody were obtained through torture. Two doctors who examined Abu Ali found evidence that he was tortured in Saudi Arabia, including scars on his back consistent with having been whipped, defense attorneys have said in court papers.

Abu Ali was arrested by Saudi security officials in June 2003 while he was studying at a university in the country. He was held until he was charged in the United States in February. Prosecutors have denied that Abu Ali was tortured. The issue is critical to the case, because if a federal judge concludes that Abu Ali was tortured, much of the evidence against him could be thrown out.

In their response to Abu Ali's motion to throw out his confession and other evidence, prosecutors wrote that several Saudi security officials have already testified that Abu Ali was "treated in a respectful and humane manner while in Saudi custody." That same filing contained the additional details of Abu Ali's interrogations.

U.S. Details Charges Against Student Linked To Plot Against Bush (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - An American student in Saudi Arabia who is charged with plotting to assassinate President Bush told Saudi interrogators that "I came up with the idea on my own" because he wanted to be "the brain, the planner" for a terrorist operation, American prosecutors said in a court filing made public on Monday.

The Justice Department said the student, Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, 24, "represents one of the most dangerous terrorist threats that America faces in the perilous world after September 11, 2001: an Al Qaeda operative born and raised in the United States, trained and committed to carry out deadly attacks on American soil."

The department made the claims in opposing efforts by Mr. Abu Ali's lawyers to throw out his statements to Saudi interrogators. The defense lawyers maintain that his admissions came only after he was tortured and beaten repeatedly.

The department called the charges of torture a "fabrication." The prosecutors said that Mr. Abu Ali, after he was arrested in Saudi Arabia in 2003, was confronted with evidence of his extremist ties and "quickly launched into a prolonged and detailed confession" of his involvement with a Saudi cell linked to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Abu Ali, now in custody in Alexandria, Va., faces life in prison if convicted on charges of conspiring to assassinate Mr. Bush and attack American airliners.

Judge Gerald Bruce Lee of United States District Court also ruled Monday that the Justice Department would be allowed to offer depositions from two Saudi officials under highly unusual conditions.

The Saudi officials, who were involved in Mr. Abu Ali's interrogation, will be allowed to testify using pseudonyms via a live video feed from Saudi Arabia, with the courtroom in Alexandria closed to all but a handful of lawyers and court officials. The arrangements were necessary, Judge Lee said, because the Saudis "will not allow them to travel here to participate in judicial proceedings."

The case is a crucial test of the ability of American prosecutors to bring a case that relies heavily on intelligence gathered by foreign officials under disputed conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0006491

The Justice Department's filing says that agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation first interviewed Mr. Abu Ali themselves in September 2003 for four days. Because the aim was to gather intelligence rather than build a criminal case, the agents did not read him Miranda warnings, nor did they stop questioning him once he requested a lawyer, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors sought to debunk claims of torture by quoting from telephone conversations Mr. Abu Ali had with his parents in Northern Virginia while he was in Saudi custody. "I am very healthy," prosecutors quoted him as saying.

John K. Zwerling, a lawyer who represented Mr. Abu Ali initially in the case before withdrawing, said in a telephone interview that the statements were meaningless.

"Would he want to worry them?" Mr. Zwerling asked. "And who's standing next to him when he's making these calls? The head of the prison. If he says anything else, what do you think is going to happen to him?"

Mr. Zwerling said the plots Mr. Abu Ali reportedly said he considered - like getting close enough to Mr. Bush to shoot him or breaking into the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and freeing prisoners - were "ludicrous."

And he ridiculed the Justice Department's claims about the danger Mr. Abu Ali posed.

"If he's the most dangerous guy they have," Mr. Zwerling said, "then we're very lucky, because I don't believe he's very dangerous at all."

Md. Man Charged In Terror Case (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Brigid Schulte, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Federal prosecutors in Alexandria unveiled terrorism charges against a Maryland man yesterday, alleging that Ali Asad Chandia helped a foreign terrorist group acquire an electronic autopilot system and video equipment for use on model airplanes.

Chandia, 28, of College Park, is also accused of shipping 50,000 paint balls to the group, Lashkar-i-Taiba, which the U.S. government has designated as a terrorist organization. The group runs terrorist camps in Pakistan and claims to have trained thousands of Islamic "holy warrior" mujahideen to fight in Afghanistan, Kashmir, Bosnia, Chechnya, Kosovo and the Philippines.

The charges against Chandia, a legal permanent resident who emigrated from Pakistan in 1994, are an outgrowth of the "Virginia jihad network" case, in which nine Muslim men have been convicted over the past two years of training overseas for holy war against the United States. The training also included playing paint ball in the Virginia countryside.

Some of the defendants attended terrorist camps in Pakistan run by Lashkar-i-Taiba.

The indictment accuses Chandia of traveling to a Lashkar office in Lahore, Pakistan, in November 2001, shortly after resigning from his job at a Costco store. "I have to leave now due to some family emergency," Chandia is alleged to have written to his supervisor at the time.

In Pakistan, he worked with other defendants to help a top Lashkar official, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, obtain equipment for the group, prosecutors allege. Khan, a British national who is jailed there on terrorism counts, was also named in the four-count indictment unsealed yesterday in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

The equipment allegedly included 50,000 paint balls and components of an MP1000SYS system, which the indictment describes as an "electronic automatic pilot system" that can be installed on a small, remote-controlled airplane using Global Positioning System cordinates.

Some of the equipment was sent by two California companies to Khan's address in England, but it was unclear if any was used by Lashkar -- or if any was intended for use in the United States.

Prosecutors would not comment beyond the indictment, which charges Chandia and Khan with providing, and conspiring to provide, material support to Lashkar-i-Taiba. If convicted, they each face up to 15 years in prison.

Federal officials arrested Chandia on Thursday night at his home in Maryland. Wearing an orange T-shirt, khakis and sneakers, he appeared briefly yesterday in federal court in Alexandria and was ordered jailed pending a detention hearing Tuesday.

His attorney, Marvin Miller, described him as a studious man and University of Maryland graduate who has written articles on both Islam and Jesus Christ. His mother and his wife, who both sat watching in the courtroom, said Chandia is a teacher at a Muslim school.

"This is a molehill case, and the government is going to have to make a mountain out of it," Miller said.

Miller said the remote-controlled airplanes -- which the indictment says can have military uses -- "don't have big ranges, certainly nothing like the drones with the satellite systems the U.S. military has."

But the indictment paints a different portrait of Chandia, saying that a 2003 search of his Maryland home found books, tapes and videos supporting "violent jihad," including one by a Lashkar leader titled "Jihad is the best defence for oppressed Muslims."

Court documents also describe Chandia as the former "personal assistant" of Ali Al-Timimi, the convicted spiritual leader of the men who trained for jihad. In 2000 and 2001, the indictment says, Chandia helped Timimi with speaking engagements, typing and "research on Islamic subjects."

Timimi was convicted this year by a federal jury of inciting his followers to attend terrorist camps abroad and prepare to battle U.S. troops. He was sentenced to life in prison in July.

Prosecutors said Timimi exerted a strong influence over the other defendants when he was the primary lecturer at the Center for Islamic Information and Education, also known as Dar Al-Arqam, in Falls Church.

Eleven Muslim men, all but one from the Washington area, were charged in 2003 with participating in paramilitary training -- including playing paint ball -- to prepare for "holy war" abroad. Two of the men were acquitted.

Chandia offered to cooperate against the other defendants but only in return for immunity from prosecution, Miller said yesterday. He said the government declined the offer.

College Park Man Charged In Plot To Aid Terrorist Group (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A College Park man has been charged with conspiracy to help a terrorist group, part of an investigation of the "Virginia jihad network" that so far has resulted in 10 convictions, U.S. law-enforcement officials said yesterday.

Ali Asad Chandia is named in a four-count indictment saying he conspired to provide material support to the Lashkar-e-Taiba group, which the U.S. designated a terrorist group in 2001.

Mr. Chandia was arrested Thursday at his home, Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said.

The indictment was returned Wednesday and unsealed yesterday after Mr. Chandia's arrest.

Mohammed Ajmal Khan of Coventry, England, who prosecutors said is a senior official in Lashkar-e-Taiba, an Islamic rebel group fighting for independence in the India-controlled portion of Kashmir, is also charged.

Mr. Khan is in custody in England.

Ali al-Timimi, who authorities called the spiritual leader of the Virginia jihad network, was sentenced to life in prison in July after being convicted of soliciting treason and other charges.

Prosecutors said al-Timimi wielded enormous influence among a group of young Muslim men in Northern Virginia who played paintball games in 2000 and 2001 in preparation for holy war around the globe.

Nine other members of the group have been convicted for their roles in the conspiracy, with prison terms ranging from three years to life.

U.S. Says Maryland Man Aided Pakistani Terror Group (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 - A Maryland man who federal authorities say served as a research assistant to a controversial Muslim leader in the Washington area has been charged with providing equipment and support to a banned terrorist group in Pakistan.

But a lawyer for the man, Ali Asad Chandia, said the charges amounted to guilt by association.

Mr. Chandia, 28, is the latest in a string of young Muslim men charged in the so-called Virginia jihad case. Ten people have been convicted in the case in connection with what federal authorities say was a plot to wage war against Americans overseas by aiding a terrorist group in Pakistan called Lashkar-e-Taiba.

DOJ_NMG_0006493

Prosecutors say the young men convicted in the case underwent training - in part by playing paintball in rural Virginia - to provide military aid overseas in defense of Islam. Some Muslim leaders in Northern Virginia refer to the prosecution derisively as "the paintball case," insisting that the men were guilty of little more than playing games and speaking out against American foreign policy.

Mr. Chandia was arrested Thursday evening at his home in College Park, Md., the Justice Department said. A federal indictment against him says he had been a personal assistant to Ali al-Timimi, a Muslim leader and scholar in Northern Virginia who was sentenced to life in prison in July for inciting his followers to violence.

The indictment says Mr. Chandia helped Mr. Timimi schedule appearances and speaking engagements and research Islamic subjects. In a meeting on Sept. 16, 2001, at the home of another defendant in the Virginia case, Mr. Timimi reportedly told other followers that "it was compulsory to assist Afghanistan in jihad against the expected U.S. military invasion," the indictment says.

The indictment says Mr. Chandia visited Pakistan in November 2001 and, after returning to the United States, helped ship 21 boxes of paintball supplies from Virginia to Lahore, Pakistan.

The indictment also charges a man now in British custody, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, who American authorities said was a senior official with Lashkar-e-Taiba and served as a procurement officer.

Both men were charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, which was designated by the United States as a foreign terrorist organization in December 2001. Each of the four charges carries a maximum of 15 years in prison.

Mr. Chandia made a brief appearance Friday in federal court in Alexandria, Va., and is scheduled for a bail hearing on Tuesday.

His lawyer, Marvin D. Miller, declined to discuss the specific accusations against Mr. Chandia because he had not yet reviewed the indictment in detail, but he said the charges were groundless and amounted to "a great case of guilt by association."

Mr. Miller said that Mr. Chandia was held as a material witness for several weeks in 2003 in connection with the Virginia jihad case but that talks to secure his cooperation lapsed when the government refused to offer him immunity.

"The government doesn't have anything else to do, so now they're going back to a guy they had two years ago, and they'll say he's a flight risk," Mr. Miller said. "With their great skill in making innocent events look really dangerous, they take something that normally wouldn't pass the laugh test and turn it into an indictment."

In a separate terrorism investigation in Memphis, an Egyptian student at the University of Memphis was ordered held without bond Thursday after federal law enforcement officials said he had bogus credentials and had ordered $2,500 worth of pilot paraphernalia and flight instructional material over the Internet this summer.

The student, Mahmoud Maawad, 29, is charged with wire fraud and fraudulent use of a Social Security number. An assistant United States attorney, Steve Parker, described the accusations outlined in an affidavit and search warrant for Mr. Maawad's Memphis apartment as "scary," and said he was a flight risk.

A criminal complaint says Mr. Maawad used a debit card in June, July and August to order $3,300 worth of merchandise from Sporty's Pilot Shop in Batavia, Ohio.

An affidavit for a search warrant lists items including a private pilot course, flight simulator software, a flight gear bag, maps of the Memphis airport, a $239 leather Navy flight jacket, a DVD titled "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act" and instructional programs on airplane terminology.

Prosecutors, Al-Arian Defense Dispute Payment (TAMPTRIB)

By MICHAEL FECHTER

Tampa Tribune, September 20, 2005

TAMPA - In a trial in which "shirts" and "magazines" are considered coded references to money, talk about "books" just may be talk about books, a defense attorney said Monday.

FBI agent Ed Ortega acknowledged a secretly recorded telephone call about a 2003 money transfer to the Middle East did reference books for defendant Sameeh Hammoudeh.

DOJ_NMG_0006494

Hammoudeh is one of four men, including former University of South Florida professor Sami Al-Arian, charged with conspiracy to commit racketeering and to provide material support to terrorists. Last week, Ortega detailed a series of money transfers defendant Hatim Fariz sent to a charity that prosecutors say is part of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group.

Ortega's testimony showed the defendants discussing money, then arranging to send it through a Chicago financial services office.

Under questioning by defense attorney Stephen Bernstein, Ortega acknowledged he doesn't read or speak Arabic and did not check to see whether Hammoudeh or other defendants ever received books mentioned in a call with Hammoudeh's father in the West Bank. After Hammoudeh's father indicated he had not received an anticipated $1,000 transfer, the men talked about a specific author and whether Sameeh Hammoudeh needed copies of the Koran.

Later, defense attorney Kevin Beck, who represents Fariz, picked up on Bernstein's point. Ortega said he didn't know whether the conversation, in fact, was about books.

"Sir, how do you know they are not?" Beck fired back.

Other calls preceding money transfers discussed buying an ambulance for a Gaza hospital and supporting a charity for blind women.

The money was not sent directly to those outlets. Rather, most of it went to the Elehssan Society, considered an arm of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad that operates in the West Bank and Gaza. Agents found printouts of a Web page from the society when they searched Fariz's home after his 2003 arrest.

Beck emphasized the society's self description as a cultural and charitable and athletic club established in 1998. It even had a theater troupe called Al Noor, Beck said, reading from the document.

But federal prosecutor Alexis Collins twice pointed to a play performed by that troupe, called "Children rushing toward martyrdom."

She also pointed to the Elehssan Society's report that the troupe performed for Hamas leader Ahmed Yassin and an Islamic Jihad leader named Abdullah Al-Shami.

Meanwhile, defense attorneys are fighting government plans to recall two computer experts to introduce evidence from an Islamic Jihad Web site called Qudsway.com. Assistant U.S. Attorney Terry Zitek said the FBI experts discovered new information after testifying in June.

The evidence shows Salah Abu Hassanein, the recipient of many money transfers from Fariz, used the Web page to communicate with Fariz and others.

Agents also have determined that the Web site is based in Tehran, Iran, a country that provides the Islamic Jihad with the bulk of its funding.

Allison Guagliardo, another of Fariz's attorneys, argued that the evidence is coming too late for the defense to prepare adequately. Their computer expert estimates needing four to six weeks to analyze the new material.

"At this point," she said, "it's way too late in the game for us to be able to deal with this," she said.

She added that information from Web sites constitutes hearsay and cannot pass legal hurdles. Moody deferred ruling on the motion until he receives more specific information from the defense experts. WHAT HAPPENED

Prosecutors and defense attorneys offer varying interpretations of money the defendants sent to a Palestinian charity from 2001-03.

More Details: Possible Terror Plans (WCPO-TV)

By Lance Barry

WCPO-TV, September 20, 2005

There is new information on an Egyptian college student being held under suspicions of terrorism in Tennessee.

As 9News first reported on Sunday, it was a tip from a Batavia business that led the feds to the suspect who is illegally in the country.

On Monday 9News obtained the receipts for the items the suspect tried to purchase this summer from Sporty's Pilot Shop. His credit card was denied, which prompted the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0006495

9News uncovered items that seem to point to a far more extensive interest in aviation than first thought.

At fifteen pages and more than $3,000, these receipts were enough to pique the interest of federal agents in Mahmoud Maawad.

Besides a flight jacket and flight equipment that Maawad purchased, 9News found other items on the receipts, including aviation maps of his home airport in Memphis, Tennessee and cassettes on listening to control tower communications.

9News wanted to ask Sporty's why anyone might need access to purchase those items, but their spokesperson would only give us an off camera statement, saying, "Sporty's does not make comments on matters which may involve national security."

As 9News first reported Sunday, another DVD Maawad purchased this summer from Sporty's was titled "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act."

Sporty's tells us the DVD isn't meant for people to learn how to deceive, but rather to teach proper etiquette to new pilots.

Sporty's also offers in-flight training to prospective pilots at their Clermont County airport facility.

9News asked the company whether the suspect had come there to receive any in-person training but were told he had not.

The University of Memphis freshman was a 29-year-old economics student.

He has yet to be charged with any terrorist planning, but is facing wire fraud allegations that he stole a social security number to make the purchases online from Sporty's.

He remains in federal custody being held without bond.

There are no allegations that Sporty's did or sold anything illegal. 9News was told if someone had even a small interest in aviation it would be hard to not order something from the business as it's one of the country's leading mail order suppliers of aviation material.

SAFETY MEASURES QUESTIONED (NBC5CINN)

NBC 5 Cinncinati, September 19, 2005

CINCINNATI -- A chief Tri-State law enforcement official said it's time to beef up safety measures at stores that sell pilot equipment, News 5's Brian Hamrick reported.

Mahmoud Maawad, now the center of a federal investigation, bought almost $3,000 worth of equipment from a Sporty's Pilot Shop in Batavia over the Internet, Hamrick reported.

Sporty's sells everything a pilot could need -- uniforms, maps, even instructional DVDs.

Store managment notified the FBI when Maawad didn't pay for the items he purchased, and investigators found out he didn't have a Social Security number and isn't even in the United States legally.

Michael Snowden, director of homeland security for Hamilton County, said Maawad's case reveals carelessness in a system meant to protect American flyers after 9/11.

"Unfortunately, it's not that difficult to obtain identification, insignia badges -- those are all easily obtained," he said

In Maawad's Memphis apartment, federal agents found $2,500 worth of pilot paraphernalia, including a DVD called "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act" and a chart of the Memphis airport.

"It's very concerning, because part of what we're trying to do with homeland security is to make sure all of our critical assets and infrastructure are all secure," Snowden said.

No one with Sporty's would speak with Hamrick. And while it's not illegal for the store to sell a pilot's uniform to someone who's not a pilot, Snowden said he thinks retailers need to be cautious.

"I would think at the very least they should be checking it out," he said.

Man With Local Ties Ordered To Leave The U. S. (WDTN-TV)

WDTN-TV, September 20, 2005

A Jordanian native who had been living in the Miami Valley was ordered to leave the country after being investigated for possible connections to terrorism.

Thirty-three year old Mohammed Obeid had been living in Piqua, and was engaged to a Piqua woman when the FBI raided their home last summer, taking Obeid into custody.

DOJ_NMG_0006496

An immigration judge had ordered him jailed on accusations of marriage fraud. He'd been married to, then divorced from two different American women before meeting the Piqua woman. Authorities claimed he was marrying women just to stay in the country.

The FBI claimed he was visiting terrorist related web sites at the couple's Piqua apartment.

On Monday, another hearing was held, this one in Monroe, Michigan. It was originally scheduled to be in Detroit, but they ended up holding it in the Monroe County jail because "security concerns."

Obeid and his attorney do have 30 days to appeal the judge's decision to remove him from the United States.

He is to be held in jail until that happens.

Al Qaeda Admits To London Bombings (WT/AP)

By Maggie Michael, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

CAIRO -- Al Qaeda deputy leader Ayman al-Zawahri said in a statement broadcast yesterday that his terror network carried out the July 7 London bombings, marking the group's first direct claim of responsibility for the attacks that killed 52 persons.

"The blessed London attack was one which al Qaeda was honored to launch against the British crusader's arrogance and against the American crusader aggression on the Islamic nation for 100 years," al-Zawahri said in the tape aired on Al Jazeera TV.

"In their final testament, the heroic brothers in the London attacks ... provided great lessons to the Islamic nation and Muslims in Pakistan to oppose the infidels," said al-Zawahri, who was shown wearing a white turban.

The attacks also killed the four bombers.

A spokeswoman for London's Metropolitan Police said she had no immediate comment on the tape.

Al-Zawahri also challenged the legitimacy of Afghanistan's parliamentary elections Sunday, saying they were held "under the terror of the lords of war," an apparent reference to the country's government.

The election reference suggested the tape was made recently. Al Jazeera showed five minutes of it.

The Egyptian-born al-Zawahri also denounced U.S. demands for political reform around the world, including in Islamic countries.

"The Americans will not allow any Islamic regime to take power in the heart of the Islamic world unless it is a regime collaborating with them as happens in Iraq," he said.

PATRIOT ACT:

Gag-Rule Decree Sets Off A Clash Over Patriot Act (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Even as Congress moves to renew much of the 2001 Patriot Act, a federal judge in Connecticut has set up a clash over one of the antiterror law's most contentious provisions.

The Justice Department moved to block and is appealing a recent decision by U.S. District Judge Janet Hall that strikes down the gag orders imposed on recipients of so-called National Security Letters as part of a terrorism probe. NSLs are requests for information similar to subpoenas but are issued by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, not a grand jury, and aren't reviewed by a judge.

The Patriot Act prohibits disclosure of NSLs. In its appeals-court filing, the Justice Department cited the harm in "alerting the target of the investigation that his activities are subject to scrutiny, and allowing the target to hide, move his activities to another provider, provide misinformation to the government or otherwise frustrate the FBI's investigation."

But in her Sept. 9 ruling, the judge found in favor of the recipient of a recent letter, dubbed John Doe because of the gag order, and the American Civil Liberties Union. She said that the way the law was written has "the practical effect of silencing individuals with a constitutionally protected interest in speech and whose voices are particularly important in an ongoing national debate about the intrusion of governmental authority into individual lives."

DOJ_NMG_0006497

Congress is reviewing the Patriot Act, which was passed in the weeks following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror strikes to give federal investigators more tools to prevent attacks. Sixteen provisions of the law will expire at the end of the year if not renewed. The NSL provision, while not among those 16, has been the target of much discussion because the secrecy requirements raise concerns about abuse.

"Our point isn't that the government could never justify a limited secrecy order in an ongoing investigation," said Ann Beeson, associate legal director at the ACLU. "Our point is they are required to justify that order by showing that the disclosure of that information would undermine a compelling government interest. In this case, the district court looked at their classified evidence and decided they hadn't."

This isn't the first time a federal judge has ruled against the government on NSLs. Last September, a district judge in New York declared unconstitutional a similar letter, sent to an Internet-service provider, on the grounds that it violated free-speech rights. The Justice Department has appealed the decision.

The ACLU and other civil-rights groups have been pressing Congress and the Bush administration to rein in some of the Patriot Act. But in July, the Senate and the House both passed similar versions of the law, extending 14 of the 16 provisions due to end. Differences are expected to be hammered out in coming weeks.

WAR NEWS:

Estimate Puts Afghan Turnout At 50% For Vote (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 20, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — Lamia Aszada had high hopes when she cast a vote for the first time in Afghanistan's presidential election last fall. She picked a winner, too: Hamid Karzai won in a landslide.

Aszada, 40, a civil servant who earns $40 a month at Afghanistan's Education Ministry, didn't vote in equally historic legislative elections Sunday. Her enthusiasm for democracy faded when Karzai failed to come through with raises for government workers.

“He is a liar guy,” she said. She also was appalled by some of the names she saw on the ballot: warlords who plundered and destroyed Kabul in the 1990s. “They robbed my house four times, the warlords,” she said Monday. “Why should I vote for them?”

Turned off by the candidates, intimidated by the threat of violence and assuming a been-there, done-that attitude toward what had been the novelty of voting, hundreds of thousands of Afghans like Aszada sat out Sunday's elections.

Vote counting begins today. Final results are expected in early October because some ballots are being delivered from remote regions. When the count is completed, the turnout is expected to come in well below that of last year's presidential election, in which 70% of eligible voters cast ballots.

Chief electoral officer Peter Erben said Monday that early results suggest 6 million Afghans voted, about 50% of registered voters and well below expectations. Erben, a Dane who has worked on elections in Bosnia, Kosovo, East Timor, the Palestinian territories and Iraq, declared the turnout figures “satisfactory.” He said there always is great initial enthusiasm for voting in “post-conflict” countries, as in Afghanistan's presidential election. That cools, he said, usually settling at turnout rates of about 50%.

Erben said the stakes in the legislative elections were not as “tangible” as they had been in the simple choice for presidency: Nationwide, nearly 6,000 candidates contended Sunday for 249 seats in the Wolesi Jirga, or lower house of the Afghan National Assembly, and 420 provincial council seats. To make things easier in a country where 49% of men and 79% of women are illiterate, planners devised ballots that let voters identify candidates by their photographs, by a number and by a symbol.

Nevertheless, the number of candidates made for bewildering ballots: In Kabul, the National Assembly ballot had 390 candidates and required seven pages.

DOJ_NMG_0006498

Erben said the ballots were designed to be completed in 10 minutes and that "many" voters managed to complete them in three or four minutes. However, some voters in Kabul had trouble locating their candidate. "They were wasting 10 or 15 minutes, and still they couldn't find the guy," said Shahnaz Qasmi, a high school principal and election officer.

Before the vote, the Taliban warned Afghans to boycott the polls. In a statement Monday, President Bush said Afghan voters had defied the Taliban and "those who threaten their lives."

The threats did not stop the vote. What stopped many from going to the polls was the candidates. Among those running for office were former Taliban leaders and commanders such as fundamentalist warlord Abdul Rabb al-Rasul Sayyaf. His forces battled other factions in Kabul from 1992 to 1996.

"It's better not to vote for anybody," said Rasul Beg, 25. "In Afghanistan, it is too hard to find someone who will serve the people. They are all criminals."

Was his view jaded because he'd been exposed to corruption in his job as a government anti-narcotics officer? Beg smiled: "Maybe."

Afghan Electorate's Message: The Provinces Need Public Works And Restoration Of Order (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 19 - The winners and losers of the landmark Afghan elections on Sunday will remain a mystery for another several weeks, but whoever makes it to the legislature will quickly be tested against the universal axiom of parliamentary democracy: that all politics is local.

With widespread frustration over the pace by which the central government in Kabul is distributing reconstruction aid to the provinces, diplomats and election observers said, the test of credibility for the new Parliament will be its ability to deliver on the peace dividend, from roads and bridges to law and order.

Speaking to reporters on Monday, the United States ambassador, Ronald E. Neumann, acknowledged that citizens' expectations for internationally financed reconstruction projects were running high, for everything from public works to a functional justice system.

"These expectations of the people will have to be met," Mr. Neumann said. "What the election does is give the Afghan people a new channel to voice their opinions and demands."

He took pains to offer reassurance that the United States and other foreign donors would stay the course in Afghanistan's recovery. "It's going to be long term," he said. "This job is not done. For Afghanistan to be stable and peaceful, the international community is going to have to stay involved for a long time."

In the elections on Sunday, in which Afghans voted for a 249-seat lower house of Parliament and for 34 provincial councils, an estimated six million people voted. The turnout of a little over 50 percent was far lower than expected, election officials said. Results are expected by Oct. 22.

The provincial councils and the president will in turn select members of the 51-seat upper house. Parliament is to convene in December.

Mr. Neumann, as well as European election observers and Afghan election officials, insisted that despite threats from insurgents linked to the country's former Taliban rulers, violence was scattered and lower in intensity than had been feared.

The chief of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, Jean Arnault, said that to maintain their credibility, the executive and legislative branches would have to answer to a public increasingly frustrated about the lack of visible improvements.

"One of the very, very widespread complaints about reconstruction process today is where is the money going," Mr. Arnault said. "There is a sense out there that resources are not fairly allocated."

An elected Parliament, he said, will prompt accountability on the part of President Hamid Karzai's administration and his international backers.

DOJ_NMG_0006499

Likewise, a preliminary assessment of the reconstruction efforts, issued last week by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, based in Washington, found that while security had improved in the nearly four years since the American-led military overthrow of the Taliban, good governance, a working criminal justice system and economic development remained dangerously lacking. The report described the Karzai government as weak.

"A broad foundation for success is being built, but too few needs have been met in Afghans' day-to-day-lives," the report said. "The formal justice system in Afghanistan remains unable to confront impunity, adjudicate land disputes, unravel criminal networks or protect citizens' rights. Economic growth has been significant but uneven."

Peter Erben, the chief of the United Nations-assisted Joint Election Management Board, said Monday that the election turnout was satisfactory, considering that post-conflict elections usually begin with high participation and then level off. He gave the example of Bosnia, where he said turnout was about 70 percent in 1996, shortly after the end of the war there, only to drop to about 55 percent by 2002.

In Afghanistan there were other explanations for the turnout beyond the threat of violence. Voters and election observers said the ballot was confusing, with voters in Kabul, for instance, having to sift through a list of roughly 400 parliamentary candidates to make their one selection. Some voters appeared not to understand the function of a Parliament, a weakness that critics attributed to weak civic education in the prelude to elections.

More worrying was a creeping sense of disillusionment with the fairness of the democratic process.

"I thought it might be again the same spaghetti and the same plate," said Zubair Ahmed, 29, who is unemployed. He said he tore up his voting card after the election for president last October. "There was no motive for voting again," he said. "We expected a change after the presidential election, but nothing happened."

Humayoun, 24, a farmer from a village in the Shomali plain, just north of Kabul, said: "Why we should bother to vote? The people in the Parliament are already selected. They come sealed and stamped from America, like Karzai."

Those who did turn out Sunday said they had come with hope that their choice for Parliament would bring their communities a greater share of reconstruction assistance.

"I'm hoping for security first, then roads, then education," said Muhammad Tahir, 45, a Kandahar shopkeeper.

Nur Alam, 54, a farmer in a village north of Kabul, said, speaking of the newly elected officials: "They should definitely do it for us, because they cannot sit on their chair and do nothing. Of course if they don't do anything, people will not vote for them the next time."

Voter Turnout At About 50 Percent (WT)

By Carmen Gentile

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan -- Early returns show a lower-than-expected voter turnout for the embattled nation's widely anticipated parliamentary elections, electoral officials said yesterday.

Peter Erben, the chief electoral official for the Sunday vote, said about half of Afghanistan's 12.4 million registered voters cast ballots.

"With these early indications, I can say turnout appears just over 50 percent," said Mr. Erben yesterday at a press conference in the capital, Kabul. He made the assessment after a third of polling stations in Afghanistan's 34 provinces reported the volume of their voter traffic.

In the presidential election last year, about 70 percent of registered voters headed to the polls, and ahead of the Sunday vote, many officials had predicted that between 80 percent and 85 percent of eligible voters would head to the polls.

Officials expect the vote tally to take more than two weeks, with results likely announced in the next two weeks, although it could be mid-October before the results are announced.

Afghans went to the polls to select 249 members of the country's Wolesi Jirga, or "House of People." It is the first time since 1969 that a Wolesi Jirga was chosen by a democratic vote.

They also selected provincial leaders among the thousands of candidates vying for hundreds of local positions.

Terrorist attacks early Sunday might have hurt turnout, even though the day passed relatively peacefully.

DOJ_NMG_0006500

Several polling stations visited by The Washington Times in Kabul late Sunday were devoid of the long lines seen earlier in the day.

U.N. and Afghan electoral officials, working together in the elections, reported that polling stations in other provinces were packed all day and even stayed open past the 4 p.m. cutoff time to get those in line to vote.

The hard-line Taliban, which once ruled almost all of Afghanistan under a version of Islamic law that prohibits girls from going to school, had threatened to disrupt the voting.

In Ghazni province, lines for female voters reportedly were longer than those for men. The vote was particularly poignant for women, because 25 percent of Wolesi Jirga seats have been set aside for women.

At a ballot collection station outside Kandahar Stadium, where the Taliban used to conduct public executions and amputations for crimes such as adultery and theft, security officer Gulam Mohendeen gestured fondly toward 20 trucks loaded with ballot boxes collected from polling stations nationwide.

"Though the country still doesn't have a real government, these boxes represent the future of Afghanistan," he said.

Is Pakistan Doing Its Part In The War On Terrorism? (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 20, 2005

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Police commandos burst into an all-girls madrassa here in what was meant to be a dramatic example of Pakistan's commitment to cracking down on Islamic extremism and religious schools that promote it. But the July 19 raid turned into a debacle.

Caught without their veils, the teenage girls screamed — and then rallied. Grabbing mops, brooms, stones and knives, they drove the commandos out. The retreating police fired back with tear gas. The girls staggered into the street, where the melee continued; 62 students had to be hospitalized after the police beat them with batons.

The target of the raid was extremist mullahs from Islamabad's Red Mosque, which runs the school and is famous for organizing anti-American, pro-Taliban demonstrations. No one was arrested, and police even missed a chance to nab one of the mosque's top clerics: Hours before the raid, Abdul Rashid Ghazi had been in police headquarters for a routine meeting with the commissioner. “They could have arrested me there,” Ghazi says.

So goes Pakistan's campaign against homegrown religious extremism: considerable drama, few results. President Pervez Musharraf has taken huge risks — he has survived two assassination attempts — to hunt down al-Qaeda fugitives. He has sent thousands of troops to battle militants along the lawless border with Afghanistan. But his government has been reluctant to go after its former allies: the Taliban in Afghanistan and groups that have fought a proxy war against Indian troops in disputed Kashmir. It also has been slow to crack down on madrassas that teach intolerance and glorify jihad, or holy war.

As a result, Pakistan is still turning out young militants burning to kill and die for their extreme interpretations of Islam.

Pakistani forces also have been unable to find two of the world's most-wanted men — Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar — after four years of searching. The fugitives are believed to be hiding along the Afghan border.

Musharraf's pledge to eradicate extremism is coming under closer scrutiny four years after the U.S. began its military campaign to topple the Taliban. A recent upsurge in Taliban attacks on U.S. troops in Afghanistan near the Pakistani border is raising questions about the degree to which the militants are receiving sanctuary, training and supplies inside Pakistan.

There also is concern that the militants might be getting support from rogue elements of Musharraf's own security services.

“It's very obvious (the militants) are interfering in Afghanistan,” says Gen. Abdul Manan Farahi, head of counterterrorism at the Afghan Interior Ministry. “They are coming into Afghanistan from Pakistan. They are being trained in Pakistani madrassas.”

Pakistan rejects criticism

Pakistani officials reject the criticism. “We should not be accusing each other,” says Jehangir Karamat, Pakistan's ambassador to the United States.

Although Pakistan once supported the Taliban, the government insists it has no incentive to do so now. “Pakistan has absolutely nothing to gain from a destabilized Afghanistan,” Karamat says.

DOJ_NMG_0006501

Pakistan is developing its southern port of Gwadar in anticipation of increased trade with Afghanistan and central Asia. “This can happen only when Afghanistan is at peace,” says Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, Pakistan's military spokesman.

Pakistan has dispatched more than 80,000 troops to hunt militants along the rugged Afghan border. They've captured 700 al-Qaeda suspects and endured heavy losses: 270 Pakistani troops killed, another 600 wounded, Sultan says.

But Pakistan has been more aggressive rounding up foreign al-Qaeda fighters than militants with origins closer to home. Musharraf “has been making a distinction between al-Qaeda, the Taliban and homegrown Pakistani groups,” says Husain Haqqani, a visiting scholar from Pakistan at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

Sultan says only 46 Taliban leaders have been arrested. Pakistan's military, which overthrew an elected government in a bloodless 1999 coup that put Musharraf in power, has old ties to the Taliban and to domestic extremist groups.

The United States and Pakistan encouraged Muslims to wage a successful jihad against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s. Emboldened by the Afghan triumph, Pakistan recruited militants to fight the Indian army in Kashmir, a low-budget way to bleed the Indian occupation of territory Pakistan claims as its own. Pakistan also threw its support behind the Taliban as the militia seized power in Afghanistan, convinced that a friendly, anti-Indian government in Kabul was crucial to Pakistan's security.

But Sept. 11 changed everything. Under pressure from Washington, Musharraf agreed to abandon the Taliban and support the U.S.-led war on terrorism. On Jan. 12, 2002, Musharraf delivered a much-anticipated speech in which he banned extremist groups, pledged to end support for militant attacks in Indian-controlled Kashmir and promised to crack down on madrassas. He said they would have to register with the government.

Since then, militant infiltrations into Kashmir have decreased, and Pakistan has entered into diplomatic talks with India to resolve the long-standing dispute. But inside Pakistan, nothing much came of Musharraf's pledges.

The International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based, non-profit organization that works to prevent conflict, reported that hundreds of militants were detained — but then released. Militant groups re-formed under new names, most madrassas never registered and militant leaders continued to operate openly, the report said.

In the most extreme example noted by the International Crisis Group, the government allowed Sunni extremist Maulana Azam Tariq to run successfully for parliament in 2002 even though he was facing terrorism charges. His political career ended when he was gunned down in October 2003.

In many madrassas, textbooks and teachers promote intolerance against different sects and religions. Even in public schools, textbooks glorify jihad and warn children to be ever vigilant against enemies of the state.

“Intolerance is deeply ingrained in the culture,” says Mariam Abou Zahab, a French expert on Pakistan.

Worries about Pakistan's madrassas grew after the July 7 London bombings. At least one of the four suicide bombers had visited a Pakistani madrassa before the attacks; he and two others were Britons of Pakistani ancestry.

In June, the former U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan, Zalmay Khalilzad, set off a diplomatic furor when he pointedly said he didn't believe bin Laden or Omar was hiding in Afghanistan.

The implication was clear: The fugitives had instead found sanctuary in Pakistan. Musharraf challenged skeptics to “please come and show us where he is.”

“The Pakistan government is playing a double game,” says retired U.S. diplomat Dennis Kux, author of The United States and Pakistan 1947-2000: Disenchanted Allies.

“It is a firm ally in the war on terror,” he says, “but at the same time wants to preserve its options to use the Taliban.”

‘Walking a tightrope'

Musharraf can't risk moving aggressively against homegrown extremists. “He is walking a tightrope,” Zahab says. His government has marginalized secular democratic political parties and forged a partnership with a coalition of religious parti es.

“Both Musharraf and the Islamic parties have a stake in the continuation of the current policies,” says political consultant Hasan Askari Rizvi.

“Even if the Pakistani government wished, it could not fully control the extremists,” Kux says. “For too long it coddled them or just looked the other way. Moreover, Musharraf, I assume, fears pro-Islamist elements in the military. Otherwise, he would not back down every time he says he is going to put the lid on madrassas or take other measures that offend the extremists.”

DOJ_NMG_0006502

The Pakistani public, inflamed by scenes of civilian deaths in Iraq and Afghanistan, is increasingly hostile to the U.S.-led war on terrorism and Pakistan's official support of it.

Musharraf may be taking an even greater risk by making tentative overtures to Israel, a close U.S. ally shunned in most of the Muslim world. He met briefly with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week at the United Nations.

"We want to try to influence Israel to establish a Palestinian state," the Pakistani president said in an interview published Saturday in the Arabic-language Asharq al-Awsat newspaper. "We won't have a role if we don't deal with them."

"There is an increasing gap between the state and society," says Muhammad Waseem, political analyst at Islamabad's Quaid-i-Azam University. "The state is supporting America. The society is increasingly anti-American. If the government ignores the public sentiment, it can't be legitimate."

After the London bombings, Musharraf repeated the pledges he'd made 3½ years earlier. Pakistani police began another roundup of extremist suspects — a campaign that included the ill-fated July 19 assault on the girls school. The government last month passed an ordinance requiring madrassas to register.

Musharraf's critics are waiting to see whether he pushes ahead this time with the registration and regulation of madrassas, something religious groups pledge to resist.

"What one looks for is evidence, not rhetoric," says Samina Ahmed of the International Crisis Group.

British Army Storms Basra Jail To Free 2 Soldiers From Arrest (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 19 - Two British soldiers working under cover were arrested Monday in the southern city of Basra and then freed as a British armored vehicle blasted through the wall of their jail after an angry crowd began rioting outside, an Interior Ministry official said.

The official said that the soldiers were undercover officers dressed as Iraqis and that Iraqi police officers had arrested them after the men fired at a traffic police officer.

A British military spokesman in Basra confirmed that "two U.K. military personnel" had been detained early on Monday "in a shooting incident" and that troops had used an armored fighting vehicle "to gain entry" to the police station to release them. He said that more than one vehicle had been in the area and that the police inside the station had refused to obey orders from the Interior Ministry to release the men.

The incident came a day after British forces in Basra arrested three members of the Mahdi Army, the militia loyal to the rebellious Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, on suspicion of terrorism.

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press, said the riot began Monday evening when militia members converged on the police station holding the British men, apparently hoping to seize them in order to free their three colleagues in British custody. The British spokesman said there had been 100 to 200 people in the crowd.

Ali Dabagh, a Shiite member of the National Assembly who had just emerged from a briefing with Interior Minister Bayan Jabr in Baghdad on Monday night, said that militia members had begun attacking the station with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, and that British troops soon responded to defend it.

The ministry official said that British armored vehicles had fired on the station, headquarters of the major crimes unit in central Basra, and broken through its outer wall. Troops then stormed in and freed the two men, he said. There were reports of prisoners escaping, but the official denied them.

A broadcast on Al Arabiya satellite television showed two men, whom the station identified as British undercover officers, one with his head bandaged and both with their hands behind their backs.

The video showed men and boys hurling stones at a burning armored fighting vehicle outside the police station. A British soldier could be seen climbing out of the hatch and jumping to the ground, as the crowd pelted him.

[Despite the graphic images, British Defense Minister John Reid said Monday that the soldiers wounded in the attack were "being treated for minor injuries only and are expected to return to duty shortly," Agence France-Presse reported.]

DOJ_NMG_0006503

Reuters reported that two Iraqis had been killed in the fighting. The Interior Ministry official said that 25 people had been wounded but that he could not confirm any deaths.

Violence continued in other parts of the country. Car bombs exploded near Iraqi police convoys in Mahmudiya and Latifiya, just south of Baghdad, just after 1:30 p.m., killing a total of nine police commandos and wounding 12, officials said.

In the northern city of Mosul, a man driving a sport utility vehicle blew himself up with a bomb near an American convoy, killing at least one civilian. The military did not report any deaths of soldiers in the attack.

In a statement on an Internet site on Monday, the terrorist group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia modified a declaration of war made last week by its leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The statement said followers of Mr. Sadr, the Shiite cleric, who has twice ordered his group to fight against American troops, would not be directly attacked.

In an effort to persuade Iraqis that it is taking a hard line with insurgents, the Iraqi government announced that the Central Criminal Court had handed down sentences for 54 foreigners who had been convicted of crossing into Iraq illegally. A majority were from Syria and Saudi Arabia.

In another court action on Monday, Saddam Hussein's nephew Ayman Sabawi was sentenced to life in prison for supporting the insurgency. Mr. Sabawi was arrested in May in Tikrit. His father, Sabawi Ibrahim alHassan, Mr. Hussein's half brother, was arrested in February and is awaiting trial.

British Smash Into Iraqi Jail To Free 2 Detained Soldiers (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 19 -- British armored vehicles backed by helicopter gunships burst through the walls of an Iraqi jail Monday in the southern city of Basra to free two British commandos detained earlier in the day by Iraqi police, witnesses and Iraqi officials said. The incident climaxed a confrontation between the two nominal allies that had sparked hours of gun battles and rioting in Basra's streets.

An Iraqi official said a half-dozen armored vehicles had smashed into the jail, the Reuters news agency reported. The provincial governor, Mohammed Walli, told news agencies that the British assault was "barbaric, savage and irresponsible."

British officials said three soldiers were hurt in the day's violence, in which at least one armored personnel carrier was destroyed by firebombs. Iraqi officials said at least two civilians were killed.

In London, authorities said the two commandos were released after negotiations. But the BBC quoted British defense officials as saying a wall was demolished when British forces went to "collect" the men.

Monday's violence underscored the increasing volatility of Basra, a Shiite Muslim-majority city that had previously escaped much of the violence of the Sunni Muslim-led insurgency. Tension has been growing between British forces in the city and Shiite police and militias that operate there.

On Monday, an Iraqi reporter working for the New York Times was found shot dead on the outskirts of Basra with his hands bound, his family and security sources said. The reporter, Fakher Haider, had been handcuffed and taken away from his home Sunday night by four masked men who said they wanted to interrogate him, his family said.

"This murder of a respected colleague leaves us angry and horrified," Bill Keller, the newspaper's executive editor, said in a statement. "Fakher was an invaluable part of our coverage for more than two years. His depth of knowledge, his devotion to the story and his integrity were much admired by the reporters who worked with him."

Elsewhere in Iraq, anti-corruption investigators said they expected charges against the country's former defense minister, Hazim Shaalan, in the alleged embezzlement of more than $1 billion that was meant to help rebuild the country's security forces.

In Baghdad, Ayman Sabawi, a nephew of deposed president Saddam Hussein, was sentenced last week by an Iraqi court to six years in prison for financing the insurgency and making bombs, said Army Lt. Col. Guy Rudisill, a U.S. military spokesman.

Near the Shiite holy city of Karbala, bomb and mortar attacks killed at least five Shiite pilgrims as millions gathered for an annual religious festival there.

Basra, a city of 1.5 million, is heavily under the control of Shiite political parties and fighters of the Badr militia of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Shiite religious party that has a leading role in Iraq's government.

DOJ_NMG_0006504

Citizens and authorities allege that Badr fighters have infiltrated police forces and are carrying out abuses under the guise of police authority. Rivalry also runs strong between those militia fighters and the militia of Moqtada Sadr, a Shiite cleric.

Attacks on Westerners -- once a rare event in Basra -- have targeted British and U.S. diplomatic convoys in recent weeks and killed at least eight Britons and Americans.

Earlier Monday, gunmen loyal to Sadr attacked the house of Basra's governor to press demands for the release of two prominent members of the cleric's militia whom British forces arrested Sunday.

The killing of the New York Times reporter took place six weeks after an American freelance journalist, Steven Vincent, was kidnapped and killed in Basra, allegedly after being taken away in a marked police car. Vincent had published numerous articles, including in the Times, alleging heavy-handedness by Basra security forces and deriding Sadr and other Shiite officials.

Britain is the second-leading contributor of foreign troops to the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, with 8,500 troops compared with 140,000 Americans.

Iraqi security officials on Monday variously accused the two Britons they detained of shooting at Iraqi forces or trying to plant explosives. Photographs of the two men in custody showed them in civilian clothes.

When British officials apparently sought to secure their release, riots erupted. Iraqi police cars circulated downtown, calling through loudspeakers for the public to help stop British forces from releasing the two. Heavy gunfire broke out and fighting raged for hours, as crowds swarmed British forces and set at least one armored vehicle on fire.

Witnesses said they saw Basra police exchanging fire with British forces. Sadr's Mahdi Army militia joined in the fighting late in the day, witnesses said. A British military spokesman, Darren Moss, denied that British troops were fighting Basra police.

Another Western military spokesman in Basra confirmed "an ongoing disturbance" in the city on Monday but said Iraqi and British forces were working together to quell it.

In the southern city of Latifiyah, an insurgent stronghold, bombs targeted Shiite pilgrims driving and walking to Karbala for an annual rite. A car bomb hit the crowd of pilgrims first, followed 10 minutes later by mortar rounds, said police Capt. Muthanna Ahmed.

A suicide bomber killed five Iraqi policemen and two civilians Monday when he blew himself up near an Iraqi police commando patrol in Mahmudiyah, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, the Associated Press reported.

Shiite Militia, British Soldiers Clash (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Violent street clashes erupted Monday between Shiite militia and British soldiers in the southern city of Basra, after British tanks stormed a local jail where two of their troops were being held.

The daylong violence in Iraq's second-largest city raised troubling questions about the relationship between British forces in charge of security and their Iraqi counterparts, in what once was considered a relatively safe area of the country.

The clashes, which involved members of cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Al Mahdi army, apparently began when British commandos fired on Iraqi police, who took them into custody.

Tanks then bore down on the jail, knocking down a wall before the men were freed -- along with dozens of other detainees who took advantage of the chaos to escape, according to local reports and news agency accounts.

Two Iraqis were reportedly killed in the clashes, and several British soldiers were wounded.

Television images of the street fighting showed Iraqis firebombing a tank, and a British soldier emerging with his uniform in flames. The British Broadcasting Corp. reported the soldier was treated for minor injuries.

As night fell Monday, confusion and chaos dominated Basra's city center. Residents huddled in their homes reported gunfire and tank maneuvers.

Though Basra has not suffered the same level of violence as other cities in Iraq -- such as Fallouja, Samarra and the capital -- residents say peace has come at a cost. Armed militiamen rule the streets, enforcing perceived infractions of Islamic law with beatings and even killings, residents say.

DOJ_NMG_0006505

In the once cosmopolitan city, women no longer can go unveiled on the streets, and physicians have been beaten for treating female patients.

The militias have also infiltrated the police, taking orders from clerics instead of commanders. When the Basra police chief acknowledged this spring that he'd lost control of his 13,000-strong force to Shiite Muslim militiamen, he was quickly removed from his job.

"The shift in Basra's situation from calmness to disorder is because of the authorities here," said Abid Sayid Mohammed Samad, 52, a Basra auto mechanic. "All are affiliated with different entities and blocs, and this rivalry among parties has undermined the security situation."

The clashes followed the discovery Monday of the body of Fakhr Haidar al-Tamimi, 38, a journalist and father of three who worked for local TV and radio, as well as The New York Times, the Guardian in London, National Geographic and other publications, according to the New-York-based Committee to Protect Journalists.

His death brought the toll for journalists or media workers in Iraq to 68 since the conflict began in 2003 -- five more than were killed in 20 years of covering the conflict in Vietnam, according to Reporters without Borders, a Paris-based advocacy group. Two thirds of those killed were Iraqis, the group said.

The Committee to Protect Journalists put the death toll at 55.

After enjoying a brief flowering of freedom and opportunities in the wake of the 2003 U.S. invasion, Iraqi journalists live in fear for their lives and rarely admit their profession in public.

"All the media people are now targeted and vulnerable simply because they convey the truth," said Nadhem Jabari, spokesman for the Basra provincial council. "We know very well that the truth would embarrass and many people."

Because of threats to Western reporters, much of the street-level reporting has been done by local Iraqi journalists, who file reports to all major media, including the Los Angeles Times.

It was unclear if Tamimi was targeted for his work with Western or local media.

"Covering this war is a perilous assignment for all journalists, but the gravest risk falls on those whose country is the battleground and whose lives are inextricable from the society," Bill Keller, executive editor of The New York Times, said in the announcement.

"We're all in shock about Fakher's death," said Robert F. Worth, a Baghdad-based New York Times correspondent. "He was a wonderful colleague, gentle and brave and resourceful. He had a great sense of humor. We will miss him."

Elsewhere, Iraq's steady tempo of bloodshed continued, with at least 11 other Iraqis killed in politically motivated violence.

Near Baghdad on Monday, at least eight Iraqi police commandos, an Iraqi soldier and a civilian were killed and 12 others injured in car bombings at two checkpoints beyond the city's southern edge.

The attacks, in Mahmoudiya and Latifiya, were launched within the perilous cluster of small towns and palm groves south of Baghdad known as the "triangle of death." Authorities have tightened security in the area as pilgrims head on foot toward the holy city of Karbala for an annual Shiite religious ceremony.

In Baqouba, a turbulent city of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds 40 miles north of the capital, the provincial governor escaped an assassination attempt that injured three of his guards while an explosion targeting a group of day laborers left one civilian killed. U.S. forces in the northern city of Mosul killed two suspected insurgents and detained three in early morning raids. The men were "suspected of having senior al-Qaeda in Iraq connections," the military announced.

Reporter Working For Times Abducted And Slain In Iraq (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 19 - An Iraqi journalist and photographer working for The New York Times in Basra was found dead early Monday after being abducted from his home by a group of armed men wearing masks and claiming to be police officers, relatives and witnesses said.

DOJ_NMG_0006506

The journalist, Fakher Haider, 38, was found with his hands bound and a bag over his head in a deserted area on the outskirts of Basra, in southern Iraq, hours after being taken from his house in that city. A relative who viewed his body in the city morgue said he had at least one bullet hole in his head and bruises on his back as if he had been beaten.

Mr. Haider had worked for The Times since April 2003 and had recently reported on the growing friction and violence among Basra's rival Shiite militias, which are widely believed to have infiltrated the police.

He did part-time for work for other news organizations, including Merbad TV, a local Basra station, and for publications including The Guardian of London and National Geographic. But his principal affiliation was with The Times.

"This murder of a respected colleague leaves us angry and horrified," said Bill Keller, the executive editor of The Times. "Fakher was an invaluable part of our coverage for more than two years. His depth of knowledge, his devotion to the story and his integrity were much admired by the reporters who worked with him."

Mr. Haider is the second journalist to be killed in Basra in the past two months. In August, Steven Vincent, an American freelance reporter who was writing a book about the city, was abducted along with his Iraqi interpreter, and he was later found dead. The interpreter remains hospitalized.

Days earlier, Mr. Vincent had written an Op-Ed article for The Times in which he criticized the British security forces in the city for failing to act against the Shiite militias' growing power within the local police force.

Basra has grown increasingly violent, with a complex web of sectarian agendas playing itself out almost daily on the streets. Insurgents continue to attack Shiite civilians and military patrols, while Shiite militias fight among themselves and, recently, with British troops as well.

On Sunday, Mr. Haider filed reports about angry demonstrations that had broken out after the arrest by British forces of two high-ranking members of the Mahdi Army, the militia loyal to the renegade Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Shortly after midnight, two cars, one of them an unmarked sedan, one a police car, were driven up to Mr. Haider's apartment building, according to witnesses who said they could not be identified without jeopardizing their lives.

Efforts to reach the Basra police on Monday were not successful. Police officials tend to rely on cellphones, which are often unreliable between Basra and Baghdad.

Three of the men, carrying AK-47 assault rifles, entered the apartment building as frightened neighbors emerged from their homes, said Mr. Haider's wife, Intisar Abbas Hamza, in a telephone interview. They then entered the apartment and ransacked it, she said.

The gunmen took Mr. Haider's telephones, his pistol and some videotapes, Ms. Hamza said. As they prepared to leave with Mr. Haider, they told her they were only going to interrogate him for a few hours and bring him back, she said.

Mr. Haider told his wife not to worry, and then quickly wrote down the phone number of a friend and fellow journalist. He told his wife to tell the friend to call the Basra governor's office. The gunmen were standing by at the time, Ms. Hamza said.

In recent months, Mr. Haider had confided to friends that he was worried about the increasingly violent atmosphere in Basra. In July, gunmen in a pickup truck chased his car and fired at him, and he narrowly escaped after driving off the road and firing his pistol into the air, he told a friend.

A lean man with a quiet voice and a shy, curious smile, Mr. Haider was a Shiite and a member of the Tamimi tribe. Although his English was limited, he was brave and resourceful in his work with reporters. His extensive tribal connections were a great advantage in his journalistic work, both in Basra and in the marshes of southeastern Iraq.

Mr. Haider, who was born in Basra, fought in the 1991 uprising against Saddam Hussein after the Persian Gulf war. He said that he later escaped to Kuwait and was lucky to avoid being killed when Mr. Hussein's forces regained control of southern Iraq.

During the uprising, Mr. Haider risked his life to help the daughter of a local Baath Party official secure a decent burial for her brother, who had been killed by rebelling Shiites. After the Baathists returned to power, the official spared his life for that reason, Mr. Haider said.

Before starting his work for The Times in 2003, Mr. Haider worked for years at a fertilizer factory in Basra, said his brother, Muhammad Haider. In addition to his wife, Mr. Haider is survived by three children, ages 5, 7 and 9.

England Now To Fight Abu Ghraib Charges (AJC/AP)

By T.a. Badger, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

SAN ANTONIO — Army Pfc. Lynndie England will abandon her earlier courtroom strategy and fight charges that she was a key participant in detainee abuse by guards at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, her lawyer said.

The 22-year-old reservist, who appears in a series of graphic photos taken inside Abu Ghraib, was to go on trial Tuesday at Fort Hood, Texas, on seven counts of mistreating prisoners.

She will be the last of a group of junior enlisted soldiers charged with Abu Ghraib abuses to have their cases resolved. Two have been convicted at trial, while six others made plea deals and received prison sentences of up to eight years.

Three months after England's attempt at a plea agreement fell apart, her lead defense lawyer, Capt. Jonathan Crisp, said "there's not going to be a deal."

Crisp said he plans to base much of his defense on England's history of mental health problems that date back to her childhood.

He said he also will focus on the influence exerted over England by Pvt. Charles Graner, the reputed abuse ringleader. Graner, who England has said fathered her young son while they were deployed, is serving a 10-year sentence after being convicted at trial in January.

"I wouldn't say it's 'Blame Graner,'" Crisp said of his trial strategy, which includes calling Graner as a witness. "But certainly Graner is involved as far as what was going on."

England pleaded guilty in May to conspiracy, maltreating detainees and committing an indecent act — the same charges she faces this week — in exchange for an undisclosed sentencing cap. The charges carry a maximum sentence of 11 years.

But judge Col. James Pohl abruptly threw out the deal and declared a mistrial during the sentencing phase when testimony by Graner contradicted England's guilty plea.

Graner, called as a defense witness, said pictures he took of England holding a prisoner on a leash were meant to be used as a training aid. But in her guilty plea, England said the pictures were being taken purely for the amusement of the guards.

Prosecutors, who declined to talk about the trial, are expected to rely on the photos that have made England the scandal's most recognizable figure.

A ruling by Pohl in July, however, tossed out a key piece of the prosecution's case — statements to Army investigators in which England implicated herself in the abuse.

The judge said that he believed England did not fully understand the consequences when she waived her rights against self-incrimination before speaking to the investigators in January 2004.

An Honest Victory (NYT)

By Nathaniel Fick

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

Cambridge, Mass.

Authority can be delegated; responsibility cannot. President Bush's speech last week accepting responsibility for the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina was commendable, if overdue. Though it has been derided by some as political expediency, the president's acknowledgment was a necessary first step in rebuilding the Gulf Coast and preparing for the next disaster.

This new transparency, however, shouldn't stop with Hurricane Katrina. Consider the positive effects that would follow a similar presidential assumption of responsibility for American missteps in Iraq.

By declaring that the buck stops at his desk, President Bush could begin a top-down rethinking of our military and political strategies since the 2003 invasion. He would also establish a standard of personal accountability for everyone in the chain of command, much as his statement last week prompted Gov. Kathleen Blanco of Louisiana to follow suit. And it just might galvanize enough bipartisan support to break the ideological gridlock that has limited changes in Iraq policy to marginal tweaks rather than a full reassessment.

DOJ_NMG_0006508

Of course, many people we will depend on in our attempt to rebuild Iraq - including Iraqi civilians, nongovernmental aid organizations and our foreign allies - will respond only to results, not to rhetoric. There is, however, at least one group that would respond well to this particular piece of rhetoric: senior military leaders. The fate of Gen. Eric Shinseki, the former Army chief of staff who fell into disfavor with the White House after telling Congress in 2003 that several hundred thousand troops would be needed in postwar Iraq, has cast a long shadow across the officer corps.

Much of the military's trustworthiness derives from its culture of accountability. In 1944, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower prepared a speech in case the D-Day invasion failed, knowing that his continued leadership of the Army depended on taking responsibility for its shortcomings. Half a century later, my own Marine training stressed that I, as a commander, was responsible for everything my troops did, or failed to do.

Senior military officers rightly expect the same sense of responsibility from the elected government they serve. The tradition of providing apolitical advice based on sound military judgment is predicated on the willingness of civilian leaders to consider unpopular counsel, something this administration has been unwilling to do. An admission of responsibility from the top would give our commanders new freedom to analyze what has gone wrong in Iraq and to work with the Pentagon's civilians to improve it, translating presidential rhetoric into results on the ground.

While our mistakes have been many - from broad policy to specific tactics - the most frustrating are those that recur. Many of the problems I witnessed in Iraq two years ago are being repeated: the three enablers of insurgency - weapons, men and money - still flow freely from Syria and Iran; many American units are still blind to cultural nuance, largely because of a shortage of translators; and there's still too much focus on the misleading statistic of dead insurgents, as if the enemy were finite.

As things stand, American citizens - and the military - have been offered a false choice between "staying the course" in Iraq and precipitous withdrawal. The historian James Chace compared the former to a sailor who, having been blown off course in a storm, continues to sail straight ahead, but in the wrong direction. Cutting and running, on the other hand, isn't a strategy. A hasty exit would give us anarchy, civil war and maybe revenge killing on a scale unseen since Rwanda. That withdrawal is frequently advanced as the "humanitarian" option is appalling. There must be a third way.

Enter presidential leadership. Envision this: In a primetime address like last Thursday's, President Bush focuses the power of his office on Iraq. He doesn't claim that we have turned a corner or that the insurgents are fighting harder because they are weaker. He speaks honestly, acknowledges the administration's mistakes, accepts responsibility for them and explains why creating a stable Iraq is in America's national interest. Then, and this is the key, he announces a reassessment of American strategy spanning from the roles of the commander in chief to the lowliest private.

We are not talking about shifting a few thousand troops from one city to another. President Bush would have to condone a major philosophical and strategic shift away from what hasn't worked. Fortunately, there are leaders in the military who understand counterinsurgency warfare. Conventional armies have been fighting guerrillas since ancient times, and this history offers countless cautionary examples, from Masada to Malaya. The nearest thing to a universal maxim is that counterinsurgents who fail to see their mistakes and to adapt on the fly are doomed to lose.

The military has proved itself adaptable in Iraq. Robots now zap roadside bombs with jolts of electricity and microwave energy. Junior officers and noncommissioned officers now post accounts of the hard lessons they've learned on military Web sites for quick dissemination to their peers. Soldiers and marines now return for second and third tours, armed with a better sense of the landscape, geographic and cultural. But these better methods will not become standard across Iraq unless the president himself encourages the military to undergo strategic adaptation. Officers must be granted authority to change course by the person who bears ultimate responsibility for the outcome.

There's no shortage of good alternatives waiting in the wings. One that has recently garnered much attention is the military historian Andrew Krepinevich's "oil spot" strategy, which involves shifting the focus from killing insurgents to protecting civilians by pouring money and manpower into protected cantons where average Iraqis can see the tangible advantages of our system over Al Qaeda's.

The particulars of whatever strategy we decide to go with are, at this point, secondary. First, commitment to change must be made, and quickly. The federal government came under assault for a delay of days in its response to Hurricane Katrina. Each week's delay in Iraq costs about a dozen Americans dead, a hundred wounded and a billion dollars down the drain, plus vast harm to American prestige and the Iraqis themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0006509

President Bush has the power to change the United States' prospects in Iraq. But doing so requires the courage to admit errors, and the willingness to embrace good ideas. A break with the past can be Hurricane Katrina's positive legacy.

Guard Relief Hurt By Obsolete Equipment (USAT)

By Dave Moniz

USA Today, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina exposed serious weaknesses in the National Guard's communications systems, particularly a shortage of high-tech radios and satellite communications gear, the Guard's top general said Monday.

If it's going to protect the USA while also fighting overseas, the Guard needs better equipment, Lt. Gen. Steven Blum, head of the National Guard Bureau, said in an interview with USA TODAY.

"We were underequipped," Blum said. "We don't need tanks and attack helicopters and artillery, but we must have state-of-the-art radios and communications."

Much of the Guard's best communications equipment was being used by troops fighting in Iraq and wasn't available for units helping Gulf Coast states recover from the hurricane, Blum said.

Many Guard military police in New Orleans were using obsolete radios as they sought to restore order, he said. That, combined with a crippled civilian communications network, made it harder for them to communicate. Many also lacked night-vision goggles.

After Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, about 50,000 Guard troops were sent to states battered by the storm, the largest such domestic response in Guard history, said Blum, who oversees Army and Air National Guard units in all 50 states.

The active-duty Army, which helps equip the Guard, recognizes the deficiencies, said Blum, who has met with Pentagon officials to find more money for new equipment. "The leadership of the Army is committed to addressing the problem," he said.

Last week, Sens. Kit Bond, R-Mo., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., wrote President Bush asking for $1.3 billion to buy new equipment for the Guard.

Long-standing shortages and the stress of fighting wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have left the Guard with "a perilously low level of equipment available for natural disasters," the senators wrote.

Only 34% of the Guard's equipment is available for use in the USA, the letter said. The worst shortages are in trucks, night-vision goggles, engineering equipment and communications gear, the letter said. The Guard has historically used hand-me-down equipment from the active-duty military. For example, the Army Guard is using radios from the Vietnam War era and needs 37,000 newer radios, according to a recent Guard budget briefing paper posted on its website.

Two wars and a recruiting shortfall have taxed the 350,000-member Army National Guard this year. At one point, about 40% of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq were from the Guard or Reserves.

Army Abandons Plan To Borrow From Funds For Troops' Vehicles (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Pentagon reversed a plan to ease the Army's year-end cash crunch by borrowing from funds dedicated to buying better armored vehicles for troops in Iraq.

The $300 million-plus transfer had met strong behind-the-scenes opposition in Congress over the past week. The skirmish underscores the budget pressure on the military, given the tempo of operations in the war, rising fuel costs and competing priorities like the Hurricane Katrina recovery.

"We did get some people excited. It raised the hair on the back of their necks," said Lt. Gen. Jerry Sinn, a top Army budget official, who confirmed the reversal in an interview yesterday. He said he knew in advance the appearances could be awkward but said the transfers were never intended to be more than a "temporary loan" that would be repaid before impeding production.

DOJ_NMG_0006510

Nonetheless, Gen. Sinn said defense officials had "blinked a little bit" at the proposal. And lawmakers said the fact that the Army would consider touching such sensitive funds -- after all the public attention to the armor issue -- showed the pressure to keep down the costs of the war.

"They're desperate. They're under tremendous pressure," said Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) a Marine veteran and senior member of the House Appropriations Committee, who had a heated telephone conversation last week with Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, about the request.

The Army accounts for the greatest share of the war costs in Iraq and Afghanistan, now estimated to be running at $6.7 billion a month. That is markedly higher that what was assumed in the spring, when Congress approved a supplemental war-spending bill that included $17.48 billion for Army operations -- more than $200 million above the Pentagon's request.

Higher fuel costs have since played havoc with these numbers. Further complicating matters, Congress has yet to complete action on the 2006 Pentagon budget. That means -- unlike most years since the war began -- the military could be subject to the vagaries of whatever interim spending resolution is agreed to in coming weeks.

Some conservatives, alarmed by the cost of the Katrina recovery, want a tightly written stopgap bill. But the Army would be squeezed unless some adjustment is made to reflect the fuller costs of the war.

"The Army's really running close; they are trying not to appear to be spending a lot of money," said Rep. Bill Young (R., Fla.), the former chairman of the Appropriations Committee who now oversees the defense budget. "I think the OMB [Office of Management and Budget] is trying to keep down the image of spending."

The proposed transfers were outlined in a 15-page budget plan to shift an estimated $1.43 billion among Army accounts to meet operations costs for the final weeks of the fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30. The documents were forwarded to Congress Sept. 7, and both Defense Daily and Inside the Army have reported on the request. Gen. Sinn's comments yesterday were the first official Army confirmation that the request would be modified.

Absent some action, Pentagon officials said the Army wouldn't be able to pay its bills. To find savings within its own budget, the Army decided to tap a number of procurement accounts important to protecting forces in Iraq and restoring damaged equipment.

These included the purchase of mortars and trucks, but none was more sensitive than those involving armored vehicles. An estimated $152.8 million was to come from funds to install armor on existing equipment. An additional $155 million would be taken from funds to purchase heavily armored Humvees.

The proposal was subject to veto by the major defense committees, which have 15 days to review the requests. From the outset, lawmakers were surprised that the office of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld hadn't come forward with alternative funding sources for the Army.

That is occurring now. Gen. Sinn said the Army request has been modified to tap funds in an Air Force capital account and a second more-generic account, the Iraq Freedom Fund, which is under Mr. Rumsfeld's direct control. New papers reflecting these changes have been forwarded to Congress, and Mr. Young said he expected the changes will be cleared. "When our soldiers are involved in combat, they should get everything they need," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-Tyco Execs Receive Prison Sentences (FINDLAW/AP)

By Samuel Maull, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 20, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former CEO of Tyco International, was sentenced Monday to eight and one-third years to 25 years in prison Monday for stealing hundreds of millions of dollars from the company.

His codefendant, former Tyco finance chief Mark Swartz, received the same sentence, which means they will be eligible for parole after eight years and four months.

The judge also ordered them to pay a total of $134 million in restitution. In addition, Kozlowski was fined $70 million and Swartz $35 million.

DOJ_NMG_0006511

Family members wept in the gallery as the sentences were imposed.

The sentences end a case that exposed the executives' extravagant lifestyle after pilfering some $600 million from the company including a $2 million toga birthday party for Kozlowski's wife on a Mediterranean island and an $18 million Manhattan apartment with a $6,000 shower curtain.

Kozlowski, 58, and Swartz, 44, were convicted in June after a four-month trial on 22 counts of grand larceny, falsifying business records, securities fraud and conspiracy. It was their second trial - the first ended in mistrial after a juror said she received threats following reports that she made an "OK" signal to the defense team.

Kozlowski and Swartz join a line of other executives sent off to prison in a wave of white-collar scandals that shook corporate America and outraged the public after thousands of people lost their jobs and pension nest-eggs.

WorldCom Chairman Bernard Ebbers was sentenced to 25 years in prison for the $11 billion accounting fraud that toppled the telecommunications company that emerged from bankrutpcy as MCI Inc. Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison for his role in the looting and fraud at that cable TV company. His son and former finance chief, Timothy Rigas, got 20 years.

Former Tyco Executives Sentenced To Up To 25 Years In Prison (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 20, 2005

The two former top executives of Tyco International Ltd. were each sentenced Monday to prison terms of 8 1/3 to 25 years on charges they stole more than $150 million in unauthorized loans and bonuses from the company.

L. Dennis Kozlowski, 58, Tyco's former chief executive officer, and Mark H. Swartz, 44, the former chief financial officer, were led away in handcuffs after Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Michael Obus handed down the sentence. The judge denied their request to delay incarceration while they applied to be released on bail pending appeal of their convictions.

In the course of their three-year-long prosecution, the two men, particularly Kozlowski, have become symbols of corporate greed and excess. But the judge put the case in straightforward terms in imposing sentence.

Despite many unusual characteristics and complications, he said, "the heart of the case is basic larceny."

First indicted in September 2002, the two executives were convicted in June on several counts of grand larceny, securities fraud, conspiracy and falsifying business records. The judge issued separate sentences on the other counts but said those would be served concurrently with the grand larceny sentence.

Justice Obus also ordered Kozlowski to pay $97 million in restitution to Tyco and $70 million in fines. Swartz was ordered to pay $37 million in restitution and $35 million in fines.

The restitution amounts were tied to the amounts of bonuses the two men were found to have stolen. The defense had maintained throughout the trial that the bonuses were legitimate and fully approved by Tyco's board of directors.

Though tough, Obus' sentence was less than that requested by the prosecution. Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer had asked the court to impose the maximum sentence of 15 to 30 years "to send the signal that, here in the financial capital of the world, we will not tolerate theft ... no matter who you are."

Heimer said Kozlowski had been found guilty of the largest larceny ever prosecuted in New York state and, as such, a 15-year term would not be "unduly harsh."

In urging a tough sentence, prosecutors said Kozlowski and Swartz should not be treated more leniently than other criminal defendants because of their backgrounds. Rather, they argued, the executives should be treated more harshly because they turned to crime despite already possessing every advantage and opportunity.

The defense lawyers argued for leniency on the grounds that both defendants were fundamentally good people with close ties to family and community and histories of charitable contributions. Both men submitted to the court scores of letters by family, friends and colleagues attesting to their good character.

Stephen Kaufman, Kozlowski's chief lawyer said only "vitriolic vengeance" would be served by the sentence requested by the prosecution.

DOJ_NMG_0006512

In attacking the prosecution's attempts to have the maximum sentence imposed, Swartz's lawyer, Charles Stillman, invoked Army lawyer Joseph Welch's 1954 denunciation of Senator Joseph McCarthy.

"Have you no sense of decency?" Stillman asked rhetorically. "Have you no sense of decency at long last?"

Each of the defendants spoke briefly on his own behalf. Kozlowski said he was a different man than had been depicted by the prosecution and in the media. He said he understood he would be incarcerated but asked the judge to be as lenient as possible.

In asking for leniency, Swartz said he had always tried to live an honest life and to benefit his family and community.

"I never thought I would be in the position I'm in today nor did I ever fear it," he said.

In handing down sentence, Obus said his view of the defendants was not as "stark" as that of the prosecutors, who had mocked the defendants' claims of charity and questioned the motives of some who testified about their character.

LETTERS CONSIDERED

The judge said he had carefully considered all the letters he had received from people regarding the defendants' character. The judge said he, unlike the prosecution, believed most of the letters were genuine. He said they depicted men whose behavior towards friends and family was sharply at odds with the conduct of which they were convicted.

The long sentences recently given to white-collar criminals has spurred debate on whether such criminals, treated lightly in the past, are now being treated too harshly.

Former assistant Manhattan district attorney Ronald Blum, now a partner at Manatt, Phelps & Phillips who also teaches white-collar criminal law at Fordham School of Law, said such sentiments had some merit but he said the sentence given to Kozlowski and Swartz sounded "pretty sensible" to him.

Given the scale of the thefts, he said, "I don't think the judge could have gotten away with less than that with a straight face."

State judges have more flexibility in sentencing than federal judges, who are subject to strict sentencing guidelines. The Tyco executives' sentences are considerably lower than that recently meted out in federal court to former WorldCom CEO Bernard Ebbers, who was sentenced to 25 years in prison in July.

Kozlowski and Swartz will be eligible for parole after serving 8 1/2 years of their sentence. With good behavior, they will be able to shave one-sixth off that time as well.

On the other hand, the state prison system lacks the relatively comfortable minimum security facilities in which federal white-collar inmates are typically incarcerated. Blum said the realities of state prisons were a likely though unacknowledged influence on state judges' sentencing decisions.

Kaufman warned the judge Monday that any sentence over 72 months would likely mean his client would be placed in a maximum security lockup.

The prison at which the two men serve their sentences will be determined by the Department of Corrections. Justice Obus said he would tell the department that neither of the men should be regarded as a security risk.

Tyco's Kozlowski To Spend Up To 25 Years In Jail (FT)

By Christopher Bowe

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

Dennis Kozlowski, the former head of Tyco, and Mark Swartz, his chief financial officer, were on Monday sentenced to at least eight years in prison for stealing $150m and fraud while at the US conglomerate.

The two men were also ordered to pay about $240m in penalties and restitution. A New York state court Judge Michael Obus ordered them to repay $134m to Tyco for stealing a string of unauthorised bonuses and compensation between 1999 and 2001 - $97m from Mr Kozlowski and $37m from Mr Swartz. The court also fined Mr Kozlowski $70m and Mr Swartz $35m.

After sentencing, Mr Kozlowski, 58, and Mr Swartz, 45, were led from the courtroom in handcuffs. They immediately began their sentence of eight years and four months to 25 years in state prison, depending on the decisions of parole officials.

The two men were convicted in June in their second trial for theft and fraudulent gains of more than $650m. They were found guilty on 22 counts of grand larceny, conspiracy, securities fraud and falsifying business records. Before the sentencing, Mr Kozlowski asked the judge to be "as lenient as possible", while Mr Swartz asked to be quickly returned to his family.

DOJ_NMG_0006513

But Manhattan prosecutor Owen Heimer said the men had committed theft and fraud on an "unprecedented and staggering scale", the largest ever in the state.

They become the latest in a series of high-profile executives sentenced to significant jail time, including former WorldCom chief Bernie Ebbers' 25 years.

Monday's sentences could see Mr Kozlowski and Mr Swartz leaving prison in eight years, even potentially five years depending on good behaviour and parole.

Orin Snyder, attorney at Gibson, Dunn Crutcher LLP and a former prosecutor said: "The sentencing sends the message that the sentence is harsh, but gives flexibility for serving less time."

Lawyers for Mr Kozlowski and Mr Swartz have vowed to appeal against the guilty verdicts, and to file for release on bail while the appeal is pending. The two executives must serve time in state prison and most likely time in maximum security prison, which can be a dangerous environment.

"For these two former executives, even several years in a state prison will be a very long stretch of time," said Robert Mintz, attorney at McCarter & English, and former federal prosecutor.

Tyco also is still under Mr Kozlowski's shadow. Mr Heimer told the court he believed that SEC investigators had recommended bringing $1bn accounting fraud charges against Tyco. The company said talks continued with the SEC on settling an investigation into accounting from 1996-2002 under Mr Kozlowski's watch, but it "would not require Tyco to restate any of its financial statements".

Even in jail, Mr Kozlowski's legal troubles continue. The judge tentatively set October 21 to potentially begin a case alleging he evaded sales tax on art purchases.

Ex-Tyco Officers Get 8 To 25 Years (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former chief executive of Tyco International who was convicted of looting the company of $150 million, was sentenced yesterday to 81/3 to 25 years in a New York State prison, the latest corporate figure to be handed a lengthy prison term in a corruption case.

Mark H. Swartz, his chief lieutenant, received the same sentence for his role in the thefts and fraud. The two men were convicted in June after a four-month retrial.

Judge Michael J. Obus of State Supreme Court in Manhattan also ordered Mr. Kozlowski to pay $167 million in restitution and fines. Mr. Swartz was ordered to pay $72 million in fines and restitution.

The sentencing follows a parade of other substantial terms imposed on former chief executives convicted of white-collar crimes, most notably Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom, who received a prison term of 25 years, and John J. Rigas of the cable operator Adelphia Communications, who was sentenced to 15 years. Those sentences - in federal courts - were seen as sending a message to deter huge corporate frauds in the future.

The Tyco sentencing may be the last high-profile corporate misconduct before the most prominent one of them all: the trial next year of Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling of Enron.

Handing down the sentence in a packed courtroom, Judge Obus said yesterday: "The crimes at issue here were violations of the defendants' positions of trust and their fiduciary duty on a grand scale. They caused damage to Tyco and to others, including the shareholders who are Tyco's owners and who, like the investing public, generally should be able to rely on the integrity of the management of publicly traded companies."

Mr. Kozlowski, 58, became a symbol of corporate greed for a $6,000 shower curtain, as well as a $2 million birthday party in Sardinia for his wife that was partly paid for by the company. He stared straight ahead, overwhelmed, as the sentence was read aloud. Mr. Swartz, 45, looked down at the floor.

The two men, both dressed in gray suits and starched-white shirts, were then handcuffed behind their backs and led away by court officers. Mr. Swartz wistfully winked at his wife and parents. Mr. Kozlowski's wife, wearing sunglasses, wiped away tears that had run down her face as his two daughters, also crying, consoled each other.

DOJ_NMG_0006514

Lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz said they planned to seek bail pending appeal from an appellate court today or tomorrow. The two men spent last night in the Bernard B. Kerik Complex near the courthouse. If their lawyers are unsuccessful, the two men will be transferred to Rikers Island by the end of the week to be processed and will most likely serve their time in a maximum-security state prison like Attica.

The State Department of Correctional Services will determine where they serve their time. Other former executives recently convicted in federal courts - including Mr. Ebbers - remain free pending their appeals.

Most legal specialists said yesterday that the sentence imposed by Judge Obus on Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz was measured but fair.

"It would be a mistake to confuse this with leniency," said Robert A. Mintz, a former federal prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English. "For these two former executives, even several years in a state prison will be a very long stretch of time."

The two men will be eligible for parole after eight years and four months, and could be put in a work-release program after serving at least six years, according to State Department of Correctional Services guidelines.

Still, they may yet fare worse than their white-collar counterparts in federal prisons because New York generally requires that criminals with sentences longer than six years go to maximum-security prisons, to be mixed among men convicted of murder and other violent crimes.

An assistant Manhattan district attorney, Owen E. Heimer, had asked the judge to impose the maximum of 15 to 30 years, contending that Mr. Kozlowski "should not be shown any leniency," as Mr. Heimer compared Tyco to Enron.

In perhaps the most dramatic moment of the hearing, Mr. Heimer read aloud from a letter Mr. Kozlowski had written in 1995 to a Houston judge overseeing the sentencing of a Tyco employee who had been convicted of stealing from the company; Mr. Kozlowski urged that a maximum sentence be imposed. Mr. Heimer said of Mr. Kozlowski, "What the defendant said on that occasion applies on this occasion."

But Judge Obus rejected the harshest sentence and explicitly tried to distance this case from corporate corruption cases against executives at Enron and WorldCom. Unlike Tyco, a conglomerate whose products include security systems and medical devices, those two companies were forced to file for bankruptcy as a result of the accounting frauds.

"It is worth repeating, as the jury panel was instructed at the outset, that this is not about any other case," Judge Obus said. "This is not a matter in which the fraudulent distortion of the records reflecting the financial health of the company have been shown to have been so distorted as to precipitate the company's collapse. That apparently is some other case, perhaps more than one other case, but that is not the case that was before us here."

Before being sentenced, Mr. Kozlowski asked the judge for mercy, pointing to more than 130 letters submitted on his behalf by friends and family.

In explaining why he did not give the maximum sentence, Judge Obus cited the letters and said: "I think the letters are genuinely sincere and they show aspects of the defendants' lives that are at odds with the conduct which has brought them before this court. They certainly make it all the more difficult to fully grasp, even with hindsight, how the defendants, with all they had going for them, managed to get themselves into this disastrous position, but that is what they have done."

While the two men's sentences are lower than Mr. Ebbers's, they are still much higher than those of many of the high-profile executives convicted of white-collar crimes in the 1980's. Michael R. Milken of Drexel Burnham Lambert, for instance, was sentenced to three and a half years and served less than two years for securities fraud.

"The concern that too many executives were misbehaving has caused prosecutors and judges to want to send a much stronger warning signal than they felt the need to send before," said Jennifer H. Arlen, a law professor and expert in business crime at New York University.

Mr. Kozlowski still faces charges of evading more than $1 million in state sales taxes on artwork. Judge Obus scheduled a hearing for Oct. 21. It is unclear whether prosecutors will continue to pursue that case.

The men also face a barrage of civil suits, claiming billions of dollars in damages, from Tyco and shareholders. The men made hundreds of millions of dollars while at Tyco, but it is unclear how much money either Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz will have left after paying restitution and fines.

DOJ_NMG_0006515

In the two years before his fall in 2001, Mr. Kozlowski made more than $330 million in profits from exercising stock options and selling stock grants, in addition to his salary and bonus of about $5 million a year. But his lawyers have suggested that after the civil litigation, on top of the fines and restitution ordered yesterday, he could be bankrupt.

There is also a civil dispute between Mr. Kozlowski and Tyco over whether tens of millions of dollars of deferred compensation should still be paid.

The first case against Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz was declared a mistrial in April 2004, when a juror holding out for an acquittal made what appeared to be an "O.K." signal to the defense and subsequently received a threatening letter from a stranger, upending the trial.

Yesterday, as the gallery of courtroom spectators spilled into the hallway, that juror, Ruth B. Jordan, shuffled out. She said she had come to watch the sentencing. "It's not as bad as he could have done," she said, "but I still think it's unduly harsh."

Ex-Tyco Chiefs Whisked Off To Prison (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK — Former Tyco executives Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz were sentenced to 81/3 to 25 years in prison Monday for looting nearly $600 million from their firm in a scheme that came to symbolize corporate greed during the bull market of the 1990s.

New York Supreme Court Justice Michael Obus also ordered the two to pay more than $134 million in restitution, and imposed fines of $70 million on Kozlowski and $35 million on Swartz.

Kozlowski and Swartz asked Obus for leniency. But the judge ordered them imprisoned immediately, despite arguments from defense lawyers, who said they would seek bail pending an appeal.

Kozlowski, 58, and Swartz, 45, both dressed in dark gray suits, were led away in handcuffs as some relatives cried quietly.

Swartz managed a quick, reassuring glance over his shoulder at his wife, Karen, as he was led away.

The former executives were taken to the jail adjoining the courthouse for initial processing, said Thomas Antenen, a spokesman for the New York City Department of Correction.

Obus called the grand larceny and other charges underlying the convictions “extremely serious,” but distinguished the Tyco case from other white-collar crime cases, such as WorldCom.

The prison terms Obus imposed fell short of the 15-year-to-30 year maximum sought by prosecutors, but far higher than the one-year-to-three-year minimum sought by the defense. John Coffee, a securities law expert at Columbia University Law School, said the two would have fared worse in federal court.

“They will serve far less time,” Coffee said, “but it will probably be more painful time. There is no Club Fed in the New York State Correctional system.”

Under New York law, Kozlowski, who is Tyco's former CEO, and Swartz, the company's former CFO, must serve a minimum of six years and 11 months before release, said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Correctional Services.

The sentencing capped a case etched in the national consciousness by Kozlowski's $6,000 shower curtain and $2 million birthday bash for his wife.

In a final legal twist, Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer said that the Securities and Exchange Commission's staff is recommending an accounting fraud case against Tyco for actions taken under Kozlowski and Swartz.

Tyco spokesman David Polk said the firm recently took a $50 million charge to cover a potential SEC settlement.

Ex-Tyco Officers Sentenced (WP)

By Ben White

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 19 -- A state judge on Monday sentenced former Tyco International Ltd. executives L. Dennis Kozlowski and Mark H. Swartz to 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison for looting the company of hundreds of millions of dollars to pay for lavish parties, luxurious homes and extravagances such as a $6,000 shower curtain.

DOJ_NMG_0006516

In a case that came to symbolize corporate greed, state Supreme Court Judge Michael J. Obus also ordered Kozlowski and Swartz to pay nearly $240 million in fines and restitution. Kozlowski and Swartz were immediately taken into custody and led from a packed courtroom in handcuffs as family members of both men sobbed. The men are likely to serve at least part of their sentences in one of New York's 16 maximum-security state prisons.

The sentences for Kozlowski and Swartz follow lengthy terms meted out to other white-collar defendants convicted in a wave of criminal cases that followed the collapse of the Internet bubble and multibillion-dollar frauds at companies such as WorldCom Inc. and Enron Corp.

Former WorldCom chairman Bernard J. Ebbers, 64, was sentenced to 25 years in prison for orchestrating an $11 billion accounting fraud at his company. Because of Ebbers's age, that could amount to a life sentence. John J. Rigas, the 80-year-old founder of Adelphia Communications Corp., received 15 years in prison for stealing millions from the cable company for personal extravagances, hiding more than $2.3 billion in debt and lying to investors. Rigas's son and former Adelphia chief financial officer Timothy J. Rigas was given 20 years in prison for his role in the scheme.

Prosecutors and many shareholder groups say long sentences are necessary to deter future abuses and restore investor confidence. But some defense lawyers question the extent to which a few high-profile cases will deter bad behavior at smaller public companies that present less tempting targets for prosecutors. "Officers and directors of major corporations, multinational corporations, clearly get the message," said defense attorney Jacob S. Frenkel. "The question is whether the message has been conveyed thoroughly to officers and directors at small and mid-size companies."

Kozlowski and Swartz will be able to cut one-sixth off of their 8 1/3 -year minimum sentence if they behave well and take part in prison programs, said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Correctional Services. That would reduce the point at which they can be paroled to six years and 11 months. Inmates are eligible to apply for work release two years before their first possible parole date, and parole officials will decide how much of the 8 1/3 to 25 years the former executives must serve. Several legal experts said it was unlikely either man would serve more than 10 years in total.

There is no parole in the federal system, under which many other white-collar defendants have been tried and sentenced.

Though their sentences may be cut shorter than other executives', the time Kozlowski and Swartz spend behind bars may be in a harsher environment. Obus did not specify where the two former executives will serve their terms. He said that decision would be made by state corrections officials. But he said he did not view either man as a security risk, indicating he would not object if they are sent to a lower-security facility.

Former prosecutor David Gourevitch, however, said there were no facilities in the state system comparable to federal minimum-security prisons such as the one where entrepreneur Martha Stewart spent her five-month sentence.

"In the federal system, outside of maximum-security places, generally people are physically safe. I don't think anybody would say that about New York state prison," Gourevitch said. "And from a state perspective, this is one of the longest sentences in a corporate fraud case that I can recall."

Foglia said that in most cases, defendants sentenced to more than six years are sent to maximum-security prisons. She said it would be several weeks before the state decides where to send Kozlowski and Swartz. In the meantime, they will stay at a holding facility known as the Tombs in Lower Manhattan and then be sent to Rikers Island, the temporary jail for New York City inmates before they are sent to state prisons.

In June, a jury found former Tyco chief executive Kozlowski, 58, and former chief financial officer Swartz, 45, guilty of criminal counts of grand larceny, conspiracy, securities fraud and eight of nine counts of falsifying business records.

Obus imposed the same prison sentence on both men. He ordered Kozlowski to pay a $70 million fine and Swartz to pay a $35 million fine. He ordered both men to repay Tyco a combined $134.4 million in restitution of illegal bonuses and other illicit payments.

Kozlowski and Swartz each made brief statements in court Monday, asking Obus to be lenient. Lawyers for each also pleaded with the court to recognize the former executives' charitable works and the scores of letters sent on their behalf by friends and family.

Prosecutors, by contrast, asked Obus to send a message that corporate theft will be treated the same as grand larceny committed with a handgun. They asked for the maximum term of 15 to 30 years for both men.

DOJ_NMG_0006517

In imposing the sentence, Obus said, "The heart of this case is basic larceny" and described the charges as "extremely serious." He expressed befuddlement at Kozlowski's and Swartz's plights, at one point asking, "how the defendants, with all they had going for them, managed to get themselves into this disastrous position."

Attorneys for Kozlowski and Swartz said they would seek to have their clients released on bail pending appeal of their convictions. At the sentencing hearing on Monday, state prosecutors said the Securities and Exchange Commission staff had recommended that the agency bring an accounting fraud case against Tyco. Tyco has said it expects to settle the SEC suit and has set aside $50 million for that purpose. The SEC often simultaneously files and settles accounting cases.

Tyco Figures Will Be Jailed At Least 7 Years (WSJ)

By Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK -- In an ignominious end to their once-glittering careers, Tyco International Ltd.'s two former top executives were led away from a Manhattan courtroom with their hands cuffed behind their backs, after a New York state judge sentenced them to serve 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison for looting their former company.

The lengthy prison sentences, although less than the 15-to-30-year maximum that could have been imposed, are the latest example of relatively harsh punishment being meted out to top executives in the recent wave of corporate-fraud trials. The two men were ordered to pay fines and restitution totaling about $240 million.

L. Dennis Kozlowski, Tyco's former chief executive, and Mark H. Swartz, the company's former finance chief, each were convicted in June of 22 criminal charges related to looting their former employer of more than $150 million. The pair had once been among the most powerful and best-paid executives at an American company, helping build Tyco into a conglomerate with $36 billion in annual revenue. Tyco has been under new management since mid-2002.

Under New York state law, they will have to serve nearly seven years at minimum: specifically, at least six years, 11 months and nine days before being eligible for parole, subject to good behavior and other factors.

Both defendants have said they will appeal. Mr. Kozlowski's lead attorney, Stephen Kaufman, said immediately after the sentencing hearing that he will be applying for bail for his client pending appeal. Charles Stillman, the lead attorney for Mr. Swartz, said he will be "pursuing appropriate remedies for Mark's situation." In New York, defendants can choose to bring bail applications before any judge, and often try to choose judges known for their leniency.

In New York, inmates with more than six years to serve until they are eligible for parole are usually sent to one of the state's maximum-security prisons, which house 22,000 mostly violent offenders, said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the New York State Department of Correctional Services. Prisoners in such facilities are housed in cells, and work six hours a day at tasks like sweeping, painting, or working in the library, she said, adding that inmates generally are paid $1.05 a day.

Separately, Tyco is close to an agreement to pay $50 million to settle Securities and Exchange Commission fraud charges related to accounting misdeeds during the period when Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz were in charge, according to a person familiar with the matter. Lawyers at yesterday's sentencing hearing first revealed the likely SEC charges, with a prosecutor saying the SEC staff was recommending that Tyco be charged with inflating its income by about $1 billion.

During two high-profile criminal trials -- the first ended in 2004 in a mistrial -- prosecutors showed how Tyco had spent more than $30 million on a New York apartment for Mr. Kozlowski, and helped foot the bill for a lavish birthday party for the former Tyco chief's wife on the Italian island of Sardinia.

Although the defendants claimed the money taken from Tyco had been authorized by the company's board, prosecutors argued that not a single piece of paper backed up that contention, and the company's directors testified they were kept in the dark.

Mr. Kozlowski, 58 years old, briefly glanced back at his family as he was being led out of the courtroom. Mr. Swartz, 45, smiled wanly at one of the court officers as he was led out.

In imposing the sentences, Justice Michael Obus, of the trial-level New York State Supreme Court, stressed that he wasn't sending a message about corporate fraud in general, and merely was reflecting the appropriate punishment for the serious crimes for which the two former Tyco executives were convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0006518

Perhaps mindful that New York prison officials generally house those sentenced to more than six years in maximum-security facilities, Justice Obus said twice yesterday that he didn't view Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz as security risks.

In imposing financial penalties, Justice Obus ordered that Mr. Kozlowski repay about $97 million to Tyco -- the bulk of the money he was convicted of stealing -- and pay an additional $70 million in fines. Mr. Swartz was ordered to repay about $38 million, plus $35 million in fines. He had already repaid $12.5 million to Tyco. Although Justice Obus had the option of holding additional hearings on extra penalties related to the securities-fraud convictions, he opted not to do so, suggesting that civil courts could sort out the issue.

Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz are defendants in civil suits filed by Tyco and in a class-action securities lawsuit by the company's shareholders. The criminal convictions are likely to make it easier for the plaintiffs to win those suits. The defendants' considerable assets, which likely total much more than they were ordered to pay yesterday, have been frozen by the courts for more than three years.

The sentences were less harsh than those given to some other former chief executives by federal courts. Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom Inc., now MCI Inc., received a 25-year sentence after being convicted of masterminding a massive accounting fraud. Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas, who is 80 years old, was sentenced to 15 years. Both are out on bail while they appeal.

Before sentencing, Mr. Kozlowski addressed the court, asking the judge to be "as lenient as possible" and to consider the more than 130 letters submitted to the court by his supporters as a more "accurate" portrait of his life. Mr. Kozlowski's attorney stressed his charitable works, among other things.

Mr. Swartz, who was derided by prosecutors before sentencing as a perjurer for his testimony during both trials, told the judge that he had "always held myself to a high standard of integrity and honesty" and said every word of his own testimony "was the complete and honest truth." He asked to be returned to his family "as soon as possible" because his family life was a matter of "vital importance."

In asking for the maximum sentence, Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer said Mr. Kozlowski was found guilty of theft and securities fraud on an "unprecedented scale," and made Tyco into a "symbol of kleptocratic management." He quoted extensively from a letter sent some years ago by Mr. Kozlowski to a Texas court, recommending a "maximum sentence" for a low-level Tyco employee convicted of embezzling less than $1 million from the company.

Ann Donnelly, another prosecutor, urged the judge to impose a harsh sentence on Mr. Swartz, whom she said was "in large part the architect of this conspiracy" and had "lied to the investing public ... over and over again just so he could enrich himself."

Ms. Foglia said prisoners generally spend several weeks in temporary facilities, and are assigned to prisons based on a number of factors, including length of term, age, health and whether they request protective custody. She said New York has a maximum-security facility near the Canadian border that houses about 250 prisoners, including a former judge, who "are unable to be incarcerated in a general population."

A Tyco spokesman, David Polk, said the company had been discussing a proposed accounting settlement with the SEC for some time. The "proposed allegations relate to Tyco's historical accounting," Mr. Polk said. "Tyco's current financial statements are not at issue." The company restated its results in 2003 going back a number of years, and has previously taken a $50 million charge to cover penalties that might result from the SEC's investigation. The company said a further restatement wasn't part of its talks with the SEC.

Ex-Tyco Execs Face $1-a-day Pay But Could Get Bail For Appeals (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK — Before their convictions, former Tyco executives Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz were known for reaping multimillion-dollar corporate salaries.

Within weeks, they'll have to get used to earning $1.05 a day in a maximum-security state prison.

“They will be assigned a job, and that's what they'll earn,” said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the New York State Department of Correctional Services.

DOJ_NMG_0006519

"Every prisoner must work, in the laundry, in the kitchen or somewhere else."

Lawyers for Kozlowski and Swartz hope to avoid that outcome for at least a while by seeking bail pending appeals of their clients' convictions.

They have a low chance of succeeding, because New York appeals courts generally "are less willing to let individuals stay out," said Ronald Blum, a former Manhattan prosecutor who is now a partner at the law firm Manatt Phelps & Phillips.

Unless defense lawyers prevail, the former executives would be transferred within 10 days from city custody — where they were to spend Monday night — to the state correction system. Foglia said Kozlowski and Swartz would likely first be sent to the Downstate Correctional Facility, roughly 60 miles north of New York City, for four to six weeks of processing and classification.

There, corrections officials would assess medical and other needs before choosing the prison where they would spend most of their sentences.

"Their notoriety is going to play a factor in this as well. We have to take into account their safety in prison," Foglia said.

One possibility, she said, would be to assign Kozlowski and Swartz to the Clinton Correctional Facility, an Upstate New York prison that has a special 250-man unit for prisoners whose personal safety could be in jeopardy behind bars. Convicted police officers, judges and similar defendants have served time in the unit, Foglia said.

Once housed in their assigned prison, Kozlowski and Swartz would be eligible for daily visits. But their days would be subject to a narrowly restricted regimen.

"You're going to be awakened. You're going to work a day, and then your evenings are your own personal time," Foglia said.

The two would be eligible for transfer to a lower-security facility within roughly two years, Foglia said. In about three years, they could seek assignment to a work-release program. Good behavior is a prerequisite for either type of transfer, Foglia said.

The sentences imposed on Kozlowski and Swartz are shorter than the 25-year term recently received by former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers, another well-known white-collar convict.

But the prospect of state prison time will likely "serve as a very, very significant deterrent to anyone who would be tempted to similar actions," said Marcel Kahan, a corporate law specialist at New York University School of Law.

Charles Stillman, Swartz's lead defense lawyer, said he gave his client optimistic advice to help deal with the prospect of years behind bars.

"It's the first day of the rest of his life," Stillman said.

Tyco Endgame (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

There aren't any $6,000 shower curtains in New York state prisons, where Tyco felons Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz will be enjoying all or part of the next 25 years. The former CEO and CFO were sentenced yesterday for their roles in looting $600 million from their company and paying off one or more directors to avert their eyes. They won't become eligible for parole until about seven years.

Thus concludes one of the sorrier chapters in U.S. business history. And while it took a while -- the first Tyco trial ended in mistrial -- the outcome strikes us as just. Not because of their greed -- there's no law against lavish living yet -- but because of their crimes. Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz were convicted in June on 22 counts of grand larceny and conspiracy. The verdicts were a victory for Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, who last week survived a tough primary challenge.

Of all the fin de siècle corporate scandals, the Tyco heist has always seemed the most audacious, a case of stealing money in plain sight. If you want to liven up the conversation at a business lunch, mention former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling and Chairman Ken Lay and whether they were complicit in the fraud for which several former executives have been convicted. There are still those who believe former WorldCom CEO Bernard Ebbers was unaware of the fraud that was taking place under his nose, despite his conviction. The Tyco scandal didn't inspire such ambiguities.

Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz aren't headed for Club Fed by the way; under New York correctional policy, criminals with their sentences usually serve their time in maximum-security prisons. In addition, they were ordered to pay restitution and fines of $175 million. A case of justice in plain sight.

The Crime And The Time (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

The cries for blood have certainly quieted since the recent corporate crime spree first made headlines with the disasters at Enron and WorldCom. Some cried foul when Bernard Ebbers of WorldCom and John Rigas of Adelphia Communications got sentences that meant those white-haired white-collar criminals would probably die in prison. Tomorrow night, Martha Stewart's version of the reality show "The Apprentice" will have its premiere amid her burst of postprison popularity.

In this morning-after atmosphere, when tempers have cooled, comes the news that the former Tyco chief executive, Dennis Kozlowski, and the ex-chief financial officer, Mark H. Swartz, have been sentenced to a minimum of 81/3 years and a maximum of 25 years in prison plus millions in fines and restitution. This is no cause for celebration. Their lives ruined, they face hard jail time. But that does not change one fact: they deserve it and they should serve it.

There always was a hint of buffoonery to the Kozlowski proceedings, with the $6,000 shower curtain and the $2 million birthday party for his wife, that diverted attention from very serious crimes. Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz were charged with stealing $150 million and earning $430 million in sneaky sales of falsely pumped-up stock. They were convicted on 22 counts of grand larceny, conspiracy, falsifying business records and securities fraud.

Lenient commentators were quick to point out that there are no "Club Fed"-style prisons in New York. Well, any small-time embezzler convicted in New York State faces the same horror of bunking with violent criminals. A car thief convicted of 10,000 counts of grand theft auto - and those would have to be luxury cars even to come close to the crimes committed at Tyco - would be pleased with a probable sentence of 10 to 12 years.

The persistent myth that a robber in a suit and tie instead of jeans and a T-shirt deserves a prison with better amenities should be put to rest for good.

In Bermuda, AIG Helped Shape A Legendary Corporate Haven (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson and Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

HAMILTON, Bermuda -- When insurance tycoon Cornelius Vander Starr came ashore just after World War II to set up the overseas operation of the company now known as American International Group Inc., this British colony 900 miles off South Carolina was a remote trading post primarily inhabited by descendants of colonists, slaves and shipwreck survivors.

Over the next half-century, AIG executives helped island officials shape a legal landscape that made Bermuda what it boasts is "the risk capital of world." Some of these laws and regulations have helped AIG in particular; others have favored insurers generally. Together they transformed the 21-square-mile island into the global center of the offshore-insurance industry, claiming more than $200 billion in assets.

AIG has profited handsomely in its custom-built corporate haven. Now the question is whether the company, even after helping to create a business nirvana, crossed the line of legality to obscure its activities there.

In May, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer sued AIG and its former chairman, Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, alleging that for many years, the giant insurer improperly used affiliates in Bermuda to burnish its financial results -- either by hiding losses with the affiliates or claiming their gains as its own. In some instances, the suit alleges, AIG failed to disclose its relationships with Bermuda companies, as required by American law.

AIG is in preliminary settlement talks with Mr. Spitzer's office, people familiar with the situation said. Mr. Greenberg's lawyers have said that he has done nothing wrong and will fight the civil allegations. The most prominent figure in his industry, Mr. Greenberg, 80 years old, was forced out of AIG in March amid regulatory inquiries that go far beyond the company's activities in Bermuda.

Also at the center of the Bermuda storm is a Greenberg subordinate named L. Michael Murphy. A former lawyer for the Internal Revenue Service, Mr. Murphy used to reach his AIG office in Hamilton by rowing a small boat from his elegant home across the turquoise waters of a narrow harbor. Since the 1970s, he had helped write local laws and lobbied for Bermuda in Washington -- all to AIG's advantage.

But in March, the New York-based company fired Mr. Murphy for allegedly refusing to cooperate with AIG lawyers gathering information for investigators from New York and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In his suit, filed in a New York state court, Attorney General Spitzer says that Mr. Murphy tried to destroy evidence in Bermuda potentially relevant to a pending investigation of the company's accounting.

Mr. Murphy, 62, wasn't named as a defendant in the New York suit. In an interview earlier this year, his attorney denied the document-destruction allegation and said Mr. Murphy has done nothing wrong.

The history of AIG's Bermuda operation illuminates how entwined the island is with the insurer's broader accounting troubles. This history also raises questions about whether the lightly regulated offshore-insurance industry facilitates abuses. Both state and federal regulators are looking at whether other insurers, as well as AIG, have misstated relationships with offshore affiliates.

An analysis by The Wall Street Journal of thousands of pages of regulatory filings shows that from 1995 through 2004, at least $2.48 billion flowed back and forth between AIG and eight of its offshore affiliates either domiciled in or run from Bermuda.

In many instances, AIG disclosed its involvement on both sides of deals. But in other cases, AIG's connections to the affiliates were obscure, potentially misleading both regulators and investors. Federal securities laws and state insurance statutes require detailed disclosure of any transactions involving "related parties." That requirement aims at preventing companies from hiding financial problems by means of contrived deals.

AIG has acknowledged that it accounted improperly for certain relationships with Bermuda affiliates. In May, in response to state and federal inquiries and investor lawsuits, the company restated five years of financial results, in part to correct this accounting.

AIG said that, beyond the items it has restated, its activity in Bermuda has been accounted for properly. Its operations in Bermuda reflect its dominant role in the world insurance market, and its transactions with the eight Bermuda companies are a small fraction of its total business, a company spokesman said in a statement. "Our offshore capabilities have helped us provide cost-effective insurance coverage to our customers and manage AIG's own risk retention efficiently," the spokesman added.

AIG Act

The arrival in Bermuda of a big U.S. company was unprecedented and required passage of a special law: the American International Co. Ltd. Act of 1947. The act created an exception to Bermuda's local-ownership requirement and exempted AIG from taxes on income that came from outside Bermuda. Two years later, Bermuda extended the benefits to other foreign companies.

AIG swiftly became one of the island's biggest employers, hiring scores of workers. In a further accommodation, Bermuda's parliament passed another law in 1951 making the insurer the first foreign company allowed to purchase island real estate.

Mr. Murphy joined AIG's Bermuda operations in 1972. A tall, athletic man who in his youth knocked around South America playing rugby, he typically wore expensive but rumpled suits, according to friends. Before coming to the insurer, he had worked at the IRS, helping to write intricate rules that sought to bolster domestic U.S. investment by imposing higher taxes on interest Americans received from foreign bonds.

Mr. Murphy put his knowledge of international tax law to use for his new employer. In 1973, he was named corporate secretary of one of AIG's oldest and most important island operations: Starr International Co. AIG's top executives have used the Panamanian corporation operated from Bermuda to control a deferred-compensation plan for the most senior company managers.

In the mid-1970s, Mr. Murphy helped island politicians draft a new insurance law for Bermuda that made the colony even more attractive to U.S. companies and insurers, according to David Gibbons, a former Bermuda premier, and Mansfield "James" Brock, a former financial secretary. "He gave us a lot of advice on not so much the insurance act itself but on how Bermuda's insurance regulation compared with and related to that of the United States," Mr. Brock said. Mr. Murphy advised the government on the standards it would need to attract business from the U.S. and avoid antagonizing American regulators, the former officials said.

The Bermuda Insurance Act of 1978 gave insurers broad discretion when investing income from premiums. It did little to regulate insurance rates or companies' conduct, and it set minimal requirements for the capital insurers had to have on hand. In all of these regards, Bermuda made itself a much less demanding host than American states, which regulate U.S. carriers.

DOJ_NMG_0006522

Still, American regulators and investors tacitly accepted the looser Bermuda standards, in part because the island did require that insurers document their solvency annually. Bermuda's use of familiar British law also reassured Americans. Insurance-industry executives point out that Bermuda's permissiveness and lack of bureaucracy allow AIG and other carriers to respond more quickly to American businesses squeezed by price increases or limited coverage -- especially after disasters such as the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "Bermuda has a strong, longstanding relationship and tradition of cooperation with U.S. regulatory bodies," said Cheryl-Ann Lister, chairman of the Bermuda Monetary Authority, a government agency.

Bermuda's 1978 act also created the Insurance Advisory Committee, a private-sector body that works with the government and has the effective clout to prevent any further regulation opposed by the industry. The panel was set up "to avoid government developing a bureaucracy," a former AIG executive named Brian Hall explained in a speech in 1985 quoted in the book "Held Captive: A History of International Insurance in Bermuda."

From 1980 through 2001, one member of the advisory committee was Joseph C.H. Johnson, another veteran AIG executive. The grandson of a local farmer, he joined the company in 1954 as a 17-year-old accounting trainee. For much of the 1980s, one of his duties at the committee was to help oversee which companies received government permission to form new insurers on the island -- an area of great interest to AIG, which was the sponsor of a number of new firms. Mr. Johnson, 67, received the Bermuda Insurance Institute's Lifetime Achievement Award in 2004. He couldn't be reached for comment.

Another role Mr. Murphy played beginning in the mid-1970s was shuttling to Washington to protect AIG's interests there. Longtime lawyers and lobbyists in Washington said that Mr. Murphy helped persuade members of Congress and their aides to establish a new rule for determining which jurisdiction's taxes applied to underwriting income. The old approach involved a complicated multifactor test. The new one established that premiums were taxed based on where the insured asset was. Included in tax-reform legislation in 1976, the change provided international insurers with clarity they strongly desired.

Competitive Threat

In 1986, Bermuda faced a competitive threat when Barbados signed a treaty with the U.S. exempting from American taxes all premiums paid by American companies to insurers in Barbados. Bermuda's then-premier, John Swan, recruited AIG to help secure a similar privilege. The company's Messrs. Murphy and Johnson served as official, though unpaid, representatives of the Bermuda government during negotiations in Washington that in 1988 produced the treaty Mr. Swan sought.

In behind-the-scenes lobbying, Mr. Murphy offered suggestions on treaty language, one lawyer familiar with the negotiations recalled. "Mike knows a lot of players in Washington," Mr. Swan said. "If you had to ask who was the person outside myself who really got involved, it would be Mike Murphy."

In addition to matching Barbados on the excise-tax exemption, the 1988 treaty contained a provision sought by AIG that turned out to be more important after Congress later repealed the excise exemption for both islands. The second provision laid out rules allowing Bermuda insurers to do business in the U.S. without incurring American income-tax liability. This advantage provides the economic foundation for most of the Bermuda insurance industry.

AIG began launching small affiliates in Barbados in the late 1970s, most of which Messrs. Murphy and Johnson helped run. Many of these affiliates sold reinsurance: policies that insurance companies themselves buy to lessen their potential expenditures when they have to make payments to customers.

AIG often bought reinsurance from Bermuda companies that it had helped set up. Properly disclosed, reinsurance is considered a legitimate financial arrangement. An AIG spokesman said that "as the world's largest commercial insurer, AIG is understandably the world's largest reinsurance buyer." The bulk of the Bermuda companies AIG helped set up were established to cover potential liabilities related to particular AIG clients, the spokesman said.

Operating the network of offshore affiliates sometimes entailed AIG executives flying from New York to Bermuda and Barbados for a series of airport board meetings on a single day, one former AIG official recalled.

In 1978, AIG established Inter-Hemispheric Insurance Co., a $50 million joint venture with reinsurer Munich Re AG. Inter-Hemispheric was one of the first firms to offer a form of reinsurance known as finite-risk insurance. Purchasers of these customized policies can use a favorable insurance-accounting method to record proceeds from the policies. But regulators suspect that some finite-risk policies are little more than disguised loans, which allow purchasers to prettify their books temporarily, without transferring real risk to the reinsurer. AIG and almost all other big insurance companies are currently under regulatory scrutiny in connection with potentially improper finite-risk policies.

DOJ_NMG_0006523

In 1986, Inter-Hemispheric was rechristened Richmond Insurance Co. Ltd. AIG's Bermuda office is on Richmond Road in Hamilton. Mr. Murphy was named Richmond's corporate secretary and an alternate director; Mr. Johnson was the president. Among the company's first customers was AIG.

By 1995, AIG was paying Richmond more than $200 million a year in premiums, according to the Journal analysis of AIG's state-regulatory filings. AIG stood to collect over a period of years more than $900 million in reinsurance payments from Richmond and its subsidiaries, the analysis shows. The net effect of all these transfers was that AIG shifted hundreds of millions of dollars of liabilities to Richmond. AIG nevertheless continued to tell New York state regulators that Richmond was an independent company, according to the New York lawsuit.

AIG told New York insurance regulators in the late 1990s that it owned just 19.99% of the offshore company and didn't control it. In 1999, the company filed with the New York State Department of Insurance a form known as a disclaimer of control related to Richmond, according to department records. Mr. Murphy signed the disclaimer.

New York's Mr. Spitzer, along with the state's insurance commissioner, Howard Mills, allege in the suit that the disclaimer omitted critical facts: An AIG unit managed key Richmond operations, and Richmond's purportedly independent outside investors -- Munich Re and others -- were guaranteed against losses by an AIG unit. The AIG filing caused skeptical New York regulators to back away from inquiries about the company's relationship with Richmond, the suit claims.

Under pressure from regulators, AIG acknowledged in March that it should have accounted for Richmond as a company it could control. AIG said it would fold into its financial statements the operations of Richmond, a move AIG said would have only a small financial impact.

Unusual Twist

There is an unusual twist to the Richmond matter: According to two people familiar with the situation, Mr. Murphy drafted and signed a second version of the New York-state filing that described accurately AIG's ties to Richmond. It was AIG lawyers in New York who chose which version to file with regulators, according to the two people. AIG declined to comment.

For Mr. Murphy, a particularly sensitive aspect of the Richmond arrangement was the guarantee AIG gave outside investors that it would buy them out if necessary. That meant AIG could be on the hook for Richmond's losses -- an indication that the larger company effectively controlled the smaller one. This guarantee was among the subjects of the minutes of a March 2005 meeting of Richmond's directors. New York alleges in its suit that Mr. Murphy tried to destroy the minutes.

Another Bermuda reinsurer, Union Excess Reinsurance Co., owed AIG nearly $500 million in reinsurance obligations by 2003, according to records of state regulators. Union Excess' owners were largely protected from an investment loss, thanks to an option to sell back their shares to the reinsurer. That option was guaranteed by a subsidiary of Starr International, the closely held firm run by AIG executives. Mr. Murphy signed the Dec. 20, 1993, agreement with Union Excess' investors on behalf of Starr International and its subsidiary.

Earlier this year, AIG said it had accounted for Union Excess improperly. Because of the guarantee against losses, among other factors, AIG said it should have treated Union Excess as if AIG controlled it, consolidating the smaller company's results into its own. Union Excess accounted for the single biggest hit to AIG's net worth -- $951 million -- in a $2.26 billion restatement that the company made in May. The restatement cut its net worth, or shareholders' equity, to $80.6 billion as of Dec. 31, 2004.

Mr. Greenberg's attorneys have argued that AIG didn't control Union Excess and so shouldn't have made the restatement.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ex-White House Aide Charged In Corruption Case (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006524

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - A senior White House budget official who resigned abruptly last week was arrested Monday on charges of lying to investigators and obstructing a federal inquiry involving Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist who has been under scrutiny by the Justice Department for more than a year.

The arrest of the official, David H. Safavian, head of procurement policy at the Office of Management and Budget, was the first to result from the wide-ranging corruption investigation of Mr. Abramoff, once among the most powerful and best-paid lobbyists in Washington and a close friend of Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader.

According to court papers, Mr. Safavian, 38, is accused of lying about assistance that he gave Mr. Abramoff in his earlier work at the General Services Administration, where he was chief of staff from 2002 to 2004, and about an expensive golf trip he took with the lobbyist to Scotland in August 2002.

Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner of Mr. Safavian, was indicted last month in Florida on unrelated federal fraud charges. He is not identified by name in the court papers involving Mr. Safavian's arrest. But "Lobbyist A" in an F.B.I. affidavit could only be Mr. Abramoff based on descriptive details in the documents filed in the Federal District Court here.

The Justice Department said Mr. Safavian had been specifically charged with making false statements to investigators about his efforts at the General Services Administration in 2002 to help Mr. Abramoff acquire two large pieces of government-owned property in the Washington area, including the historic Old Post Office Building on Pennsylvania Avenue.

The department said Mr. Safavian had also lied to ethics officials at the agency, which manages federal property, when he sought approval to accept free transportation from Mr. Abramoff for the golf trip to Scotland that summer. According to court documents, Mr. Safavian told the ethics office that Mr. Abramoff had no business with the agency at the time, an assertion that was repeated in a separate interview this May with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. DeLay, who has asked the House ethics committee to review his ties to Mr. Abramoff, has come under criticism from Congressional Democrats and ethics watchdog groups for taking a similar golf trip to Scotland with Mr. Abramoff in 2000, including rounds of golf on the fabled course at St. Andrews.

The Justice Department made no accusation in its court papers of any tie between Mr. DeLay and Mr. Safavian nor of any involvement by Mr. DeLay in Mr. Abramoff's effort to buy government property. A spokesman for Mr. Abramoff had no comment on the arrest of Mr. Safavian. Phone calls to Mr. Safavian's home in the Virginia suburbs of Washington were not returned.

The White House said in a statement that Mr. Safavian had resigned on Friday and that "we, of course, will cooperate fully with the Justice Department in this investigation." A spokesman said the White House would have no further comment on the arrest.

Mr. Safavian had recently been working on developing contracting policies for the multibillion-dollar relief effort after Hurricane Katrina.

The Justice Department did not reveal details of Mr. Safavian's arrest, including where it occurred. The department also did not say why the criminal charges were brought directly by prosecutors, rather than by the Washington grand jury investigating Mr. Abramoff. The Justice Department often bypasses a grand jury when a criminal case is brought together hurriedly or when there is fear that a defendant may try to flee.

The F.B.I. affidavit, which was dated Friday and made public on Monday, said that Mr. Safavian had provided extensive, secret assistance to Mr. Abramoff in 2002, when the lobbyist wanted help on behalf of a client to arrange a lease on favorable terms for the Old Post Office Building, which was controlled by the General Services Administration. The affidavit said the client was one of several Indian tribes that Mr. Abramoff has represented.

The court papers said Mr. Abramoff had also sought Mr. Safavian's help in buying 40 acres at the Naval Surface Warfare Center in the Maryland suburbs of Washington to be the new home of a Jewish children's school that Mr. Abramoff had founded. That property was also under the control of the General Services Administration.

Local real estate records suggest that neither property was acquired by Mr. Abramoff or his clients, despite his repeated requests for help in e-mail messages sent to a private account maintained by Mr. Safavian.

The Justice Department affidavit said that even as Mr. Safavian was trying to help Mr. Abramoff in acquiring the government property in 2002, he was eagerly planning his summer golf trip with the lobbyist to Scotland. The F.B.I. affidavit also suggested

DOJ_NMG_0006525

Mr. Abramoff's motivation in inviting Mr. Safavian was clear. In an e-mail message, a lobbyist colleagues asked: "Why dave? I like him but didn't know u did as much. Business angle?"

According to the court papers, Mr. Abramoff replied with another e-mail message: "Total business angle. He is new COS of GSA."

Like Mr. Abramoff, Mr. Safavian, a former Congressional aide, has extensive ties to prominent Republicans on Capitol Hill, throughout the executive branch and among the city's lobbying firms.

He helped start Janus-Merritt Strategies, a consulting firm, with Grover G. Norquist, the head of the conservative advocacy group Americans for Tax Reform and a close political ally of the Bush administration.

Mr. Safavian worked with Mr. Abramoff in the Washington lobbying offices of Preston Gates & Ellis, a Seattle-based firm. According to lobbying records, Mr. Safavian shared at least one client with Mr. Abramoff, the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, and also represented Microsoft, the Port of Seattle and the Dredging Contractors of America.

His wife, Jennifer Safavian, is chief counsel for oversight and investigations on the House Government Reform Committee, which is responsible for overseeing government procurement and is, among other things, expected to conduct the Congressional investigation into missteps after Hurricane Katrina.

Both Mr. Safavian and his wife graduated from Detroit College of Law at Michigan State University. They have a daughter.

According to his former colleagues in the Bush administration and interviews he gave, Mr. Safavian considered encouraging "competitive sourcing" or outsourcing government work to private contractors to be a primary goal in his job at the Office of Management and Budget.

He did not oversee specific contracts, but instead managed overall guidelines for government purchasing, associates said. In an interview in June with Federal Times, a newspaper that focuses on the workings of the federal government, Mr. Safavian described his work for the office and said that "the best advice I've gotten was from my grandfather and that advice is that you've got to have ethics and integrity in everything you do, especially here in D.C."

Bush Official Arrested In Corruption Probe (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The Bush administration's top federal procurement official resigned Friday and was arrested yesterday, accused of lying and obstructing a criminal investigation into Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings with the federal government. It was the first criminal complaint filed against a government official in the ongoing corruption probe related to Abramoff's activities in Washington.

The complaint, filed by the FBI, alleges that David H. Safavian, 38, a White House procurement official involved until last week in Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, made repeated false statements to government officials and investigators about a golf trip with Abramoff to Scotland in 2002.

It also contends that he concealed his efforts to help Abramoff acquire control of two federally managed properties in the Washington area. Abramoff is the person identified as "Lobbyist A" in a 13-page affidavit unsealed in court, according to sources knowledgeable about the probe.

Until his resignation on the day the criminal complaint against him was signed, Safavian was the top administrator at the federal procurement office in the White House Office of Management and Budget, where he set purchasing policy for the entire government.

The arrest occurred at his home in Alexandria. A man who answered the phone there yesterday hung up when a reporter asked to speak to Safavian.

Abramoff was indicted by federal prosecutors in Miami last month on unrelated charges of wire fraud and conspiracy. He remains the linchpin of an 18-month probe by a federal task force that includes the Internal Revenue Service, the Interior Department and the Justice Department's fraud and public integrity units. His lawyer did not respond to phone calls seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0006526

Abramoff's allegedly improper dealings with Indian tribes -- which netted him and an associate at least $82 million in fees -- prompted the federal probe. But investigators have found that his documents and e-mails contain a trove of information about his aggressive efforts to seek favors for clients from members of Congress and senior bureaucrats.

Accompanying Safavian and Abramoff on the 2002 trip to Scotland, for example, were Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Administration Committee, lobbyist and former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed and Neil Volz, a lobbyist with Abramoff at the Washington office of Greenburg Traurig.

Like Abramoff, Safavian is a veteran Washington player. He is a former lobbying partner of anti-tax crusader Grover Norquist and previously worked with Abramoff at another firm. Both he and Abramoff have represented gambling clients and Indian tribes with gambling interests.

At the time of the golf trip, Safavian was chief of staff at the General Services Administration, where ethics rules flatly prohibited the receipt of a gift from any person seeking an official action by the agency. When Safavian asked GSA ethics officers for permission to go on the trip, he assured them in writing that Abramoff "has no business before GSA," according to the affidavit signed by FBI special agent Jeffrey A. Reising.

Reising alleged, however, that Abramoff had by then already secretly enlisted Safavian in an effort to buy 40 acres of land that GSA managed in Silver Spring for use as the campus of a Hebrew school Abramoff founded. Safavian also allegedly tried to help Abramoff lease space for Abramoff's clients in an old post office building downtown.

On July 22, 2002, Abramoff sent Safavian an e-mail with a proposed draft letter that "at least two members of Congress" could send to GSA supporting the lease, according to the affidavit. "Does this work, or do you want it to be longer?" Abramoff asked.

Three days later, Safavian forwarded Abramoff an e-mail describing how an employee at OMB was resisting Abramoff's plan to lease space at the post office. "I suspect we'll end up having to bring some Hill pressure to bear on OMB," Safavian messaged Abramoff.

On the same day Safavian discussed the golf trip with the ethics office, he sent an e-mail to Abramoff from his home computer, advising him how to "lay out a case for this lease." Abramoff subsequently wrote in an e-mail to his wife and two officials of the school that Safavian had shown him a map of the property at his GSA office but had cautioned that Abramoff should not visit again "given my high profile politically."

Safavian nonetheless arranged a meeting for Abramoff's wife and business partner with officials at GSA on the day before he departed for Scotland aboard Abramoff's chartered jet. The trip cost more than $120,000 and was paid for mostly by a charity founded and run by Abramoff, the Capital Athletic Foundation.

When Safavian was questioned by The Washington Post about the trip in January, he said he paid his share of the expenses and took unpaid leave. "The trip was exclusively personal; I did no business there. . . . Jack is an old friend of mine," Safavian said.

But the complaint alleges that Safavian lied about his contacts with Abramoff on three occasions after his initial false pledge to the GSA ethics officer. The first was during a 2003 investigation by GSA's inspector general, who was responding to an anonymous tipster's hotline complaint; the second was in a March 17, 2005, letter to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs; and the third was during an FBI interview on May 26, 2005.

Former White House Official Arrested (AJC/AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — A former Bush administration official was arrested Monday on charges he made false statements and obstructed a federal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff, according to court documents and government officials.

David Safavian, then-chief of staff of the General Services Administration and a former Abramoff lobbying associate, concealed from federal investigators that Abramoff was seeking to do business with GSA when Safavian joined him on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to an FBI affidavit and the officials.

At the time, FBI agent Jeffrey A. Reising said in the affidavit, a lobbyist — identified separately as Abramoff — had enlisted Safavian's help in trying to gain control of 40 acres of land at the Federal Research Center at White Oak in Silver Spring, Md., for a private high school that Abramoff helped establish and supported.

For his part, Safavian edited a letter the lobbyist was preparing to send to GSA, and arranged and attended a meeting involving a GSA official, the lobbyist's wife and others to discuss leasing the property, the affidavit said.

Abramoff told his wife to use her maiden name at the meeting because Safavian sought to play down Abramoff's involvement, the affidavit said, citing an e-mail from Abramoff.

Safavian was given clearance to go on the August 2002 golf trip after telling GSA's ethics officer that the lobbyist "has no business before GSA," the affidavit said.

Nine people, including Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, made the trip and played golf on the fabled Old Course at St. Andrews. Safavian paid $3,100 for the travel, "in the exercise of discretion," he said, as quoted in the affidavit. The total cost was more than $100,000, the affidavit said.

Safavian moved to the Office of Management and Budget last year, becoming the administration's top procurement official. He resigned that post, effective Friday, OMB spokesman Alex Conant said.

No one answered the phone at a listing for Safavian in Alexandria, Va.

Safavian worked with Abramoff on the team at the Preston, Gates & Ellis law firm that was lobbying to keep the Northern Mariana Islands free from certain U.S. labor and immigration laws during the last half of the 1990s.

Abramoff is not named in the affidavit, but two government officials confirmed he is the person referred to in the affidavit as Lobbyist A. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is still under way.

In addition, Safavian was asked in February for information about the golf trip by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Both the Senate panel and a federal grand jury are investigating deals in which Abramoff and an associate received at least $66 million from six Indian tribes to lobby for their casinos and other interests. The tribes question whether the charges were excessive.

Congressional Democrats have raised questions about Abramoff's ties to House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas. The congressman has asked the House Ethics Committee to review allegations that Abramoff or his clients paid some of DeLay's overseas travel expenses. DeLay has denied knowing that the expenses were paid by the lobbyist.

Separately, Abramoff has pleaded innocent to a six-count federal fraud and conspiracy indictment stemming from his role in the 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats in Florida.

Former White House Budget Official Arrested (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt And G. Robert Hillman

The Dallas Morning News, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON – A former high-ranking Bush administration budget official was arrested Monday on charges of lying and obstructing a federal investigation into his business dealings with a lobbyist identified as Jack Abramoff.

David Safavian resigned Friday as top procurement officer for the White House budget office, the day the FBI filed a criminal complaint charging he made false statements to the General Services Administration's ethics office and inspector general.

An FBI affidavit alleges that Mr. Safavian, while the GSA's chief of staff, helped a lobbyist in his attempts to acquire GSA-controlled property in the Washington area. In 2002, the affidavit says, the lobbyist took Mr. Safavian and others on a golf outing to Scotland.

While the 13-page affidavit refers only to "Lobbyist A," a government official, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that Mr. Abramoff is the lobbyist.

"Before and after the August 2002 golf trip, Safavian advised and assisted Lobbyist A in his efforts to conduct the aforementioned business with GSA," FBI Agent Jeffrey Reising wrote in the affidavit.

Mr. Safavian did not return a call to his home Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0006528

Mr. Abramoff, who once had close ties to House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, has been indicted on federal fraud charges for his role in the purchase of a company that operates casino ships in Florida. He has pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Abramoff's attorney, Abbe Lowell, offered no immediate comment on the latest twist in the federal investigation of his client's dealings, which previously focused on the casino and his dealings with Indian tribes.

The filing clearly points to Mr. Abramoff – saying he represented Indian tribal clients, had worked with Mr. Safavian at a Washington law firm and established a private high school. Also, Mr. Safavian accompanied Mr. Abramoff on an August 2002 golf trip to Scotland, along with Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, the Republican chairman of the House Administration Committee, and lobbyist Ralph Reed, among others.

In a June 15, 2002, e-mail to a colleague, according to the affidavit, the lobbyist explained why he'd invited Mr. Safavian on the golfing trip: "Total business angle. He is new [chief of staff] of GSA."

From May 2002, when Mr. Safavian was the GSA's chief of staff, through the August golf trip, the affidavit says, the lobbyist sought to acquire as a site for his high school some 40 acres at the Naval Surface Warfare Center-White Oak, which was controlled by the GSA. The FBI affidavit also says the lobbyist also sought changes in regulations for another GSA-controlled building in Washington, the Old Post Office, in ways that could have benefited his Indian tribal clients seeking to lease and develop the building.

E-mail excerpts quoted in the affidavit suggest Mr. Safavian offered advice to the lobbyist on how to approach the GSA and lobby Congress to secure the land. He forwarded internal communications to the lobbyist, the affidavit says. And Mr. Safavian counseled the lobbyist's wife not to use her marital name during a meeting with GSA officials to discuss providing land for the school.

In a July 21, 2002, e-mail to a colleague, the lobbyist wrote that Mr. Safavian was "totally supportive" of the efforts to acquire the White Oak land for his school, the affidavit said.

At the White House budget office, spokesman Alex Conant said that Mr. Safavian had resigned Friday and the office was cooperating in the investigation.

Jack Lebo, a spokesman for the GSA's inspector general, didn't immediately return phone calls.

GSA spokeswoman Mary Alice Johnson declined to comment, saying, "The matter is part of an ongoing investigation. The agency is cooperating fully, and the U.S. Department of Justice has asked us to direct all questions to them."

Mr. Safavian, who once was an Abramoff colleague at a Washington law firm, was tapped by President Bush for the White House budget post in November 2003 and was confirmed by the Senate nearly a year later.

Official, Abramoff Associate Arrested (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 20, 2005

David Hossein Safavian, the Bush administration's top federal procurement officer in the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), was arrested yesterday based on a three-count criminal complaint filed in federal court, according to a Justice Department statement.

The government alleges that Safavian, as chief of staff at the General Services Administration (GSA), helped an unnamed lobbyist acquire GSA-controlled property in and around Washington, D.C.

Sources say the lobbyist is likely Jack Abramoff, who has been indicted by a grand jury in Florida. Safavian and Abramoff worked together at Preston, Gates and the two traveled with Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and others on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002.

Safavian allegedly told a GSA ethics officer and GSA's inspector general that the lobbyist had no business with GSA before the August 2002 golf trip, the Justice Department statement said.

A spokesperson for Abramoff declined to comment.

Government Executive magazine reported that Safavian resigned last Friday as the head of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy at OMB.

Bush Appointee Is Arrested In Obstruction Case (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr. And Chuck Neubauer, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — A top federal procurement appointee of President Bush was arrested Monday on charges that he made false statements and obstructed a federal probe when he was questioned about a Scotland golfing junket arranged by lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In a three-count criminal complaint made public Monday, David H. Safavian was accused of lying to an ethics officer in the General Services Administration regarding his dealings with the lobbyist, who flew him to Scotland in August 2002.

Safavian, former chief of staff of the GSA, also is accused of obstructing an inspector general's investigation into whether he improperly accepted favors from the lobbyist.

Safavian, 38, was with the GSA when he traveled to Scotland.

He was confirmed as the chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget in November 2004.

He resigned Friday, according to Alex Conant, an OMB spokesman.

Safavian could not be reached for comment. Abramoff, through a spokesman, declined to answer questions.

Safavian, while working at the GSA, allegedly aided Abramoff's attempts to acquire GSA-controlled property for a school that the lobbyist had established in the Washington area.

Although the 14-page affidavit refers to Abramoff only as "Lobbyist A," Safavian previously named Abramoff as the person who arranged the 2002 trip.

A federal investigator, speaking on condition of anonymity, also confirmed that Abramoff was the unidentified lobbyist cited in the complaint.

According to the affidavit made public Monday, Safavian assisted the lobbyist in trying to acquire 40 acres of land controlled by the GSA for the school.

Abramoff also sought Safavian's assistance for a private client who was trying to lease a Washington office building from the GSA.

The inside help predated the golf junket and continued afterward, the document said.

Nonetheless, Safavian told an ethics official that the lobbyist "had no business before GSA and did all of his work on Capitol Hill."

The former GSA chief of staff "also omitted the fact that [Abramoff] was actively seeking assistance from the GSA and that Safavian was aiding in that effort," the affidavit said.

The affidavit, signed by an FBI agent, cites e-mails from Abramoff.

In one e-mail to Safavian, for example, Abramoff asked whether the GSA had control of property in Silver Springs, Md., that he sought for the private Jewish school he founded.

Safavian responded with his own e-mail on July 2, 2002, giving details of the property's status and suggesting that the two of them discuss the matter.

Abramoff later bragged to a colleague that Safavian was helping with the effort to secure the property.

Abramoff also sent his wife to a meeting at the GSA, according to another e-mail, because he didn't want to attract attention due to his own "high profile politically." Safavian attended the meeting, according to the complaint.

The complaint states that Safavian gave Abramoff specific advice on the drafting of a letter to the GSA regarding the property.

Abramoff has been indicted in Florida on charges of fraud relating to the purchase of a fleet of gambling boats.

Separately, he is the subject of a wide-ranging federal probe of his lobbying efforts for Indian tribes operating or seeking to operate casinos.

In his e-mail to a GSA ethics officer, Safavian described the 2002 trip that he would be taking and added that it was being arranged by a former colleague. Safavian had worked with Abramoff at a Washington law firm a decade ago.

"He is paying the cost of the aircraft regardless of whether I go or not.

"In fact, none of the other guests will be paying a proportional share of the aircraft costs," Safavian wrote.

After the trip, Safavian showed the inspector general a copy of his $3,100 check to Abramoff, indicating that he had paid his own way.

Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, also went on the trip but a spokesman said Monday that the congressman had not been questioned about it. Ney has said he had been told that the trip was paid for by the National Center for Public Policy Research. That group, however, has denied financing the junket to the famous St. Andrews golf course.

According to the complaint, "Indian tribal funds" paid for the trip.

Ex-OMB Official Hit With Charges (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

The Justice Department on Monday filed criminal charges against David Hossein Safavian, who until last week was a top official at the Office of Management and Budget, for making false statements and obstructing a federal investigation into efforts by former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff to acquire federally owned property in the Washington, D.C., area for an Orthodox Jewish school that Abramoff had founded.

Safavian also allegedly tried to help Abramoff gain control of the Old Post Office Pavilion in downtown Washington for one of his American-Indian clients.

The criminal complaint filed Monday stems from activities surrounding a now-infamous golfing junket to Scotland in August 2002 that included Abramoff, House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (R-Ohio), several Ney aides and Ralph Reed, former executive director of the Christian Coalition and an old Abramoff friend.

Safavian, a former chief of staff to Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), worked with Abramoff at the law and lobbying firm Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds in 1995, and at the time of the golfing trip had just been promoted to chief of staff at the General Services Administration. GSA oversees thousands of buildings owned or leased by the federal government.

According to an affidavit released by the Justice Department on Monday night in support of the criminal charges against Safavian, the FBI, GSA and Interior Department have been "examining allegations concerning an August 2002 Scotland golf trip that Safavian took with a Washington, D.C., lobbyist ('Lobbyist A') and Safavian's statement regarding Lobbyist A's dealing with GSA at the time that Safavian accompanied Lobbyist A on that trip."

Abramoff is not mentioned by name in the affidavit, although his participation in the August 2002 Scotland trip has been well established by federal investigators and the news media.

Beginning in May 2002 until after the August 2002 trip, Abramoff reportedly tried to "acquire approximately 40 acres of land controlled by GSA" at the Naval Surface Warfare Center-White Oak, a federal facility located in Silver Spring, Md., for Abramoff's school, according to the affidavit.

In addition, Abramoff sought "changes in the regulations governing the development" of the Old Post Office building on Pennsylvania Avenue. "GSA controlled the building and was considering ways to develop the OPO," states the affidavit.

Abramoff reportedly sought "contracting preferences that could have given some of Lobbyist A's tribal clients a competitive advantage in efforts to lease and develop the building," the affidavit said.

Safavian, who resigned last Friday as administrator of federal procurement policy at OMB, allegedly provided Abramoff with advice on how to proceed in getting GSA approval for both projects.

Safavian was co-founder of the lobbying shop Janus-Merritt Strategies along with GOP activist Grover Norquist, an Abramoff ally who has also attracted Senate scrutiny over his financial dealings with the former lobbyist. One of the clients Safavian lobbied for at Janus-Merritt was the National Indian Gaming Association.

Abramoff and a business associate were indicted in Miami last month on wire and mail fraud charges related to his attempt to purchase a Florida-based casino cruise company in 2000.

Brian Walsh, a spokesman for Ney, said the Ohio Republican had no comment on Safavian's indictment other than to say that Ney himself has not been contacted himself by any of the handful of federal agencies or grand juries that are looking into Abramoff's business dealings.

"No federal investigators have contacted the Congressman on this or any other matter connected to Jack Abramoff," said Walsh.

In travel disclosure documents filed with the House, Ney stated that the National Center for Public Policy Research paid for the Scotland trip, although that organization has now said it did not. The Capital Athletic Foundation, a non-profit controlled by Abramoff, chartered a private jet for the trip, and overall expenses for the junket were well in excess of $100,000, according to The Washington Post.

House Democrats immediately pounced on this latest indictment as further evidence that Ney needs to be voted out of office in November 2006.

"With two of his golf partners arrested in one month's time, Congressman Bob Ney must be worried about the integrity of his four-some," said John Lapp, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in a statement. "Every arrest and indictment is a reminder to the American people that this special interest Congress is more concerned with protecting their cronies than fighting for middle class families."

On July 25, 2002, Safavian sought clearance from a GSA ethics officer about taking part in the Scotland golf trip scheduled for the following month. But Justice Department documents say Safavian "omitted the fact" that Abramoff had business before GSA and that he was helping Abramoff.

On March 26, 2003, an anonymous tipster made a complaint to a hotline run by the Office of Inspector General at GSA "regarding Savafian's participation in an 'international golfing trip provided by lobbyists.'"

Safavian was questioned by a GSA official in March and April 2003, but he "falsely represented to the GSA-OIG that Lobbyist A had no business with GSA prior to the August 2002 golf trip, and Safavian omitted the fact that he was aiding Lobbyist A in Lobbyist A's attempts to do business with GSA and seek official action from GSA."

In late February 2005, the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which has been looking into Abramoff's dealings with a half-dozen Indian tribes, contacted Safavian seeking information on the 2002 junket.

According to the Justice Department affidavit, Safavian again "falsely represented" to the Indian Affairs Committee and its chairman, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), that Abramoff had no business before GSA at the time of the August 2002 trip.

The DOJ affidavit also included information gleaned from numerous e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff, including one from May 24, 2002, shortly after Safavian was invited on the Scotland trip, "asking if GSA had property available for a school."

Abramoff "solicited Safavian's assistance and guidance" on the two projects, including having Safavian review a "draft letter purportedly to be sent by at least two members of Congress to the Administrator of GSA" asking for "special consideration" for minority businesses, such as Indian tribes. The Members assisting Abramoff in this action were not named in the DOJ affidavit.

On July 30, 2002, Abramoff sent his wife and two other representatives of his school to met with GSA officials about acquiring land for his school. Abramoff, according to the Justice Department affidavit, "cautioned his wife to avoid using their marital name" during that meeting because of his "high profile politically."

In May 2005, when interviewed by the FBI at the Old Executive Office Building, Safavian again said that Abramoff did not seek to acquire property from GSA until "significantly well after" the August 2002 trip.

Safavian, whose wife serves as a top aide to Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), on the House Government Reform Committee, did not return several calls seeking comment at press time.

A spokesman for Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, declined to comment on the charges against Safavian.

Top Federal Procurement Official Arrested (FEDTIMES)

By CHRIS GOSIER

Federal Times, September 20, 2005

The Bush administration's top procurement policy official was arrested Sept. 19 on charges that he made false statements to investigators examining whether he improperly aided a lobbyist trying to acquire federal property in and around Washington.

The federal investigation also is looking into whether the official, David Safavian, improperly accompanied the lobbyist on a golf trip to Scotland in August 2002. Safavian is administrator of federal procurement policy at the Office of Management and Budget. Safavian resigned his post on Friday, Sept. 16.

Safavian is accused of obstructing an investigation by the inspector general at the General Services Administration, authorities said Sept. 19. Safavian had previously served as chief of staff at GSA before taking the post at OMB.

The three-count complaint filed Sept. 16 in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. accuses Safavian of making false statements to a GSA ethics officer as well as the GSA inspector general while serving as the agency's chief of staff from May 2002 to January 2004.

Safavian was arrested Monday, the Justice Department said in a release. Deputy OFPP Administrator Robert Burton is serving as interim administrator, said Alex Conant, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, OFPP's parent agency.

Safavian did not return a call to comment by press time.

Key OMB Official Arrested (GOVEXEC)

By Kimberly Palmer

Government Executive, September 20, 2005

David Safavian, who was chief of procurement policy in the Bush administration's Office of Management and Budget until late last week, was arrested Monday on charges of making false statements and obstructing a federal investigation.

Safavian is charged with making false statements to a General Services Administration ethics officer and the GSA inspector general's office. Safavian served as chief of staff at GSA before moving to OMB.

Safavian resigned as head of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy effective Friday, an OMB spokesman said. Robert Burton, associate administrator of OFPP, will head the office on an interim basis, the spokesman said.

The Justice Department announced that Safavian "allegedly aided a Washington, D.C., lobbyist in the lobbyist's attempts to acquire GSA-controlled property in and around Washington, D.C.," and that Safavian joined the lobbyist on a Scotland golf trip.

Safavian allegedly misled GSA officials when he said the lobbyist "had no business" with GSA prior to the golf trip, when in fact Safavian had helped the lobbyist "in his attempts to do business with GSA," Justice said.

The lobbyist, though not named in the Justice announcement, is likely Jack Abramoff, a Washington lobbyist who has been the subject of a long-running federal investigation. In August 2002, Safavian joined Abramoff, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed and others on a trip to St. Andrews, Scotland.

The Washington Post reported last year that the expenses for the chartered jet that ferried the group to Scotland were paid by the Capital Athletic Foundation, a charity run by Abramoff and his wife.

OMB referred all questions about Safavian to Justice officials.

Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at OMB, convened a meeting Monday morning to inform agency employees of Safavian's arrest, according to a government source who asked to remain anonymous. Johnson told staff members to support Safavian's family, and cautioned them against responding to him should he attempt to contact them, the source said.

During his confirmation hearings for his position as OFPP chief, Safavian said he worked as a lobbyist and consultant for a variety of organizations, including the Embassy of Pakistan, Microsoft and several Native American groups.

Safavian also has strong ties to Capitol Hill. Before joining GSA, he served as chief of staff to Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, and also has worked for former Michigan House members William Schuette and Robert Davis, both Republicans.

Amelia Gruber contributed to this report.

Recruits Sought For Porn Squad (WP)

By Barton Gellman

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The FBI is joining the Bush administration's War on Porn. And it's looking for a few good agents.

Early last month, the bureau's Washington Field Office began recruiting for a new anti-obscenity squad. Attached to the job posting was a July 29 Electronic Communication from FBI headquarters to all 56 field offices, describing the initiative as "one of the top priorities" of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and, by extension, of "the Director." That would be FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III.

Mischievous commentary began propagating around the water coolers at 601 Fourth St. NW and its satellites, where the FBI's second-largest field office concentrates on national security, high-technology crimes and public corruption.

The new squad will divert eight agents, a supervisor and assorted support staff to gather evidence against "manufacturers and purveyors" of pornography -- not the kind exploiting children, but the kind that depicts, and is marketed to, consenting adults.

"I guess this means we've won the war on terror," said one exasperated FBI agent, speaking on the condition of anonymity because poking fun at headquarters is not regarded as career-enhancing. "We must not need any more resources for espionage."

Among friends and trusted colleagues, an experienced national security analyst said, "it's a running joke for us."

A few of the printable samples:

"Things I Don't Want On My Résumé, Volume Four."

"I already gave at home."

"Honestly, most of the guys would have to recuse themselves."

Federal obscenity prosecutions, which have been out of style since Attorney General Edwin Meese III in the Reagan administration made pornography a signature issue in the 1980s, do "encounter many legal issues, including First Amendment claims," the FBI headquarters memo noted.

Applicants for the porn squad should therefore have a stomach for the kind of material that tends to be most offensive to local juries. Community standards -- along with a prurient purpose and absence of artistic merit -- define criminal obscenity under current Supreme Court doctrine.

"Based on a review of past successful cases in a variety of jurisdictions," the memo said, the best odds of conviction come with pornography that "includes bestiality, urination, defecation, as well as sadistic and masochistic behavior." No word on the universe of other kinks that helps make porn a multibillion-dollar industry.

Popular acceptance of hard-core pornography has come a long way, with some of its stars becoming mainstream celebrities and their products -- once confined to seedy shops and theaters -- being "purveyed" by upscale hotels and most home cable and satellite television systems. Explicit sexual entertainment is a profit center for companies including General Motors Corp. and Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. (the two major owners of DirecTV), Time Warner Inc. and the Sheraton, Hilton, Marriott and Hyatt hotel chains.

But Gonzales endorses the rationale of predecessor Meese: that adult pornography is a threat to families and children. Christian conservatives, long skeptical of Gonzales, greeted the pornography initiative with what the Family Research Council called "a growing sense of confidence in our new attorney general."

Congress began funding the obscenity initiative in fiscal 2005 and specified that the FBI must devote 10 agents to adult pornography. The bureau decided to create a dedicated squad only in the Washington Field Office. "All other field offices may investigate obscenity cases pursuant to this initiative if resources are available," the directive from headquarters said. "Field offices should not, however, divert resources from higher priority matters, such as public corruption."

Public corruption, officially, is fourth on the FBI's priority list, after protecting the United States from terrorist attack, foreign espionage and cyber-based attacks. Just below those priorities are civil rights, organized crime, white-collar crime and "significant violent crime." The guidance from headquarters does not mention where pornography fits in.

"The Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation's top priority remains fighting the war on terrorism," said Justice Department press secretary Brian Roehrkasse. "However, it is not our sole priority. In fact, Congress has directed the department to focus on other priorities, such as obscenity."

At the FBI's field office, spokeswoman Debra Weierman expressed disappointment that some of her colleagues find grist for humor in the new campaign. "The adult obscenity squad . . . stems from an attorney general mandate, funded by Congress," she said. "The personnel assigned to this initiative take the responsibility of this assignment very seriously and are dedicated to the success of this program."

U.S. Jury Signals Possible Deadlock In John A. `Junior' Gotti Mafia Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006534

(AP) - NEW YORK-A federal jury deliberating the case of John A. "Junior" Gotti, the scion of the Gambino crime family charged with attacking a radio show host, indicated Monday that it was deadlocked on a racketeering charge against the son of the late mob boss.

In a note to U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin on the seventh day of deliberations, jurors asked what they should do if they were deadlocked over the question of Gotti's so-called withdrawal defense.

Gotti, 41, claims he quit the Gambino organized crime family before July 22, 1999, meaning the five-year statute of limitations would have expired on racketeering charges.

The judge told lawyers she planned to read the jurors a charge that would encourage them to keep deliberating until they reached an unanimous verdict.

Prosecutors allege Gotti ordered his Gambino crew to give radio personality Curtis Sliwa a severe beating in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air rants against his father, John Gotti.

A masked hit man shot Sliwa, an outspoken founder of the Guardian Angels crime-fighting group, during a struggle in a taxi. Sliwa survived, and he testified last month against Gotti, as did admitted mobsters who pleaded guilty and became government cooperators.

The defense told jurors that Gotti had nothing to do with the Sliwa attack and said he retired from the Gambinos following an unrelated racketeering conviction in 1999. Prosecutors dismissed the claim, saying Gotti used his name to rise in the crime organization and gave orders and collected kickbacks beyond 1999.

Gotti faces a sentence of up to 30 years in prison if convicted of multiple racketeering charges. His father was sentenced to life in prison in 1992 and died there 10 years later.

Three Arrested In Army Kickback Scheme (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 20, 2005

A civilian Army employee and two business owners were arrested in a kickback scheme to supply furnishings at a new Pentagon-run hotel in the Bavarian Alps that is used by troops on leave from Afghanistan and Iraq, the Justice Department said Monday.

Steven G. Potoski, 45, former contracting director at the Edelweiss Lodge and Resort in Garmisch, Germany, accepted more than $350,000 in bribes in cash, home renovations, trips, computers and tickets to such events as Oktoberfest and the Indianapolis 500, assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said.

Potoski, who lives in Garmisch, was arrested Friday, along with Alvan Vance McQueen, 56, of Shelbyville, Ind., and Ellis Abramson, 39, of Merrick, N.Y.

McQueen, owner of Flat Rock Furniture in Waldron, Ind., paid Potoski $45,000 in cash and other items as part of an agreement to inflate the cost of furniture for the hotel and split the extra money, according to a criminal complaint filed against McQueen in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis.

Abramson, president of Bramson House Inc., had a similar arrangement with Potoski for draperies and guest room bedspreads, according to a criminal complaint filed against Abramson in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Potoski also accepted bribes from 12 German and one British contractor, Fisher said.

If convicted, the three men face up to 35 years in prison.

The 330-room Edelweiss hotel opened last year, serving active-duty and retired U.S. military personnel. The hotel offers special packages for soldiers who are on leave from duty in Afghanistan and Iraq. The military has run hotel and recreation programs in the Alps since the end of World War II.

___

On the Net:

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Three More Sentenced For Corruption (TTNJ)

By KRYSTAL KNAPP, Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0006535

The Times (NJ), September 20, 2005

A former Mercer County official and two local businessmen were sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to 23 months by a federal judge yesterday for their roles in schemes to defraud the Mercer County Improvement Authority and bribe a local government official.

U.S. District Judge Garrett E. Brown Jr. sentenced former MCIA Executive Director James R. Lambert Sr., 44, and Washington Township businessman Alex J. Abdalla, 52, to five months in federal prison, five months of house arrest with electronic monitoring, three years of probation and $6,000 in fines each for their guilty pleas to charges of mail fraud and conspiring to bribe former Ewing Mayor Alfred W. Bridges to use his influence to steer a private demolition contract in the township.

Hamilton businessman and contractor Michael Maurio, 69, was sentenced to 23 months in federal prison and three years of probation for his part in the conspiracy to defraud the MCIA by submitting false statements in connection with the performance of a demolition project contract in Trenton. Maurio also failed to submit tax returns from 1992 to 1998 for taxes owed totaling $155,028.

Abdalla and Maurio jointly must pay a total of $100,000 in restitution to the MCIA for the overbilling on the demolition project that sources say involved the Sovereign Bank Arena.

All three men declined to talk to reporters after they were sentenced. They have 30 days to turn themselves in to authorities before they serve their time in federal prison. There is no parole in the federal prison system.

Their sentencing nearly brings to a close a federal investigation that has lasted more than three years.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie yesterday praised local FBI agents, special agents of the Internal Revenue Service criminal investigation unit and Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Bocian and Jeffrey S. Chiesa for their work in the case while deploring the corruption of defendants in the probe.

"These individuals and their co-conspirators demonstrated an appalling willingness to corruptly use government coffers for their own financial gain," Christie said.

-- -- --

According to the terms of their plea agreements, Lambert, Abdalla and Maurio agreed to cooperate with the government in its investigation of Mercer County public corruption.

They are the three latest figures to be sentenced in connection with the federal probe. Harry G. Parkin, the chief of staff to former Mercer County Executive Robert D. Prunetti, was sentenced last month to 7 1/2 years in federal prison for using his position to foster a secret financial interest in the county's recycling hauler.

Two more people with ties to the probe are scheduled to be sentenced: Abdalla's business partner John Ruddy and businessman Jim Wells, who pleaded guilty Friday to charges he attempted to bribe a local official.

Lambert, Abdalla and Maurio were sentenced separately yesterday, their hearings spread throughout the day in Brown's courtroom.

Of the three, Lambert was the only one to show any emotion, his voice quavering, his comments interspersed with sniffles as he told the judge how sorry he was. "I apologize to you, the public and my family. I'm ashamed of my actions. I'm truly sorry for what I have done."

His lawyer, Paul H. Zoubek of Haddonfield, argued that Lambert's sentence should be reduced or that he should be placed under house arrest because of his cooperation in the federal probe that included the tape-recording of more than 100 conversations over a three-year period. "He fully cooperated with the FBI from the beginning," Zoubek said. "He not only talked about remorse, but he moved forward to make amends and took full responsibility for his actions."

-- -- --

Lawyers for the federal government acknowledged Lambert helped tremendously from the time he was first contacted and without his help they could not have gotten to the heart of the scheme Parkin tried to keep secret.

But Brown said it was his obligation to weigh both the seriousness of the crimes and the crucial assistance Lambert gave to the government.

"He had no prior criminal record or criminal involvement, but when he got involved, he really got involved," Brown said. "He had a history of public service, but then he attacked the very structure he worked for.

"This is the sort of crime that is really very corrosive to government. . . . As I've said to a number of people who have come before me, what message do we have to send (to public officials)? If we go back 30-plus years ago, in this same courthouse we were sending the same message, but it doesn't seem to have been received yet. I will say it again and again until it is received."

As Brown sentenced Lambert, his wife Kate, a former Hamilton school board president, sat in the first row of the courtroom, her eyes welling with tears. She and Lambert left the room hand-in-hand and said nothing.

About a half-dozen family members and friends attended Abdalla's sentencing in which lawyer Lawrence S. Grossman asked that he be allowed to serve his sentence at home.

"He's been of substantial assistance to the government both in the scope and quality of the investigation," Grossman said. "He recorded hundreds of tapes. He did whatever he was asked to do. He admitted his guilt from the start and agreed to cooperate. . . . I can assure you he will never be back in this or any other courtroom."

Brown noted that Abdalla held back some of the money he was supposed to turn over from the business. Grossman said he did so because he had to support himself and later returned the money.

"I never downplayed anything, was never bitter, I tried to make right by the government, which I did," Abdalla said. "I blame no one else. I apologize to the court, county, and city for any wrongdoing and to my family, friends, and fiancee Victoria. When this earthquake hit, she gave me a foundation to lean on and turned the negative into positive."

-- -- --

Abdalla's fiancee began to cry during his comments and continued to sob as Brown spoke, saying he considered both the cooperation and the offenses in determining the sentence.

"He cooperated because he himself was caught red-handed in a scheme to bribe a public official," Brown said. "Mail fraud conspiracy, falsifying federal tax returns, this conduct has a corrosive effect on government."

Maurio received the toughest sentence of all three, 23 months, for his part in jacking up the cost of the demolition project and collecting an extra $25,000 from the deal. The lawyers for the federal government said he was of no assistance to the government. He acknowledged his own conduct but did not offer any cooperation that was of any value, lawyers said.

His lawyer, Paul M. Donini of Hamilton, said he was "the least involved" in seeing the scheme to its fruition and was unaware of other schemes. "Prior to this, he was a law-abiding citizen," Donini said. "The last 2 1/2 years have been a living hell for him. He and his family have suffered."

Donini argued that Maurio did not provide other information because he had no further knowledge to give the government. He argued for house arrest in lieu of a prison term so Maurio could meet his financial obligations to his family and because Maurio has a heart problem.

"He would be a prisoner in own home," Donini said. "He used to be the man about town. That lifestyle has ended out of necessity. This is an aberration in his life. He is remorseful, and this is a hardship to the family that loves him."

Maurio, who sat quietly throughout most of the proceedings and only turned his head to gaze back at the three women family members in the courtroom every few minutes, said he took full responsibility for his actions.

"There is nothing other than that to say except that I am sorry for the county, myself and my family," he said, adding that if he were placed under house arrest he could complete several pending deals to pay his restitution and back taxes.

The judge said the sentencing guidelines were reasonable for someone who has taken part in two serious offenses - corruption and tax evasion.

He said Maurio would be sent to the a federal prison with an appropriate medical facility. "You can't whitewash political corruption," Brown said, noting that Maurio gave himself an extra commission from the demolition deal.

"The message has to be sent to people who evade taxes and take part in corruption," Brown said. "It is certainly unfortunate that Mr. Maurio has put his family in this unfortunate situation. It is not the court, not the government who has done this. Mr. Maurio has done this."

Probe Cost County $107,000 For Lawyers (APP)

By NINA RIZZO, FREEHOLD BUREAU

Asbury Park Press, September 20, 2005

Monmouth County Board of Freeholders spent $107,000 for lawyers to represent nine members of the Prosecutor's Office in a federal grand jury investigation that went nowhere, according to the county counsel.

Malcolm V. Carton said Monday that he concluded — after talking to the lawyers who were hired to represent two assistant prosecutors and seven county investigators — that the grand jury probe into whether the prosecutor's office interfered with an FBI bribery sting fizzled out in June.

"It went no place," Carton said. "There was no indictment, just a lot of threats."

The Prosecutor's Office on Feb. 28 was first served with subpoenas seeking to interview five county investigators and examine documents relating to a federal corruption probe that netted 11 local officials on Feb. 22. The subpoenas were delivered a week after sources said the office "blew" the yearlong undercover sting operation into government corruption in several Monmouth County towns.

The sting, dubbed Operation Bid Rig, also brought bribery charges down on the late Freeholder Director Harry Larrison Jr. and a local developer who allegedly paid the county's longtime Republican Party boss at least $8,500 in bribes. Two local businessmen with lucrative county contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

New Mexico Treasurer Pleads Not Guilty (AP)

By Felicia Fonseca

AP, September 20, 2005

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. - The New Mexico state treasurer and his predecessor pleaded not guilty Monday to federal racketeering charges involving kickbacks of cash, cars and expensive tickets to political fundraisers.

Robert Vigil and former Treasurer Michael Montoya, both Democrats, are accused of steering state business to an investment adviser in exchange for nearly $700,000.

If convicted, each faces a maximum sentence of 20 years on each of two counts.

"Mr. Vigil, from day one, has attempted to clean up this office, and that's what he has done," said Vigil's attorney, Sam Bregman, who blamed the allegations on disgruntled former employees.

Vigil, flanked by more than a dozen family members and other supporters, asked the public to be patient as the case proceeds. Montoya left the brief hearing without speaking to reporters.

Prosecutors say Montoya was paid about $632,000 while Vigil received about $54,000 from a financial adviser hired to help invest state funds.

But an FBI affidavit describes a wider scheme and says Vigil accepted an envelope stuffed with cash as recently as last month.

Kickbacks to Vigil allegedly included expensive tickets to political fund-raisers, wood and supplies and donations to charities in which Vigil's wife participates.

A witness said he bought Montoya sports memorabilia, cars and other items using proceeds from the kickbacks, the affidavit said.

Both Vigil and Montoya were arrested Friday at their homes after a two-year FBI investigation.

Vigil, elected to a four-year term in 2002, was asked to step aside Sunday by Gov. Bill Richardson.

On Monday, Lt. Gov. Diane Denish urged Vigil to immediately take administrative leave while the case is pending.

"Mr. Vigil has the right to due process, but the pending charges make it impossible for him to conduct the business of the state with full public confidence," she said.

Vigil has not made a decision on whether to step down, but Bregman said his client will consider all options. Last week, Vigil said he plans to continue to serve as state treasurer. He was not at work Monday.

Vigil served as deputy treasurer under Montoya, who was treasurer from 1995 to 2002. When Vigil was auditor, he hired Montoya in 1992 as head of the agency's Medicaid fraud unit.

Abu Ghraib Guard To Fight Abuse Charges (WP)

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006542

SAN ANTONIO -- Army Pfc. Lynndie England will abandon her earlier courtroom strategy and will fight charges that she was a key participant in detainee abuse by guards at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, her lawyer said.

England, 22, a reservist, appears in photos taken inside Abu Ghraib. She was to go on trial Tuesday at Fort Hood, Tex., on seven counts of mistreating prisoners.

* * *

· MONTGOMERY, Ala. -- Waste Management canceled plans to develop a landfill along a historic trail that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery Voting Rights March. Civil rights activists and neighbors had sued to block the landfill near where civil rights worker Viola Liuzzo was gunned down after the march.

· INEZ, Ky. -- People who live in a community deluged with more than 300 million gallons of gooey black coal sludge five years ago reached an out-of-court settlement for an undisclosed sum with Martin County Coal. Ned Pillersdorf, a Prestonsburg, Ky., attorney representing 12 of the people who lived in the sludged area, criticized the U.S. Mine Safety and Health Administration. He said federal inspectors should have known the impoundment was unsafe and should have forced the company to stop using it.

· NEW YORK -- The threat of a Democratic mayoral runoff evaporated when city election officials announced that Fernando Ferrer had captured 727 more votes than the 40 percent he needed in last week's primary to become the nominee challenging Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

· ALBUQUERQUE -- New Mexico Treasurer Robert Vigil and former treasurer Michael Montoya pleaded not guilty to federal racketeering charges. They are accused of receiving kickbacks of cash, cars and expensive tickets to political fundraisers in exchange for allegedly steering state business to an investment adviser.

· DECATUR, Ga. -- Colvin "Butch" Hinton, 44, was convicted of murdering Shannon Melendi, 19, 11 years ago. Her body was never found.

· REMINGTON, Ind. -- A man shot and killed two women working at a convenience store, and police were seeking a man who also was suspected of killing a teenage girl in Ohio. Melvin M. Keeling, 43, of Deerfield Township, Ohio, was identified from images captured by a camera in the store where Liza Kendall, 29, and Kendora Furr, 38, were killed. Keeling was wanted for questioning in the shooting death of Katelind Caudill, 13, near Cincinnati earlier Monday, police said.

Oswego Mayor Allowed To Go Home, To Work While Sex Case Pending (AP)

By WILLIAM KATES, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2005

SYRACUSE, N.Y. (AP) Although a judge accused him of having ``deviant sexual urges," Oswego Mayor John Gosek was released Monday with a set of conditions that include electronic monitoring, a curfew and other restrictions.

Gosek, 58, was arrested Friday at a Syracuse hotel on a charge that he used a cell phone to solicit sex from a minor.

U.S. Magistrate George Lowe said while he was concerned Gosek was ``unable to control his deviant sexual urges, he is not irrational," and rejected a request by prosecutors to keep Gosek in jail as a threat to the community and a flight danger.

Lowe ordered Gosek to post $10,000 bond. The judge also prohibited Gosek from using cell phones and ordered him not to have contact with any minors. Gosek also must undergo counseling a condition Gosek requested, said his attorney James Eby.

Gosek appeared at Monday's hour-long hearing with his wife and two adult sons, who sat in the front row consoling each other. They left the courthouse without comment.

Eby said the mayor adamantly denies have sexual relations with a minor.

``He's somewhat in a state of shock. It's just starting to sink in now," Eby said. ``He feels he's done a good job as mayor. Obviously, he's sad that this day is here."

Gosek was ``actively reviewing" his political future and would likely make a decision within days, Eby said.

Oswego City Council President William Dunsmoor said ``it would be the right choice" for Gosek to resign after his arrest.

``I've spoken with the majority of the other councilors ... and they agree it would be in the best interests of the city," said Dunsmoor, who is serving as acting mayor.

The council scheduled an emergency meeting Monday night to discuss the scandal, Dunsmoor said.

The conditions set by Lowe allow Gosek to leave his house between 7 a.m. and 9 p.m., which would allow the mayor to continue his duties.

According to court papers, Gosek was arrested after paying a confidential informant $250 to introduce him to two 15-year-old girls at a Syracuse hotel. The federal charge carries a sentence of five to 30 years in prison, said officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office.

State police began an investigation of Gosek in November 2004, recording conversations of Gosek offering money or drugs in exchange for sex, court documents said. The FBI joined the investigation in April and put a wiretap on Gosek's city-owned cell phone.

``It's not just talk on a telephone. There's a pattern of him using the cell phone for illicit sexual activities," said Assistant U.S. Attorney John Katko.

Gosek, a Republican, is in his second term as mayor of Oswego, a city of about 17,900 along Lake Ontario, 34 miles north of Syracuse. In recent months, Gosek's administration has become a magnet for controversy.

In March, a former city employee was caught doing 88 mph on a local highway in a city-owned vehicle assigned to Gosek. The woman told state police she was Gosek's girlfriend. Gosek said she was an acquaintance 19, 2005 I am hereby resigning my office as Senator of the 23rd Senatorial District of the state of Connecticut."

A copy of the letter was to be delivered to Gov. M. Jodi Rell on Monday. Rell has 10 days to file a writ for a special election. Once that writ is filed, the election must be held in 45 days.

Bysiewicz said her office requested that Rell not to pick Nov. 8, the date of this year's municipal elections. According to state law, both elections cannot be held on the same day, she said.

``There will be too much conflict in the polling places," she said.

Officials are also barred from holding a special election on weekends and Nov. 11, which is Veterans Day. That leaves only five possible days: Nov. 4, 7, 9, 10 and 14.

George Comer, the Republican registrar of voters in Bridgeport, said he prefers Nov. 14, but has not yet discussed a date with the Democratic registrar. Comer said the city has 125 machines and will use around 95 or so during the municipal election.

Newton's district includes mostly Bridgeport and a section of Stratford.

Since the voting machines will be unavailable several days before and two weeks after the special election, Bysiewicz said municipalities may have to borrow lever voting machines from towns with May elections, use its backup machines, use paper ballots or rent optical scan machines.

Comer said mechanics are now looking at all of the city's backup machines.

``We'll do everything reasonable to avoid using paper ballots," he said.

Prominent Imam Sentenced To 87 Months (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 2005

Imam Shamsud-din Ali, convicted earlier this year of racketeering charges that were part of a broader City Hall corruption probe, was sentenced today to 87 months in prison.

Ali, 67, showed no reaction as U.S. District Court Judge Bruce W. Kauffman leveled the sentence after a two-hour hearing attended by hundreds of the imam's supporters.

Considered one of the most influential Muslim leaders in the city, Ali declined to make any comment during the hearing or as he emerged from the courthouse later in the day. He will remain free on bail pending an appeal.

Ali was convicted of racketeering, racketeering conspiracy and assorted mail fraud, bank fraud and extortion charges by a federal district court jury in June.

During the eight-week trial, prosecutors alleged the charismatic leader of the Philadelphia Masjid used his mosque, a school he and his wife operated and a business they controlled in a series "money for nothing schemes" that generated tens of thousands of dollars in illegal income.

During the sentencing hearing, Assistant U.S. Attorney Frank Labor, the lead prosecutor in the case, said Ali had "used his standing as a civic leader to profit for himself."

Labor said Ali had shown "disdain for the law" and embodied how a system of corruption based on access and influence worked in City Hall.

Ali's lawyer, James Binns, declined to comment about specifics of the case, but reiterated earlier arguments that the jury had been prejudicially tainted by improper references to Ali's alleged ties to drug dealers.

In all, Ali was convicted of 22 of the 34 counts he faced in a racketeering indictment that grew out of a broader political corruption probe of City Hall.

Philly Cleric Sentenced For Corruption (AP)

By Joann Loviglio

AP, September 20, 2005

PHILADELPHIA - A prominent Muslim cleric on Monday was sentenced to more than seven years in prison on racketeering and other charges, the latest in a string of convictions stemming from the FBI's sweeping probe of municipal corruption.

Prosecutors said that Shamsud-din Ali, 67, used his political connections to obtain dubious loans, donations and city contracts. In addition to his 87-month sentence, Ali was ordered to pay restitution. He was released pending an appeal.

The investigation of the so-called "pay to play" culture in Philadelphia's city government has led to the convictions and guilty pleas for more than a dozen people, including a former city treasurer, two bank executives and several business owners seeking city contracts.

The probe became public when police discovered an FBI bug in Mayor John F. Street's office. The mayor has denied any wrongdoing and has not been charged.

Ali, the leader of a west Philadelphia mosque, was charged with 34 counts. After six days of deliberations, jurors convicted him in June of 22 counts, including racketeering.

According to prosecutors, he and his wife, Faridah, used the Muslim school they ran as a private piggy bank, soliciting donations and public education funds for adult education classes that were never held. The Alis had at least five family members on the payroll, including two adult children who lived out of state.

Faridah Ali was convicted and sentenced to a year of house arrest on related charges.

ALI RECEIVES 7-YEAR JAIL SENTENCE (PHI)

By Kitty Caparella

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 2005

MUSLIM CLERIC Shamsud-din Ali "has one more year to con people out here," said a disgusted Muslim, upset that Ali is out on bail.

"It's a travesty. If there's any fairness, he will win on appeal," said Ali loyalist, Asim Abdul Rashid, head of the Majlis Ash'Shura, a regional body of imams.

That was the diverse reaction in the Muslim community and elsewhere to the once prestigious imam's sentencing by U.S. District Judge Bruce Kauffman yesterday.

The judge allowed about 100 of Ali's supporters to cram into the tense courtroom. They sat on the floor and stood in the aisles.

Calling the offenses "serious," Kauffman sentenced Ali, a friend of the mayor, the governor and other pols, to an 87-month prison term on racketeering and related charges, and a 60-month concurrent term on multiple frauds and interstate travel in the aid of racketeering.

Mayor Street declined to comment.

Kauffman ordered Ali, 67, of Melrose Park, to pay restitution of $365,000 to four victims of fraud and extortion, and to forfeit $286,646, a total of more than $650,000.

He also must pay $2,600 in court costs.

The sentence was based on seven illegal moneymaking schemes, involving schools, a bank, and private companies.

On June 14, Ali was found guilty of 22 counts of racketeering, racketeering conspiracy, multiple frauds, extortion and interstate travel in the aid of racketeering. He admitted to four counts of tax evasion.

The judge, however, suspended the stiff jail term while Ali's lawyer, James Binns, appeals the use of drug dealers' testimony and their wiretapped conversations in the nearly six-week racketeering trial.

The appeal, to be filed within 10 days, could take up to a year.

Binns has passionately argued about the drug issue before, during and after the trial, even though Kauffman didn't think Binns had a prayer of a chance on appeal, and said as much yesterday and in a 14-page opinion last month.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Frank Labor has argued the drug evidence supported the racketeering count and was one of the uncharged moneymaking schemes.

The usually talkative Ali appeared stoic throughout the two-hour sentencing and did not speak.

For months, Ali predicted that he wouldn't go to jail. And yesterday, many Muslim believers said they figured "he'd walk."

"I'm relieved," said Binns later.

"Mr. Ali will remain free for the resolution of the appeal.

"The government is pleased with the sentence," said Labor, who prosecuted the federal case with Anthony Wzoreck and Zane D. Memeger, of the U.S. Organized Crime Strike Force.

"It sends a clear message that law enforcement can and will protect the citizens of Philadelphia from criminals like Shamsud-din Ali," said Labor.

"While he was posing as an upstanding member of the community, he was out in the real world making himself rich with a life of crime... defrauding public institutions, private banks and cheating on his taxes," he added.

At the same time, he added, the children at Sister Clara Muhammad School were "wearing overcoats because he hadn't paid the bills, or fixed the heat and water."

The judge ordered Ali to relinguish his position as director of the school, which the jury found he used to run his "criminal enterprise" to rip off his victims.

Labor could not persuade the judge to order an electronic monitoring device for Ali, just as his wife, Faridah, wears on her ankle during her 12-month sentence of house arrest, appealed by the government.

Last October, she was convicted of defrauding Community College of Philadelphia in an adult basic education program.

The CCP scheme was also part of her husband's trial; she faces the same federal charges, as her husband, at a Nov. 14 trial.

The four-year case was investigated by the FBI, Internal Revenue Service, and the U.S. Department of Education's inspector general's office.

Kauffman ordered the couple to repay the college $170,000.

Ali and co-defendants, who were involved in other fraud and extortion schemes, must also repay the City of Philadelphia $60,595, the amount Ali's firm, Keystone and Information Service, received for a bogus real estate tax collection scheme; a $100,000 line of credit to Commerce Bank; and $25,000 that Ali and a co-defendant extorted from Waste Management and Processors, Inc., of Pottsville.

Because Ali is out on appeal, said Labor, the government can begin collecting its $650,000 in restitution and forfeiture costs.

The judge had given Ali a $1,000-a-month payment schedule after completing his prison term.

Ali also faces five years of supervised release.

Ali remains resident imam at the Philadelphia masjid, his only source of income since AT T Communications, Inc. stopped paying the minority businessman almost $2,000 a month in August for helping to arrange for cellphone towers at the Philadelphia International airport.

"It's a disgrace that the judge left him loose like that," said a Muslim member of Ali's mosque, which is the same building as the school, at 47th Street and Wyalusing Avenue.

"He cheated the school. That money given to the school was supposed to give community people an education," he added.

"What kind of leader do you call that?"

Task Force Takes War On Gangs To County (TAMPTRIB)

By KEITH MORELLI

Tampa Tribune, September 20, 2005

TOWN - 'N COUNTRY A sustained assault on street gangs in northwest Hillsborough County by a task force made up of federal agents and county deputies resulted in the arrest of more than 100 suspected gang members and the seizure of nearly $1 million in property.

They didn't get everyone, though.

As Sheriff David Gee announced the results of the sweeping six-month investigation Monday afternoon, workers at Morgan Woods Elementary School scrubbed bright orange gang graffiti off the walls and sidewalks.

Undaunted by the graffiti -- which may have been an attempt to recruit young members or the marking of turf -- Gee said the sweep was a big blow to the street gangs in northwest Hillsborough because many of those arrested were leaders.

"This will put a significant dent in gang activities," he said during a news conference at Jackson Springs Park.

The gang task force included Hillsborough sheriff's deputies, FBI agents and U.S. attorney's office investigators, as well as an undercover Pasco County sheriff's detective who infiltrated one gang.

Information from some sources was so reliable, in one instance a planned home invasion was thwarted and waiting deputies arrested the would-be assailants as they pulled up to the home.

In all, 105 suspected gang members were arrested, 52 of whom had confirmed gang affiliations. They faced a total of 325 criminal charges, some of which are federal. Deputies seized about $700,000 in illegal drugs, $36,600 in stolen property, $85,000 in vehicles and $9,500 in firearms.

Charges included attempted murder, robbery, theft, home invasion, drug possession and trafficking, assault and battery. Some were juveniles, but most were in their mid- to late teens and 20s.

Most of those named on warrants have been arrested, the sheriff said. Some were illegal immigrants and may be deported, he added.

Gee said some larger communities across the nation have let the gang problem get out of hand and it has overtaken them.

The number of members fluctuates because of the turnover, he said. Recruitment remains a concern, he said, with gangs appealing to disaffected youths, offering them acceptance and companionship.

"We're seeing some as young as 13 years old," Gee said. "When you're seeing members this young, it's a serious problem for our country."

Gang membership is up across the country, he said.

"We've gone after it here," he said. "We're trying to get in front of the issue before it gets any worse ... before it becomes unmanageable."

Mostly, local gangs deal in illegal drugs or robbery, and many of the assaults are on members of opposing gangs, such as an incident this month when four members of the Norte 14 gang attacked a rival gang's house, abducted a pregnant woman and raped her.

That attack was motivated by revenge, Gee said.

In all, deputies suspect about 500 members of more than 35 recognized gangs are in Hillsborough County, ranging from the ultraviolent MS 13 to the Dover Locos to Norte 14.

The inclusion of the federal authorities is a welcome ally in the gang battle, Gee said, and may prove to be a deterrent for would-be gang members.

"We're seeing some as young as 13 years old.

When you're seeing members this young, it's a serious problem for our country."

European Art Thieves Busted With FBI's Help (PHI)

By Ramona Smith

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 2005

It was a helluva heist - and a helluva sting that recovered a stolen Rembrandt painting worth $36 million.

But the FBI says we'll have to wait a couple weeks to learn exactly what role one of its Philadelphia-based agents may have played in the end to one of history's most sensational art thefts.

The heist happened in Stockholm, in 2000, when three men brandishing machine guns toted off three art works, including the Rembrandt, from Sweden's National Museum. They escaped by boat while two cars exploded as a diversion nearby.

The party ended Thursday in Denmark, after an undercover agent - possibly from the Philly FBI - posed as a wannabe buyer and tricked four members of an alleged stolen art ring into a sale at a Copenhagen hotel. The suspects showed up with the Dutch master Rembrandt van Rijn's "Self Portrait," painted about 1630, and were arrested.

"The Philly connection has to do with the sting," local FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said yesterday, teasing an Oct. 4 press session when reporters will be able to get the whole story. "Let's just say maybe somebody here was involved in it, and they can talk about it."

The FBI in Los Angeles - where an organized crime task force this year recovered an Auguste Renoir painting taken from the Swedish museum at the same time - said the suspects had tried to peddle the stolen Rembrandt in both Sweden and L.A.

"The task force was able to introduce an FBI undercover agent with substantial knowledge of art to pose as the buyer/broker for the stolen Rembrandt," the FBI's Los Angeles field office said.

Federal investigators at Philly are known for expertise in stolen art and cultural artifacts. They hosted a new national FBI task force on stolen art this year.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Bob Goldman, one of two federal prosecutors in that FBI group, declined to comment yesterday on the sting in Copenhagen.

The sting ended with four men - a 29-year-old Swede, two Iraqi brothers aged 24 and 29, and a 24-year-old Gambian - in jail in Denmark and awaiting extradition to Sweden. All four denied handling stolen goods.

Danish police said the suspects agreed to accept only $100,000 for a hot painting worth $36 million. The Rembrandt, which was not harmed, will be returned to the museum.

In all, thieves got away with three paintings worth $45 million when they blew up parked cars, threw spikes on the road to deter police and escaped from the museum in December 2000.

Los Angeles investigators recovered the Renoir, titled "Young Parisian" earlier this year, but the FBI kept the recovery secret until Friday to aid the recovery of the Rembrandt. Police in Stockholm recovered Renoir's "Conversation" in 2001.

Four Face Extradition In Rembrandt Case (WP)

By JAN M. OLSEN, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

COPENHAGEN, Denmark -- Four suspects arrested in connection with the recovery of a stolen painting by Dutch master Rembrandt van Rijn will soon be extradited to Sweden where they will be prosecuted, officials said Monday.

Two Iraqis, a Swede and a Gambian were arrested Thursday in a downtown Copenhagen hotel when trying to sell the painting that was stolen from Sweden's National Museum nearly five years ago, police said.

"We are working on getting them extradited to Sweden as soon as possible," Copenhagen police Chief Superintendent Per Larsen said.

The Rembrandt, a self-portrait from 1630, is estimated to be worth 250 million Danish kroner (euro34 million; US$42 million). It was stolen from the museum in Stockholm by three armed robbers in December 2000, together with two other paintings by French painter Auguste Renoir.

The painting, which Larsen said was unharmed, is expected to be returned to the National Museum.

The arrests last week were the result of a multinational operation that included several U.S. law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Posing as an art buyer, an unnamed FBI agent met the suspects in a downtown Copenhagen hotel. They offered to sell him the stolen Rembrandt for only US$100,000 (euro82,000), police said.

DOJ_NMG_0006548

The 24-year-old Gambian, a 29-year-old Swede and two Iraqi brothers aged 24 and 29 have all pleaded innocent to preliminary charges of handling stolen goods.

In Sweden, Prosecutor Ronnie Jacobsson said he hoped the men would be handed over this week.

"All four agree to be handed over to Sweden and be prosecuted here," Jacobsson told Swedish news agency TT.

Larsen said the Copenhagen operation was linked to a probe that led to the recovery of Renoir's "Young Parisian" about six months ago in an undisclosed location in Los Angeles.

The FBI kept the recovery of that painting secret until Friday to aid the recovery of the Rembrandt.

The other Renoir was recovered in 2001.

Pair Pleads Guilty In Scams (KNOXNS)

By JAMIE SATTERFIELD

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), September 20, 2005

GREENEVILLE - A Morristown couple pleaded guilty Monday to bilking dozens of people, many of them elderly, in a multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme.

Gary Lee Von Oesen, 61, and girlfriend Geneva Retha Houston, 59, admitted their respective roles in a host of financial crimes spanning 1996 to 2003 at a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greeneville before federal Judge J. Ronnie Greer.

Advertisement

Von Oesen, the mastermind behind the Ponzi scheme dubbed World Money Club, struck a deal with federal prosecutors in which he confessed to two of the 97 crimes of which he was accused.

Houston, who served as the bookkeeper for Von Oesen's investment schemes and profited from them, pleaded guilty to a single charge.

As part of the deal, the couple has agreed to pay back "all victims" cited in the indictment lodged against the pair. That indictment numbered victims at more than 35.

The couple also admitted in the deal with Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil Smith that their financial crimes cost their victims "more than $2.5 million but not more than $7 million."

The actual amount of loss to investors, many of whom Smith has termed "vulnerable" because of their age, has been estimated to be as high as $12 million.

Smith wrote that the deal was struck, in part, to allow "the numerous victims, several of whom are now elderly and/or in poor health, to avoid being required to appear and testify."

Von Oesen and Houston were nabbed last year after a probe led by FBI Agent Lane P. Rushing into allegations including mail fraud, securities fraud and money laundering.

The biggest scam alleged in indictments involved a Ponzi scheme, which is an investment swindle in which early investors are paid off with money put up by later ones to encourage others to join in.

Von Oesen set up a limited partnership he called World Money Club and billed it as a firm engaging in commodity futures. He recruited some investors through First Fitness, a "multilevel marketing program for the sale of fitness products in which Houston was a dealer and participant," Smith wrote.

The scheme promised investors a payoff as large as 25 percent, but the real monetary prize went to Von Oesen and Houston, who used investors' money to line their own pockets, pay their mortgage and buy timeshare units in Florida.

Greer set a Jan. 9 sentencing date for the pair.

On that day, Houston will also be sentenced for her December conviction for lying to federal Magistrate Judge Dennis Inman when he quizzed her about her ability to hire an attorney in the fraud case.

She claimed she had no disposable cash, but the $15,000 ring she wore to her August arraignment made the judge suspicious. An investigation later showed she had more than $5,700 stashed in a bank account at the time.

Houston faces a maximum five-year prison term, but her sentence likely will be far less, court records show. Although Von Oesen faces a 10-year maximum prison term, prosecutors have agreed to a penalty range of 41 to 51 months.

MAN PLEADS GUILTY TO EXTORTION CHARGES (TMT)

By CASEY KNAUPP, Staff Writer

Tyler Morning Telegraph, September 20, 2005

A 34-year-old Tyler man pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to attempting to extort $120,000 from a local woman.

Kirkpatrick Lenord Moore admitted to receiving proceeds of extortion on Dec. 29 after he had left several threatening notes and phone calls to the woman.

Moore faces up to three years in prison and will probably be placed in the sentencing guideline range of 15 to 18 months, considering his criminal history and acceptance of responsibility, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Middleton told U.S. District Judge William Steger.

Moore is currently on parole for an aggravated robbery conviction in Sulphur Springs and faces additional prison time.

Defense attorney Clifton Roberson said Moore has been jailed for the federal charge since December and could be released soon after his sentencing hearing, depending on what punishment Steger assesses.

Moore admitted in court Monday that on Dec. 10, he left a note at the woman's apartment, threatening to turn information he had about her to authorities if she did not pay him $120,000. The threats, which began once Moore found out she had funds in a retirement account, continued for weeks.

FBI officials said they believe the woman had information regarding a felony suspect wanted in Smith County. Moore threatened to inform the FBI of the woman's knowledge and to accuse her of committing an offense regarding the information, according to a FBI affidavit.

After the FBI had gotten involved in the extortion case, Moore told the victim to drop off a bag of money in a trash can at a car wash on Shiloh Road. After he retrieved the cash and a short chase, authorities caught him.

In his pickup, authorities found the victim's phone number, a semi-automatic handgun and a device used to modify his voice when he called the victim. They found the paper bag containing $200 and his cell phone, which he dropped as he ran from authorities.

Casey Knaupp covers county, state and federal courts. She can be reached at 903.596.6289. e-mail: news@tylerpaper.com

Lil' Kim Reports To Detention Center In Philadelphia (AP)

By KATHY MATHESON, The Associated Press

AP, September 19, 2005

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Rapper Lil' Kim began serving a 366-day prison sentence at a federal detention center Monday for perjury and conspiracy stemming from a 2001 shootout outside a Manhattan radio station.

The 30-year-old entertainer, whose real name is Kimberly Jones, was whisked into the center past a throng of media, fans and passers-by at about 4:45 p.m.

Earlier, she had issued a statement saying she had "unfortunately" been assigned to the concrete, high-rise Philadelphia facility instead of to a prison camp "as discussed," and added, "I am not certain that this constitutes fair and equal treatment."

Her lawyer, L. Londell McMillan, said a celebrity of his client's magnitude could be in danger in such a detention center, which he said was mainly designed as a temporary holding facility for inmates awaiting permanent assignment to a prison.

"Why should a female hip-hop artist have to spend time in an urban concrete jungle while other female prisoners are assigned to rural, suburban-type prison camps?" said McMillan, adding that he would seek to have his client reassigned.

Calls to the federal Bureau of Prisons and the U.S. Marshals Service were not returned Monday.

The 4-foot-11 rapper, who was convicted of lying about the gun battle to a federal grand jury and in the subsequent trial, brought about 20 to 25 people down to Philadelphia with her in a caravan of two RVs. Her mother, brother and lawyer were allowed to accompany her briefly into the detention center to say goodbye, McMillan said.

"She was upbeat, smiling," he said. "She told her mom not to cry and to stay strong."

Lil' Kim will be assigned to a female work cadre at the coed prison, McMillan said, noting that she could be out in nine months with good behavior.

"Today begins a new saga in my life which I expect to strengthen me and allow me time for reflection," Lil' Kim said in her statement. "I plan to write music while in prison, read and pray regularly and will come out a stronger, more confident woman."

The case stemmed from a gun battle that erupted outside WQHT-FM, known as Hot 97, when Lil' Kim's entourage crossed paths with a rival rap group, Capone-N-Noreaga.

Lil' Kim's group confronted the others about the Capone-N-Noreaga song "Bang, Bang," which contained an insult to Lil' Kim from rival Foxy Brown. One man was hurt in the shootout that followed.

Before the grand jury and at the trial, the rapper maintained that she had not noticed two of her close friends at the scene of the shootout — her manager, Daemon Butler, and Sufi Jackson. Both have pleaded guilty to gun charges.

Jurors at Lil' Kim's trial saw radio station security photos that depicted Butler opening a door for the rap star, and two witnesses who once made records with Lil' Kim said they saw her at the station with Butler and Jackson.

Though several high-profile rappers — including Beanie Siege and Tupac Shaker — have done time in jail, Lil' Kim is the first prominent female artist to serve a prison sentence.

Lil' Kim's fourth album, "The Naked Truth," is due out next week. She won a Grammy in 2001 for her part in the hit remake of "Lady Marmalade."

At last month's MTV Video Music Awards, MTV personality Sway delicately asked if she had anything to say to fans who "might not see you for a while."

"You can write me letters," Lil' Kim said.

Psychologist Endorses Overnights Visits For Hinckley (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

A psychologist yesterday testified that John W. Hinckley Jr.'s mental state has improved since he shot President Reagan and that the would-be assassin should be allowed to visit his parents and stay overnight with them in their home in Williamsburg.

"I believe with a reasonable degree of psychiatric certainty ... that Mr. Hinckley poses a low risk," Paul Montalbano said during daylong testimony in federal court.

Hinckley, 50, has been confined at St. Elizabeths Hospital since he was acquitted in 1982 of wounding Mr. Reagan and four others. He showed no emotion yesterday as his attorneys sought permission for him to progressively spend up to eight days and seven nights at his parents' home and sometimes with his brother, sister and in-laws.

Hearing on whether Hinckley should be allowed to visit his parents overnight will continue today in U.S. District Court.

Hinckley's parents have visited the District several times in the past year to accompany their son on unsupervised trips to parks, museums, shopping centers and restaurants. Routinely, he is allowed to wander about the 2,900-acre grounds of the mental hospital unsupervised.

Mr. Montalbano said Hinckley abides by rules and regulations. His rehabilitation would be increased if he were allowed to walk through the vast community around his parents' home, which includes six golf courses, shopping centers, a school and historical sites, the hospital psychologist testified.

"Isolation is not a good thing," Mr. Montalbano said. "In his case, it is a potential problem. He is intensely self-absorbed."

Hinckley shot Mr. Reagan in 1981, saying he was trying to impress actress Jodie Foster.

Since entering St. Elizabeths, he has shown interest in a female chaplain, a psychiatric intern and former patient Leslie deVeau, Mr. Montalbano said. It was a good sign when Hinckley ended his relationship with Miss deVeau in January because she would not discuss their relationship with his treatment team, he said.

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman asked about the effect of reintegrating Hinckley into society where he would have contact with women.

Mr. Montalbano said it has been many years since Hinckley has suffered from the symptoms that led him to four suicide attempts and the shooting of the president.

The Secret Service has Hinckley under surveillance during his trips.

Hinckley Wants Girlfriend, Psychologist Says In Court (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0006551

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Presidential assailant John W. Hinckley Jr., who is petitioning the court for more freedom, is lonely and longing for a close relationship like the one he had for many years with a former psychiatric patient, a psychologist testified yesterday.

"He wants to have a girlfriend. He wants intimate contact with a female," Paul Montalbano, chief of pretrial services at St. Elizabeths, the Southeast Washington mental hospital, testified yesterday.

The psychologist said such a desire is natural for a man who has ended a long relationship, as Hinckley did this year. Hinckley, 50, cut his ties to Leslie deVeau after the relationship came under scrutiny during hearings to decide whether he was ready for expanded freedoms.

For a time, Hinckley was escorting a young hospital intern to her car and offering to sing to her. But after his doctors became aware of his special interest in the woman, Hinckley was told that he was crossing a line between staff and patient and had to stop, which he did, Montalbano said.

The underlying question at a hearing yesterday appeared to be how Hinckley would handle courtship and respond to rejection out in the world, away from the structure and support of a hospital.

Hinckley would like to eventually be released from St. Elizabeths, where the staff has found his depression and psychotic disorder to be in remission. He has been confined to the hospital in Southeast Washington since 1982, when a federal jury found him not guilty by reason of insanity in the shootings of President Ronald Reagan and three others.

In the meantime, he wants the court's permission to make a series of overnight visits to his parents' residence in Williamsburg, and this week a federal judge is hearing his petition and the government's opposition to it.

Hinckley's interest in women, viewed as natural by the psychologist, is disconcerting to the Justice Department's attorneys, who oppose any expansion of Hinckley's freedoms and who note that it was Hinckley's obsession with actress Jodie Foster that spurred him to open fire on Reagan in 1981.

On the hearing's first day, the questions and answers centered on how Hinckley handled his breakup with deVeau and how he has acted toward women since then. Hinckley met deVeau when both were confined at St. Elizabeths. She was found not guilty by reason of insanity in the 1982 shooting death of her 10-year-old daughter and was released from the hospital eight years later.

Saddened by the breakup, Hinckley did not spiral into depression, Montalbano testified. His longing for a new female companion has been obvious to those who treat him, the psychologist said.

The intern was apparently not his only romantic interest. Smitten with a hospital chaplain, he scheduled an appointment with her. But when asked about it by his doctors, Hinckley admitted that the appointment was mostly a chance to see a "pretty lady" and agreed to cancel it, Montalbano said.

Over the past two years, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman has allowed Hinckley to leave St. Elizabeths for excursions in the Washington area, including some with his parents. Initially the family was accompanied by hospital chaperons. But more recently, Friedman has permitted the family to go without such supervision and has allowed overnight visits in the area.

Even as the hospital supervisions have fallen away, the Secret Service has continued to track Hinckley.

During yesterday's hearing, Hinckley's parents sat in the first row of the gallery on the same side of the courtroom as their son, who was wearing a blue jacket, white shirt and red tie.

Seated at a table with his attorneys, Hinckley seemed to follow the testimony intently, rarely focusing his gaze anywhere but the witness stand as Montalbano answered questions from Hinckley attorney Barry Wm. Levine; the government's lawyer, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas E. Zeno; and Friedman.

Hinckley's parents live in a 2,900-acre gated community in Williamsburg that has golf courses, a pool, a clubhouse and a shopping center, and that is where he would stay during the proposed series of six visits -- the longest of which would last just over a week.

Montalbano said that the process needs to be gradual and must be monitored but that visits with his family have been an important part of his treatment and should continue to be.

He said that, just as many people rely on their partners for support, Hinckley could be well served by the sort of relationship he craves. But Montalbano also said that given the scrutiny such a partner would endure, Hinckley may face a hard road to romance: "Mr. Hinckley remains optimistic, but perhaps naively optimistic."

Jury Selection Begins In Ex-Illinois Gov's Trial (REU-Y2)

By Andrew Stern

Reuters, September 20, 2005

Jury selection began on Monday in the public corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, a Republican known for commuting the sentences of the state's death row inmates who now may have to save himself.

Ryan, 71, is charged with steering state contracts to friends in exchange for free gifts, vacations, cash and loans to himself and his family while governor and, before that, during eight years as Illinois' secretary of state.

He is accused of racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud, tax fraud and lying to investigators.

Ryan's friend, lobbyist Larry Warner, is also a defendant in what is likely to be a four-month trial, participants said.

After a 40-year career in Illinois politics, Ryan retired after a single term as governor in 2003 with a $191,300 yearly pension, with many Republicans blaming him for leaving the state party in shambles.

In recent interviews he has denied any wrong-doing.

"I feel, without question, that I'm going to be exonerated," he said on Chicagoland's Television.

Ryan, who is expected to testify, is perhaps best-known for adopting a strong stance against the death penalty, a move some critics say was a cynical attempt to distract from the gathering clouds of scandal.

Ryan speaks frequently to audiences about what brought him to declare a moratorium on executions in 2001 and to one of his final acts in office: commuting the sentences of all 167 Illinois death row inmates. He said the death penalty system was "broken," citing numerous exonerations of condemned inmates.

But Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer has ruled Ryan's actions on behalf of the condemned will not be allowed in trial. Still in question is whether the judge will allow evidence about a horrific 1994 highway crash that killed six children -- blamed on a truck driver who bought his license with a bribe -- which launched the Operation Safe Road investigation.

The decade-old probe that grew out of the licenses-for-bribes scandal cast a wider net over public corruption and has resulted in 73 convictions. Among them is Ryan's former chief of staff, Scott Fawell, who is serving a 6-1/2-year sentence and will testify for the prosecution.

"The defense is going to turn on Ryan's image as a big-picture manager who was not involved in day-to-day operations," said University of Chicago law professor Bernard Harcourt.

"It's going to turn on whether he takes the stand and how he does on direct and cross-examination," Harcourt said. "It's going to be up to him."

Racketeering And Fraud Trial Begins For Illinois Ex-Governor (NYT)

By Jodi Wilgoren

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

CHICAGO, Sept. 19 - All the potential jurors recognized the defendant - the white hair, the big glasses, the gruff face. One admired his moratorium on executions in the state. Another expressed disdain for any politician who uses a position for personal gain. A third said he found the defendant "forgetful and unprepared."

"He referred to Dick Butkus as Mike Ditka," the third juror recalled of seeing the defendant botch an award presentation at a football banquet. "The times when he would be on television, whatever I read in the newspapers, it would seem to me he was unprepared."

So went the opening day of jury selection in the criminal corruption trial of George Ryan, the former governor of Illinois who became an international star for his challenge of capital punishment even as scandal eroded his popularity at home to cause him to leave office after a single term.

Mr. Ryan, 71, faces 22 counts of racketeering, mail and tax fraud and lying to federal agents. The charges could add up to 95 years in prison for a man whose legacy as he left office in 2003 was clearing Death Row with a blanket commutation for 160 condemned inmates. Federal prosecutors contend that Mr. Ryan and his relatives received cash, luxury vacations and other gifts worth at least $167,000 in exchange for state contracts and political favors in the dozen years in which he was governor or secretary of state.

Mr. Ryan, a pharmacist from downstate Kankakee who became a deal-making moderate Republican, declined comment on Monday, and his lawyer, Dan K. Webb, said little beyond expressing confidence that his client would be acquitted. Friends of Mr. Ryan, who has spent the past two years on the lecture circuit preaching against the death penalty, say he has been looking forward to his day in court after years of being dogged by accusations and innuendo.

"George truly believes he didn't do anything wrong," said Tony Leone, a friend of 30 years who was a staple of Mr. Ryan's kitchen cabinet and said he spoke to him over the weekend. "He said, 'I want to get it over with.' He says it's time, we need to get this resolved. He's even going to testify; I mean, what does that tell you about a guy?"

The trial caps a seven-year federal investigation that has led to 79 indictments and 73 convictions and is known as Operation Safe Road because of its roots exposing a scheme in which government employees traded commercial driver's licenses for bribes. Mr. Ryan's co-defendant is Lawrence K. Warner, a longtime lobbyist and close confidant.

It comes as a cloud of corruption charges hovers over this city and state, whose political history are rife with similar scandals. Mayor Richard M. Daley of Chicago was questioned last month in a separate federal investigation into political influence on hiring at City Hall, and Gov. Rod R. Blagojevich spent last week fending off speculation that he was the mysterious "Public Official A" accused in a court document of engineering kickbacks involving state pension investments.

"To have a former governor on trial is a big deal even for Illinois," said Kent Redfield, a political scientist at the University of Illinois, noting that another former governor, Otto Kerner Jr., was on the federal bench when he was indicted - and convicted - in the 1970's of accepting bribes. "It just reinforces what is a very cynical attitude among Illinois citizens about politics and politicians. Our expectations and our standards are pretty low. Our politicians try very hard to live up to those low standards."

Perhaps it should not have been a surprise, then, when the third potential juror questioned Monday morning, a woman who works part time at a Jewel supermarket, said she was disgusted when she read about the charges against Mr. Ryan.

"No one should use their position to get favors," she said. "I was just disappointed that if it was happening, it really shouldn't, and why does it keep going on and on?"

The woman was one of 310 potential jurors who filled out 32-page questionnaires last week that asked what radio and television stations they listened to; whether they consider themselves liberal, conservative or "middle-of-the-road"; if they have ever sought the assistance of public officials; and what their impressions or opinions are of Mr. Ryan.

"Do not like him," wrote Juror No. 19, who also expressed strong negative views of politicians generally ("they steal and lie") and lobbyists ("they take money and don't do anything"). Juror No. 18 said he had heard Mr. Ryan's office "was corrupt and he should have done a better job."

Questioned one by one in the courtroom, some for as long as 40 minutes, most of the first dozen potential jurors were more circumspect, saying they had vague recollections of reading something about the case, but would nonetheless approach evidence with open minds. One said he had got his job at the city's 911 dispatch center through political connections; another said he had a vanity license plate, seemingly unaware that such coveted plates are among the items Mr. Ryan's secretary of state's office is said to have traded for political favors.

"Of course you get those feelings," one candidate said when asked whether publicity about corruption cases left him seeing all politicians as crooks. "But none of it would keep me from judging fairly as a juror."

No jurors were selected Monday, though five were dismissed because of biases revealed in the questionnaires, and four others were excused for hardships they would incur in a trial expected to stretch over four months.

Just picking the panel of 12 jurors and 6 alternates may take three days or more. That is likely to be followed by some three weeks of testimony by the prosecution's star witness, Scott Fawell, a former Ryan chief of staff who is serving a six-and-a-half-year prison sentence himself and agreed to cooperate with the government in exchange for leniency for his fiancée.

"I am hopeful that this sends some serious signals to our politicians throughout the state that business as usual is no defense for corruption," said Cindi Canary, director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform, a corruption watchdog. "It's been a really slow, kind of painful process, starting at the bottom. I think it's important that we see that it has worked its way up to the top, and Ryan is the top. It's as high as it gets here."

DOJ_NMG_0006554

Ryan Trial Off To Slow Start As Potential Jurors Are Grilled About Bias (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, September 20, 2005

CHICAGO - Jury selection for former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering trial got off to a slow start Monday with questions from defense attorneys focusing on possible bias resulting from media coverage of the scandal that has dominated state politics for seven years.

"Because he was governor this is a highly unusual case," Ryan attorney Dan Webb told the court. "We should not end up with a jury that has people on it with biases against George Ryan."

Webb urged federal Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer not to put time limits on the questioning and she said she would wait until noon Tuesday before doing so to see if the pace picks up.

But she said it was necessary to get going.

After one day of jury selection, 14 of some 300 potential jurors had been interviewed and eight were placed in a pool for later consideration. Eleven of the 300 were dismissed for reasons ranging from health problems to job conflicts to blatant bias against the former governor.

Ryan, 71, is charged with racketeering, lying to federal agents and tax fraud.

The 22-count indictment says he gave lobbyist Larry Warner, now his co-defendant, free reign to steer big-money state contracts and leases to clients when Ryan was secretary of state.

He also is accused of doling out favors ranging from state leases to low-digit license plates to his friends while enjoying free vacations in Jamaica and other benefits.

Ryan and Warner insist they have done nothing wrong.

The case is an outgrowth of the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road, which began as an inquiry into bribes paid for drivers licenses and mushroomed into a full-scale investigation of corruption during Ryan's tenure as secretary of state and governor.

Ryan, who declined to comment on the trial, greeted reporters in a hearty voice as he entered the courtroom.

"Good morning, good morning," he said. "You had to get up early this morning - all of you."

He seemed as calm and confident as ever as he chatted with reporters, chortling that he has not visited a favorite Chicago eatery "for a long time, although it looks like I have."

Webb declined to comment when reporters asked him whether an unidentified woman in a striped suit who sat beside the former governor's wife, Lura Lynn Ryan, was a jury consultant.

Such consultants are sometimes used as lawyers decide which potential jurors are most likely to be emotionally sympathetic to the defense and which to the prosecution.

Pallmeyer intends to create a pool of 50 to 60 potential jurors who have survived the first round of selection. Attorneys will whittle that number down by using so-called peremptory challenges, which allow them to dismiss a certain number of jurors without giving a reason.

The defense has 18 peremptory challenges and the prosecution has 10. The panel of 12 jurors and six alternates will be selected from the survivors of that round.

Several jurors acknowledged they had heard about Ryan and corruption in the secretary of state's office. But most of them seemed fairly hazy about the details.

One woman said there were two Ryans involved in scandals. She appeared to have George Ryan mixed up with Jim Ryan, the former Illinois attorney general defeated for governor in 2002.

Jim Ryan was not involved in any scandal. But he did grumble during the campaign that voters were getting him mixed up with George Ryan and that was hurting his chances of getting elected.

DOJ_NMG_0006555

In the final hour of jury selection, Pallmeyer threw out a man who told the court that he took a dim view of sending elderly people to prison. The same man, a university computer supervisor, said he knew that political corruption was commonplace throughout state government.

Webb fought in vain to keep him in the pool, describing him as "the apex of honesty."

Webb succeeded in getting another potential juror bounced who said he was troubled by news he had heard about corruption in the secretary of state's office under Ryan.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Zachary Fardon battled to keep the man in the pool, telling Pallmeyer that "when all is said and done he indicated that he could be fair."

Pallmeyer agreed to wait until later to rule on a prosecution motion to oust a potential juror who said that his mother was an acquaintance of Webb and that he had met Webb himself.

The man testified that his mother had told him that Webb was a highly skilled lawyer.

Prosecutors argued that such a relationship would be unfair, while Webb protested that he barely knew the mother and didn't remember meeting the man.

D.C. Killing Was 'Face-to-Face,' Police Say (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber And Nia-malika Henderson

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

A man who was fatally shot while walking his dog in Northwest Washington was killed in a "face-to-face" encounter with his assailant, police said yesterday.

Investigators said they had no motive or suspect in the slaying of Gregory C. Shipe, 34, a financial analyst for a large public relations firm downtown. He was shot in the face about 10:40 p.m. Saturday in a crime that one top D.C. police official yesterday called "bizarre."

"There was no rhyme or reason for this," said Capt. C.V. Morris, supervisor of the department's violent crimes division. "The motive in this is a mystery. . . . This was a face-to-face confrontation. Of what type? We don't know."

Shipe was walking his dog, Otis, in the 1700 block of Irving Street NW, in the city's Mount Pleasant section, when he was approached by at least one person, police said. He was shot in the face at close range and died at the scene. His dog, a 50-pound mixed-breed, wandered back to Shipe's residence in a nearby apartment complex, where he was discovered by neighbors.

Although none of Shipe's possessions, including his wallet, was missing, investigators speculated that he most likely was the victim of a botched robbery, authorities said. Police and neighbors said several robberies have taken place in the area recently.

Shipe worked as a financial analyst in the Washington office of Ogilvy Public Relations. He started in May on a temporary basis but soon was hired full time, said Robert Mathias, managing director of the 100-employee office.

Mathias said employees were devastated by the death of a charming colleague who quickly solved problems.

"There was always just good cheer about him," Mathias said. "He was just a very positive part of our work culture. . . . Nobody deserves this. But of all the people who don't deserve this, Greg is at the front of that line."

Shipe grew up in Waynesburg, Pa., a small community about 50 miles from Pittsburgh. He graduated from the University of Kentucky with a bachelor's degree in business administration.

From 1998 through 2002, he lived in Washington and worked as an analyst for Lockheed Martin Corp. and as a consultant for Booz Allen Hamilton, according to a résumé supplied by Ogilvy.

He attended Owen Graduate School of Management at Vanderbilt University and graduated with an MBA in finance last year.

Business school classmates said that Shipe was a hard-working student and that he co-chaired the gift committee for his 2004 class. The committee raised $118,000 to help refurbish a classroom, shattering fundraising records for class gifts, said Clint Liebenberg, a friend and the former class president.

DOJ_NMG_0006556

"He was selfless," Liebenberg said. "He worked really tirelessly on his own time to make sure he achieved his own goals. . . . He was just friendly with everybody and had a really positive outlook on life."

Shipe had been living with friends in Columbia Heights until several weeks ago, when he moved into an apartment in the 1600 block of Kenyon Street NW, police and friends said.

A bouquet of red and yellow flowers and two cards were outside Shipe's apartment door yesterday. Vanessa White, a neighbor, gave Shipe the keys to his apartment about three weeks ago and said she had been looking forward to getting to know him better.

"It's tragic. He was such a nice guy," White said. "The fact that you saw someone in the hall one day and then the next day they are murdered a block away, it shakes you up. . . . When we found out, we kept on saying that could have been any of us. We're always out walking around that late or later. This will make all of us be much more cautious about returning to the building after dark."

Keisha Barkley, who lives in the 1700 block of Irving, said she was surprised to hear that someone was killed in her neighborhood.

"There's no drug activity. It's just a pretty quiet, nice residential neighborhood," she said. "There have been a couple of robberies, car break-ins, that's the only thing that happens in this neighborhood."

A candlelight vigil for Shipe is scheduled to begin at 8:45 tonight outside the Mount Pleasant Neighborhood Library at 3160 16th St. NW. Mourners will walk to the 1700 block of Irving Street NW, where Shipe was slain, organizers said.

Police urged anyone with information to call 202-727-9099. They are offering a reward of up to $25,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of a suspect.

Missing Girl's Car Offers Leads (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

Richmond Police investigating the disappearance of a 17-year-old college freshman spent yesterday investigating leads they got from an examination of the girl's car.

Taylor Marie Behl, a freshman at Virginia Commonwealth University, was last seen by her roommate in her dorm room at about 10 p.m. Sept. 5. Taylor is from Vienna, Va.

An off-duty police officer found Taylor's 1997 Ford Escort on Saturday in Richmond, about a mile and a half from her dorm.

Police said that there were Ohio license plates on the car and that the original Virginia tags were missing. The missing tags were Virginia JPC2848.

The car was turned over to the FBI for forensics processing.

The Richmond Times-Dispatch reported yesterday that Taylor's scent was one of two that a police dog detected in the car and that the discovery is leading police to think that she might have been abducted.

Police have questioned the girl's family and friends, including a 38-year-old amateur photographer who took pictures of her during a campus visit in April. He posted the pictures on a Web site that displays artwork.

The photographs have been removed since Taylor disappeared.

Police executed search warrants on the home of Taylor's mother in Vienna, Va., and the photographer's home in Richmond.

Taylor was last seen wearing a black hooded sweatshirt and blue jeans. She was thought to be carrying her student identification card, a cell phone and a small amount of cash.

Richmond Police Chief Rodney D. Monroe on Thursday upgraded the case from a missing person to a criminal investigation and convened a task force that includes VCU campus police, Virginia State Police and the FBI.

Richmond police have set up a tip line at 804/514-8477.

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ_NMG_0006557

Office Depot, Feds Settle False Claims Case (FCW)

By Michael Hardy

Federal Computer Week, September 20, 2005

Office Depot has paid a $4.75 million settlement to the United States over allegations that the company sold products to government agencies in violation of the Trade Agreements Act.

The Justice Department, in announcing the settlement today, said Office Depot sold products from China, Taiwan and other countries that do not have reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, in violation of a provision of the company's General Services Administration schedule contract.

"Federal contractors will be held accountable for their billing practices," said Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general at Justice's Civil Division, in a written statement. "This settlement is an example of the department's determination to ensure that federal funds are protected from fraud and abuse."

The case was originally filed in January 2003 under whistleblower provisions of the False Claims Act by a company called Safina Office Products and two of its executives, Edward Wilder and Robert Hsi Chou Lee. The two executives and the company will get a a total of $712,500 of the settlement as their award under the law.

In May 2005, Justice reached a $9.8 million settlement with Office Max for similar allegations.

Office Depot Pays $4.75 Mln To Settle Claims Case (REU)

Reuters, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept 19 (Reuters) - Office Depot Inc. has paid $4.75 million to resolve allegations that it broke the law by selling office supplies from certain countries to the U.S. government, the Justice Department said on Monday.

The company was accused of violating false claims laws by selling the government supplies made in countries that do not have reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, like China and Taiwan, the Justice Department said.

"Federal contractors will be held accountable for their billing practices," Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general for the Department of Justice's Civil Division," said in a statement.

Earlier this year OfficeMax Inc. agreed to pay $9.8 million to settle similar allegations.

Office Depot shares were down 36 cents to $29.36 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

FEC Sues Pro-Republican Political Group (WP/AP)

By Sharon Theimer, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Federal election officials on Monday sued a political group to try to force it to comply with campaign finance limits, the first lawsuit of its kind to arise from controversial big-money fundraising during the 2004 elections.

The Federal Election Commission filed a complaint in U.S. District Court in Washington against the Club for Growth. The pro-Republican group spent at least $21 million in the 2003-04 election cycle.

The FEC contends the Club spent enough in federal races to require it to file with the commission as a political committee and abide by contribution and spending limits. It wants the court to fine the group and to order it to comply with campaign finance rules.

Club for Growth President Pat Toomey called the FEC lawsuit "a bizarre interpretation of the Club's mission, the Constitution, the laws adopted by Congress and their own regulations governing nonprofit organizations."

"The Club's principal purpose is to advocate for and defend pro-growth policies," Toomey said in a written statement. "We have consulted with counsel every step of the way and have followed the law and regulations that govern our work."

FEC Vice Chairman Michael Toner called the case "one of the most important suits the commission has brought in recent years."

"At stake is whether Club for Growth will be able to continue raising and spending millions of dollars in soft money for activities influencing federal elections," said Toner, a Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0006558

The lawsuit is the first to result from several complaints filed against pro-Republican and pro-Democratic "soft money groups," and could serve as a test case to see if the commission can rein in the groups without new congressional legislation or FEC rules.

Campaign finance watchdogs contend the groups spent millions of dollars in corporate, union and unlimited contributions in the 2004 election despite a law banning the use of such money in presidential and congressional races.

The FEC investigated Club for Growth fundraising and spending after the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee complained to the commission about it.

The DSCC complaint stemmed from an ad the Club ran in the 2003-04 election cycle against then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., over his opposition to a tax-cut proposal. Daschle lost to a Republican in last November's election.

President Bush's re-election campaign and the sponsors of the 2002 campaign finance law sued the FEC last year, accusing it of failing to enforce the law and crack down on soft money spending, particularly in the presidential race. Those cases are pending in federal court.

The 2004 election saw the emergence of several partisan groups created by political activists to continue spending five- and even six- and seven-figure contributions after the law imposed tough donation limits on national party committees and congressional and presidential candidates.

Under the law, the national parties and federal candidates can no longer raise corporate and union donations in any amount or unlimited donations from any source. Such money isn't supposed to be used by anyone trying to influence a federal race.

The commission's lawsuit accuses the Club for Growth of failing to comply with federal fundraising and spending rules as far back as 2000.

The complaint says the group told prospective donors their money would be used to help elect or defeat specific candidates, and that it raised more than $4 million last year alone from donors who exceeded the $5,000 federal contribution limit. Of that, roughly $3 million came from just 14 donors.

The group spent more than $1 million in the past three elections on ads targeting specific campaigns, often going so far as urging voters to elect or defeat candidates, and raised more than $9 million during that time that exceeded federal limits, the lawsuit says.

The lawsuit could be the first in a parade of cases brought against soft money groups by the FEC, said Larry Noble, head of the Center for Responsive Politics campaign watchdog group and a former commission general counsel.

"We've all been waiting to see what they do with those complaints, and I think it's positive that they have brought suit," Noble said.

However, the lawsuit seems to focus on spending that urged voters to elect or defeat candidates, Noble said. That leaves open the question of how the FEC will deal with partisan groups that intended to influence federal races but didn't go quite as far as the Club did, he said.

___

On the Net:

FEC: http://www.fec.gov/

F.E.C. Sues Republican Group Over Political Contributions (NYT)

By Glen Justice

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - The Federal Election Commission filed suit Monday against the Club for Growth, a well-funded Republican group, in an effort to force the organization to comply with limits on political contributions.

The suit is the first major enforcement case to involve a "527 committee," the independent political organizations that both Republicans and Democrats used to raise and spend hundreds of millions of dollars in the 2004 races. Commission officials describe it as a test case that could have a major impact on how future elections are financed.

DOJ_NMG_0006559

"This is one of the most important suits the commission has brought in the last decade," said Michael Toner, the commission's Republican vice chairman.

Last year's election was the first conducted under the McCain-Feingold law of 2002, which banned political parties from accepting unlimited contributions known as soft money. However, donors continued to direct six- and seven-figure checks to 527 committees, which argued that they could still legally accept unlimited soft money contributions.

After months of legal wrangling last year, the commission declined to adopt new regulations that would specifically require 527 groups to register with the F.E.C. and submit to contribution limits and other regulations. Donors are allowed to give $5,000 to a political action committee each year.

The commission was left with a list of complaints against specific groups, which are now being investigated. The case against the Club for Growth is the first in line.

The Club for Growth, which has more than 30,000 members, advocates conservative economic policies and for years has backed candidates who share those views.

The group runs a political action committee, which raised roughly $1.9 million and forwarded another $7.5 million directly to candidates last year, all operating within federal contribution limits, said David Keating, the group's executive director.

The club also operates a 527 committee, which raised about $8.5 million, Mr. Keating said. It was this organization that was the subject of the F.E.C. suit, which was filed in United States District Court here.

The suit alleges that the organization failed to properly register with the commission as a political committee, which would subject the group to contribution limits and other regulations, and that it raised millions in excessive contributions in recent years. Officials at the club said they had done nothing improper.

The case stems from a complaint filed against the group by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in connection with a television advertisement broadcast last year. The commission voted to file the suit Monday after talks between the two parties failed to reach an out-of-court agreement, according to the F.E.C.

The commission is seeking an unspecified fine and a court ruling directing the Club for Growth to submit to F.E.C. regulation. If the commission wins, it could have broad implications for other groups that are similarly structured.

Pat Toomey, a former lawmaker and the president of Club for Growth, called the commission's suit a "war on the First Amendment" that will help protect incumbent politicians.

"The F.E.C.'s claims and legal theories are a bizarre interpretation of the club's mission, the Constitution, the laws adopted by Congress and their own regulations," Mr. Toomey said in a statement.

FEC Sues GOP 527 Group For Violating Finance Laws (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

The Federal Election Commission yesterday filed its first court challenge against so-called "527 groups," suing a powerhouse Republican advocacy group for violating campaign-finance laws from 2000 to 2004.

The FEC charges that the Club for Growth raised and spent at least $4 million more than the limit, and so the group should have had to register as a political committee and abide by donation and spending limits. The suit was filed in U.S. District Court in Washington.

"This litigation is an important test case on when 527 groups are required to register with the FEC and follow hard-dollar restrictions in federal law," said Michael E. Toner, the commission's vice chairman.

The 527 groups, named for the part of tax code that governs them, played a major role in the 2004 election, the first under the campaign finance rules that Congress passed in 2002. Those rules were intended to eliminate so-called "soft money," the large donations that political parties and interest groups used to flood the airwaves with issue ads.

Instead, the parties have to rely on limited "hard dollar" contributions.

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and Progress for America from the conservative side and MoveOn.org and the Media Fund from the liberal side led a host of 527s that advertised during the presidential race.

The groups say they are on sound legal footing.

Club for Growth President Patrick J. Toomey said yesterday's suit was part of a "war on the First Amendment."

He said the FEC's suit was the result of a complaint by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee that said the Club for Growth stepped over the line when it targeted Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat.

"The commission allowed it to lie inactive for nearly a year and a half and then resurrected it as a platform to seek to take away our members' rights and exact a huge civil penalty from the club," Mr. Toomey said.

The Club for Growth's stated purpose is to elect pro-economic growth, limited-government conservatives, often by advertising in Republican primaries.

In the complaint, the FEC said it tried to work out an agreement with the club, but the organization would not agree to a remedy. The FEC is considering action against other 527s.

President Bush's campaign, key lawmakers who helped pass the 2002 changes and other political organizations sued the FEC last year for not enforcing its regulations on 527s. Those cases are pending in federal court.

New State Law May Nix Asbestos Cases (LAW)

By Steven H. Pollak, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 20, 2005

Lawyers are gearing up for a constitutional challenge to a new state law that could remove nearly 3,000 asbestos cases from Fulton County dockets.

The law was designed to stem the tide of out-of-state asbestos claims being filed in Georgia, said its primary sponsor, Rep. David E. Ralston, R-Blue Ridge.

"We were seeing a huge number of people that were nonresidents of Georgia and that had not been exposed to asbestos or silica in Georgia who were suing in Georgia courts," said Ralston. "That was a trend that was disturbing not only to me, but to others."

The vast majority of asbestos cases in Georgia have been filed in Fulton, with about 2,200 pending in state court before Judge Henry M. Newkirk and about 1,000 pending in superior court before Chief Judge Doris L. Downs, attorneys involved in the cases said. They estimated that out-of-state plaintiffs who were not exposed to asbestos in Georgia filed approximately 90 percent of those cases.

A lawyer defending the asbestos suits, E. Elaine Shofner of Hawkins & Parnell, noted that claims in Georgia courts have originated from Alabama, North Carolina, Wisconsin, Hawaii, Texas, Nebraska and Pennsylvania.

"We became a dumping ground," she said.

One plaintiffs' attorney, David P. Bevon of Motley Rice in Mount Pleasant, S.C., said out-of-state plaintiffs filed in Georgia because the law here was more favorable than in other states for injuries that occurred years or even decades ago. He also noted that some defendants, such as Georgia-Pacific, are based here.

The new law, signed by Gov. Sonny Perdue on April 12 and codified at chapter 51-14 of the Georgia Code, prevents future suits from out-of-state plaintiffs. But because it applies retroactively, the constitutional fight is over the impact the law could have on cases that already have been filed.

The law added a host of new requirements for asbestos claims to survive in the state's courts. Among the new rules, a plaintiff must present "prima facie evidence of physical impairment" that shows "to a reasonable degree of certainty" that exposure to asbestos was "a substantial contributing factor" to the plaintiff's injuries. Plaintiffs' attorneys have until Oct. 19 -- or 180 days from the enactment of the bill -- to file affidavits establishing the prima facie evidence.

The law requires the evidence to come from a "qualified physician," defined as a doctor who spends no more than 10 percent of his professional practice time on litigation and earns no more than 20 percent of his revenue from such work.

Bevon said plaintiffs' attorneys have had little success in establishing prima facie evidence in accordance with the new law, estimating that 98 percent of asbestos cases will not be able to meet the new standard.

"It's just part of the wave of tort reform," he said.

Bevon explained that the "qualified physician" provision of the law is most troublesome to plaintiffs' counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0006561

"It's basically limited to a treating doctor," he said. "But a treating doctor, in almost all cases, isn't qualified to give a diagnosis of an asbestos injury and then take the next step of attributing causation to asbestos exposure."

Even among the most serious cases where the plaintiffs developed mesothelioma -- a rare, terminal cancer for which asbestos is the only known cause -- the lawyers are coming up short. Bevon said he had somewhere between 100 and 150 cancer asbestos cases in Fulton, and only four can meet the prima facie requirements.

Another plaintiffs' firm, Baron & Budd of Dallas, has approximately 100 mesothelioma cases pending before Downs and has succeeded in obtaining only 20 affidavits from qualified physicians who were willing to attribute the cancer to asbestos exposure, according to a letter to the judge from Baron & Budd attorney John J. Spillane.

In addition, Baron & Budd represents about 500 clients who developed a noncancerous lung condition known as asbestosis. According to a brief submitted by the firm, "all but a scant handful of those claims will suffer dismissal."

Lawyers came before Newkirk on Sept. 7 on the plaintiffs' motion to declare the prima facie requirement "substantive in nature" -- in that it creates additional obligations for the plaintiffs with pending claims -- and therefore should be inapplicable to cases filed prior to the enactment of the statute. For cases filed by out-of-state plaintiffs, lawyers filed several motions urging the judge to use law from wherever the claims originated.

Newkirk issued his order two days later, finding the law to be "procedural" as opposed to substantive, saying that the legislation "merely sets forth the method by which plaintiffs in asbestos cases may bring or maintain their causes of action in Georgia."

Newkirk added that the law was intended to apply to all asbestos cases in Georgia -- past and future. He also said that interpreting the law differently for out-of-state plaintiffs would "grossly subvert the public policy of this state because it would provide that Georgia residents could be treated differently than non-Georgia residents."

The plaintiffs' counsel in state court and superior court now have filed constitutional challenges in their respective venues seeking to have the pending cases made immune from the new law's requirements. Downs will conduct a hearing on the motion on Sept. 30; Newkirk has not scheduled one yet.

A similar law passed in 2004 in Ohio was declared unconstitutional as it applied to pending asbestos cases, according to a motion filed by Bevon.

Unconstitutional Cartel (WSJ)

By Mark Hillman

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

When politicians take campaign contributions from Big Tobacco, self-proclaimed watchdog groups yelp about impropriety. Yet for the past seven years, the industry has paid tens of billions of dollars to state governments to protect tobacco profits. Until recently, hardly anyone seemed to notice, much less care.

Then, on Aug. 2, the non-profit Competitive Enterprise Institute filed a lawsuit arguing that the 1998 Master Settlement Agreement (MSA) between Big Tobacco and 46 state attorneys-general (AGs) violates the Constitution and establishes a cartel designed to circumvent antitrust law and quash competition. Hallelujah.

I am a state treasurer and this suit could greatly reduce revenue to my state; and still I am enthusiastic. The billions generated by the settlement cloak the pernicious threat that activist AGs pose to the checks and balances on political power that govern our Constitutional system. Regulation and taxation policies are the rightful responsibility of the legislative and executive branches -- not the domain of states' chief law enforcement officers.

* * *

The tangled history of the MSA begins in 1997. Big Tobacco and a group of AGs drafted a settlement agreement that ended the state lawsuits against the tobacco industry. It stipulated payments to states in return for liability protection. The proposal was presented to Congress for ratification, as required by the compact clause of the Constitution; but it died in the Senate, in large part because of its potential to undermine antitrust law.

By November 1998, Big Tobacco had negotiated another deal with several AGs, what became the MSA. This time, rather than seek Congressional ratification, the proposed settlement was presented to the nonparticipating AGs, who were given just seven days to decide whether to play ball. They had little choice but to participate. The MSA enabled the tobacco companies to raise prices on cigarettes nationwide -- not just in participating states -- to finance the deal. All smokers would pay the costs; the only question for AGs was whether their state would collect its share of the benefits.

Other than four states which had negotiated earlier settlements, every state signed on. Each was required to adopt uniform state laws -- with absolutely no amendments -- to enforce the terms of the MSA, including barriers that penalized smaller cigarette companies if their sales cut into those of the Big Four that organized the deal. In short, the states would help protect the majors from competition. "All states have an interest in reducing [small manufacturer] sales in every state," Vermont Attorney-General William H. Sorrell advised his colleagues.

Next, the MSA handed over $50 million and a significant role for enforcement and administration to an unelected entity, the National Association of Attorneys-General. NAAG plays a central role in determining how state AGs interpret and enforce the MSA. States can never opt out of the MSA, which can only be modified with unanimous consent of all states and all participating cigarette manufacturers. States relinquished their right to challenge the MSA in court.

This Faustian bargain locks states into a sleazy partnership with Big Tobacco, enforced by a compact that violates antitrust law and undermines market competition. Federal appellate judge Ralph K. Winter wrote, in a separate lawsuit brought by cigarette importers, that tobacco company executives "would long ago have had depressing conversations with their attorneys about the United States Sentencing Guidelines" had they forged a similar agreement without the complicity of state AGs. To add injustice to insult, the MSA takes money from predominately low- to middle-income smokers and transfers it to wealthy trial lawyers, some of whom reaped fees in excess of $100,000 an hour for their "work." On top of these affronts, the Constitutional objections to the MSA are manifold:

• The Constitution stipulates that "No state shall … enter into any agreement or compact with another state" without the approval of Congress. The MSA has never been so approved.

• The Constitution gives Congress exclusive authority to regulate interstate commerce. The MSA clearly usurps that authority.

• Delegation of inherent state powers to the NAAG undermines the state sovereignty protected by the Tenth Amendment.

The question facing the courts is not whether the MSA is good policy or whether tobacco companies are scoundrels. The larger issue is whether AGs can rightfully evolve into a law unto themselves, usurping the Constitutional roles of state legislators, governors, Congress and, ultimately, the voters themselves.

Mr. Hillman is Colorado state treasurer.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bipartisan Panel Recommends U.S. Election Changes (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 20, 2005

Electronic voting machines should have paper trails to keep track of votes cast and all voters should present photo IDs, a panel recommending ways to restore confidence in the U.S. election system said on Monday.

The bipartisan Commission on Federal Election Reform, led by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker, made 87 recommendations for strengthening the integrity of a process shaken by voting controversies, including the drawn-out 2000 recount saga in Florida.

"At a time when there is growing skepticism with our electoral system, the commission believes that a bold new approach is essential," the report said. Many of the recommendations would require approval by Congress.

The call for paper verification of votes on electronic machines drew praise from election reform advocates, but the call for photo identification was criticized as an invasion of privacy and something that would discourage some voters.

That recommendation would require all prospective voters by the year 2010 to produce a photo ID card at the polling place -- either a driver's license or, for those without driver's licenses, an identification card issued by the state.

The commission called on states to make distribution of the card simple and widespread.

DOJ_NMG_0006563

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington legislative office, said the photo ID provision "will disproportionately impact the poor and the elderly, who may not have drivers' licenses or access to a location where they can obtain IDs."

INTENSE DEBATE

Carter said the 21-member commission intensely debated that provision, but he believed a national uniform requirement was better than piecemeal state voter identification laws.

"I personally had, at the beginning, some very serious reservations about this issue," Carter said. "This will be, I think, a move forward in getting more people to vote. It would not restrict people from voting. It will be uniformly applied throughout the country, and it will be nondiscriminatory."

The commission also recommended states, not local jurisdictions, be responsible for the accuracy and quality of voter lists and that state election agencies be nonpartisan.

"Every one of the recommendations in our report, whether they are recommendations to the Congress or recommendations to the states, are designed to improve confidence in our system of federal elections. And there's plenty of room for improvement," Baker, who led President George W. Bush's team during the Florida recount controversy, told reporters.

The 2004 election was also plagued by questions, involving voter fraud and intimidation, long lines at polling places in poor neighborhoods, the integrity of voter registration lists and security against fraud for electronic voting machines.

Bush issued a statement praising the work of the commission. "It is critical to maintain America's trust in our election system, and I look forward to reviewing this report and working with Congress on the recommendations," he said.

Carter said the panel hoped most of its recommendations would be passed by the 2008 presidential election.

Panel Recommends Photo ID For Voters (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

A commission examining national voting practices issued a report to Congress yesterday recommending a uniform photo-identification standard, but opponents say its stringency would disenfranchise millions of voters who might lack the necessary documents to obtain the IDs.

The standard of identification recommended by the Commission on Federal Election Reform is essentially the same as those established by the recently passed federal Real ID Act, which outlines strict rules and procedures for the issuance of driver's licenses by the states.

"The Real ID is a logical vehicle because the National Voter Registration Act established a connection between obtaining a driver's license and registering to vote," said the report drafted by the commission, which is chaired by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. "The Real ID card adds two critical elements for voting -- proof of citizenship and verification by using the full Social Security number."

Mr. Carter and Mr. Baker yesterday defended the recommendations, saying photo-identification already is required to board airplanes, cash checks and enter federal buildings.

But Commissioner Spencer Overton, a George Washington University election law professor, dissented.

"The recommendation will exclude millions of Americans, and the disproportionate numbers of citizens who will be excluded are people of color," he said.

He pointed out, as does the report, that there is no significant "evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting." The report indicated that both occur in federal, state and local elections, but Mr. Overton said the majority of such fraud is related to absentee ballots, which require no identification.

It is the use of the Social Security number on the face of the Real ID card that has libertarians objecting.

"Beyond the voting rights issues, there is issue of identity fraud with thousands of cases where people are stealing another person's identity using their Social Security number; with these cards the number will be on there," said LaShawn Warren, legislative counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union.

DOJ_NMG_0006564

Jonah Goldman, an attorney for the campaign for fair elections for the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights under the Law, said the Real ID law creates an "enormous burden" on citizens to obtain identification. He said a person must prove who he or she is with four types of identification.

"In addition to all of that, when you put it into current context with the devastation in the Gulf Coast region, where many of those places had destruction of public records, people down there cannot even hope to prove some of these things," Mr. Goldman said.

President Bush received the report yesterday, but White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the president has not decided how to move forward.

"We will be reviewing it carefully," Mr. McClellan said. "We want to make sure that we continue to move forward on steps to protect the integrity of the voting systems and things of that nature."

Panel On Elections Proposes Changes (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A commission headed by former President Jimmy Carter and Secretary of State James Baker called for nonpartisan election administration and requiring voters to have photo identification.

Messrs. Carter and Baker presented President Bush with their recommendations, which also included information-sharing to prevent voters from registering in more than one state, use of mobile offices to ease registration, and a national requirement that electronic voting machines include a paper trail that would allow people to check their votes. They said White House support will be critical to moving some portions through the Republican-controlled Congress, and signaled it may come soon.

"Stay tuned, at least through tomorrow," Mr. Baker said. Last night the White House released a statement from the president praising the commission's "excellent work" and pledging to work with Congress on its recommendations.

Congressional action would only be a start in advancing recommendations of the commission, a private body organized by American University here in Washington that seeks to build on voting-law changes enacted after the disputed 2000 election. Most recommendations require action by state legislatures.

Reforming The Vote (WP)

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The report released yesterday by a commission on federal election reform, headed by former president Jimmy Carter and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, contains a number of valuable proposals. But adopting one of the commission's recommendations -- that voters be required to present a government-issued voter ID at the polls -- would, on balance, do more harm than good.

The commission's most useful proposals would address both lingering and new flaws in the current voting system. Five years after the problems exposed by the 2000 presidential election, voter registration rolls remain riddled with inaccurate and outdated information. The commission sensibly called on states to take charge of assembling accurate lists that would help eliminate duplicate registrations while making it easier for citizens to vote in new jurisdictions.

The introduction in 2004 of a requirement that voters who appear at the polls be given provisional ballots if their names aren't on the registration lists created questions about how to judge the legitimacy of such ballots. The commission sensibly recommended that states adopt clear statewide procedures for considering such ballots. The advent of computerized voting systems has provoked anxiety about whether such machines are secure from fraud or malfunction; the commission -- again sensibly, and in contrast to the position of Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- endorsed the need for machines capable of delivering a voter-verifiable paper trail.

The problem recommendation -- which drew a dissent from three of the 20 commission members, including former senator Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.) -- would require voters to present a government photo identification at the polls. This may not sound particularly burdensome in an age when, as the commission noted, such IDs "are needed to board a plane, enter federal buildings, and cash a check." Yet 12 percent of the voting-age population does not have a driver's license, and those without identification tend disproportionately to be minorities, the elderly and the poor. To its credit, the commission urges states to ensure that such IDs are "easily available and issued free of charge." But for those who don't already have identification, the hurdle of assembling the necessary documentation and obtaining the cards could prove a deterrent to voting.

DOJ_NMG_0006565

On the other side of the balance is the risk of elections tainted by fraud or the perception of fraud. The commission found that "there is no evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting, but both occur, and it could affect the outcome of a close election." That's true -- but so could turning away otherwise eligible voters.

Indeed, election administrators agree that absentee ballots pose a bigger risk of fraud, and in that case the commission would guard against fraud by having election officials match a signature on file. As commission member Spencer Overton, an election law expert at George Washington University, asks, why wouldn't the same be sufficient for those who turn up at the polls without ID? Allowing voters to show alternative forms of identification or to sign a sworn affidavit of eligibility could go a significant way toward deterring fraud without imposing the burden of an inflexible photo ID requirement.

Denying Access To The Ballot (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

It has been clear since 2000 that the election system is in serious need of reform. But the commission led by James Baker III and former President Jimmy Carter has come up with a plan that is worse than no reform at all. Its good ideas are outweighed by one very bad idea: a voter identification requirement that would prevent large numbers of poor, black and elderly people from voting.

The commission makes helpful recommendations. It favors requiring electronic voting machines to produce paper records, and opposes partisan activity by state election officials. It fails to address other problems, like not counting provisional ballots cast at the wrong precincts.

But the bombshell recommendation is for the states to require voters to have drivers' licenses or a government-issued photo ID. That would not be a great burden for people who have drivers' licenses, but it would be for those who don't, and they are disproportionately poor, elderly or members of minorities. These voters would have to get special photo ID's and keep them updated. If they didn't have the ID's, their right to vote would be taken away. The commission recommends that the cards be free. But election administration is notoriously underfinanced, and it is not hard to imagine that states would charge for them. Georgia is already charging $20 and more for each of its state voter cards.

There is very little evidence of voters' claiming to be people they are not, and the commission admits that its members are divided about how big a problem it is. But the report goes on to say that even if there is just a small amount of fraud, it should be stopped. True, but if the solution risks disenfranchising hundreds of thousands, or even millions, of voters, it is a very bad reform.

There are more reasonable approaches. The states could require uniform ID's, but allow each voter without one to sign an affidavit attesting to his or her identity, a system some states use now. It is little wonder that a dissent came from the former Democratic leader in the Senate, Tom Daschle, a commission member. He said that "for some, the commission's ID proposal constitutes nothing short of a modern-day poll tax."

The disappointing report made public yesterday was not a complete surprise. There have been red flags waving around the commission for some time; Mr. Baker is remembered by many for his fierce fight to stop the counting of votes in Florida in 2000. There have also been complaints about the commission's process. Spencer Overton, a George Washington University law professor and commission member, complains that he was told he had to limit a dissent on complicated voting issues to just 250 words.

The purpose of election reform should not be making it harder to vote. We all have a duty to make our election system as good as it can be - and not to disenfranchise people in the name of reform.

Suit Slams Voter ID Law Plaintiffs Assail Ga. Requirement As Illegal 'Poll Tax' (AJC)

By Carlos Campos, James Salzer, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

Voting and civil rights groups launched a legal assault Monday on the state's requirement that Georgians show a government-issued photo ID at the polls — a law they call the most restrictive of its kind in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0006566

A federal lawsuit filed on behalf of two African-American voters, the American Civil Liberties Union, NAACP, League of Women Voters, black legislators and others calls the new law a "poll tax" that will rob black, elderly and rural people of their right to vote.

Supporters of the new law condemned the suit, arguing that the law will eliminate the likelihood of fraud at the polls. House Speaker Glenn Richardson (R-Hiram) called it a "ludicrous lawsuit."

"This lawsuit is nothing more than liberal special interests using unconscionable scare tactics to frighten Georgia voters," Richardson said.

While long expected, the suit raises the stakes of a debate that has raged since last winter's session of the Legislature. The suit won't affect today's special elections in Cobb County and elsewhere, but opponents hope a judge throws out the law before elections being held in November in many Georgia cities.

"There is no place for a voter-suppression law," said Tisha Tallman, regional counsel for the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Educational Fund and an attorney for the plaintiffs. "The case against House Bill 244 is strong, and we intend to prevail in court."

The law, which went into effect earlier this year after approval by the Legislature and Gov. Sonny Perdue, requires voters to show one of six forms of government-issued photo identification, such as a driver's license. Previously, Georgians could show one of 17 forms, including a Social Security card or utility bill.

Although Georgia is one of five states requiring voters to show photo IDs, its law has been called the most restrictive because other states allow photo IDs that are not issued by the government, such as work badges.

The U.S. Justice Department, which must review changes to Georgia voting laws to ensure that minority rights are not infringed upon, approved the new law in August. But the suit argues that the law violates the federal Voting Rights Act and Civil Rights Act by placing obstacles to voting.

"The new photo ID requirement ... imposes an unnecessary and undue burden on the exercise of the fundamental right to vote on hundreds of thousands of citizens of Georgia who are fully eligible, registered and qualified to vote, but who do not have Georgia driver's licenses, passports, or employer ID cards or other forms of photographic identification issued by the state or federal government," according to the lawsuit.

The lawsuit contends the requirement's true purpose is to suppress "voting by the poor, the elderly, the infirm, African-American, Hispanic and other minority voters by increasing the difficulty of voting."

The suit cited Secretary of State Cathy Cox's testimony that during her nine years in office, she has not documented a case of voter fraud at the polls by people pretending to be someone they are not.

The lawsuit also alleges that requiring Georgians to pay for a state identification card constitutes a poll tax that is outlawed under the 24th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In addition to the $20 to $35 fee for an ID card, there are also travel costs associated with getting an ID card, since only 56 of Georgia's 159 counties offer them at Department of Driver Services offices.

The new law waives the ID fee charged to indigent voters, and the state is sending a bus around Georgia to issue free IDs to those who need them. But the lawsuit said the definition of indigent is vague and does not take into account travel costs.

Two African-Americans are named as plaintiffs: Tony Watkins of Rome and Clara Williams of Atlanta. The lawsuit states that both do not have a picture ID and "cannot readily obtain a photo ID card." Watkins declined to comment Monday, and Williams could not be reached.

African-American voters are disproportionately affected because census data indicate they generally earn less than whites and are three times less likely to have access to a car, the lawsuit alleges. The lawsuit also notes that the new law allows voters to cast an absentee ballot without showing photo ID.

Rep. Sue Burmeister (R-Augusta), who sponsored the bill, said Georgians have to show photo IDs all the time.

"I don't even see what their argument is," Burmeister said. "It's not about race. It's not about age."

The suit was filed as a federal commission headed by former President Jimmy Carter called for Americans to be required to show a photo ID card to vote by 2010, in part to establish a national standard. Carter called the Georgia statute a "disgrace to democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0006567

"If you read the Georgia law that was passed this year, you see that it is highly discriminatory and, in my personal experience, directly designed to deprive older people, African-Americans and poor people of a right to vote," he said.

Staff writers Bill Rankin and Eunice Moscoso contributed to this article.

Rights Groups Challenge Photo ID Law (AP)

By DICK PETTYS, The Associated Press

AP, September 19, 2005

ATLANTA (AP) — Voter and civil rights organizations filed a federal lawsuit Monday challenging Georgia's new law requiring voters to show photo identification at the polls.

The suit was filed the same day a commission co-chaired by former President Carter, a Georgia native, recommended a national requirement that voters show photo IDs.

Opponents of photo IDs for voters say such requirements would disenfranchise minorities and the poor; backers say they're a good way to combat voter fraud.

"Photographic identification as a requirement for voting is antidemocratic and prevents people from exercising their fundamental right to vote whether proposed by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia or the Carter-Baker commission," said Daniel Levitas of the American Civil Liberties Union's voting rights project.

Plaintiffs in the suit — including Common Cause, the League of Women Voters, the Georgia Legislative Black Caucus and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People — contend the law violates the state and federal constitutions.

The law eliminates formerly accepted forms of voter identification, such as Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills.

Several groups filed objections with the Justice Department before it approved the law last month. Under the Voting Rights Act, Georgia and other states with a history of suppressing minority voting must get federal permission to change their voting laws.

The Republican-backed measure sparked racial tension during the state's legislative session last spring. Most of Georgia's black lawmakers walked out at the state Capitol when it was approved.

Democrats argued the idea was a political move by the GOP to depress voting among minorities, the elderly and the poor — all traditional bases for Democrats.

Dan McLagan, a spokesman for Republican Gov. Sonny Perdue, said the law is intended to deter voter fraud.

"Requiring an ID to vote is common sense and has been instituted in other states," he said. "Under the old system, you could pluck a utility bill out of somebody's trash can and cast a vote."

Nineteen states require voters to show identification, but only five request photo ID, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Those states — Arizona, Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina and South Dakota — allow voters without a photo ID to use other forms of ID or sign an affidavit of identity.

Carter, who chaired an election reform commission along with former Secretary of State James Baker, said in Washington Monday that requiring photo IDs was one of the most important and most difficult of his group's recommendations.

"We addressed this with a great deal of hesitancy," he said, adding that a national approach would prevent states from enacting laws that are discriminatory.

Single-member Districts Divide Osceola's Hispanics (ORS)

By Daphne Sashin, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, September 20, 2005

KISSIMMEE -- The federal voting-rights lawsuit against Osceola County has become a wedge in the Hispanic community, dividing activists and candidates over the best way to gain political power.

Some supporters of the suit, who filed a similar challenge against the city of Kissimmee, contend that single-member districts would give Hispanics a better shot at representation.

Other Hispanics say there's nothing keeping the right candidate from winning under the current at-large system, in which commissioners are elected by all the voters. Often, they say, Hispanic candidates undercut each other's campaigns, fail to get other Hispanics to vote or convey the wrong message.

"Saying we should get this because we're Hispanic is not the answer. . . . There's a lot of people who are sick of it," said Hector Lizasuain, a board member of several community organizations, including Give Kids Safe Shelter.

The Justice Department filed suit against the county in July, alleging Osceola's practice of electing commissioners countywide discriminates against Hispanics because it dilutes their voting strength. The county's Hispanic population has tripled during the past decade. Although they make up 31 percent of registered voters, only one Hispanic has been elected as a county commissioner.

The federal government has suggested that Osceola could create five commission districts, with one made up of mostly Hispanic voters.

Armando Ramirez, who originally complained to the Justice Department and spearheaded the Kissimmee suit, and other activists say a single-member district system is the only way for a minority candidate with little money to get elected.

"It's very expensive when you try to run an election at-large," said Zulma Velez Estrada, who has worked to register Hispanic voters in Central Florida. "You have to put up signs, you have to . . . let everybody know you. You have to market yourself."

Others say the people fighting for single-member districts are a handful of disheartened candidates who want to get elected without proving themselves as leaders.

For more Hispanics to win, they must work harder to get Hispanics to the polls while reaching beyond the Hispanic community for support, said Peter Olivo, who lost two close races for County Commission and plans to run for the School Board.

"I really don't think single-member districts are going to do any good to anyone," Olivo said. "You're going to get a lot of people running who could easily win because of the number of people they know, but have no idea . . . what it takes to run government."

Domingo Toro, a Kissimmee Utility Authority board member and longtime activist, disagrees. Single-member districts, he said, would give minorities the chance to compete with Anglos on an equal footing. Toro lost a 2004 bid to become a Kissimmee commissioner in a runoff and was passed over for interim mayor in July.

"I'm on three boards right now. People know me, because the only thing I do is serve my community. And still, I did not get the vote," Toro said. "We don't want them to give us anything. We [want to] earn it. . . . We deserve to represent ourselves."

Candidate Carlos Irizarry says he admires Ramirez for challenging the system but doesn't agree with his approach. The obstacles Hispanic candidates have faced are not "the system's fault," he said.

"Example: In 2004, I ran for office. The first person to file against me was a Hispanic . . . knowing that I filed first. Obviously, the Hispanic vote was divided, and that's why I lost," Irizarry said. "I would never run against a Hispanic if he filed first."

After the Justice Department sued the county, Ramirez said he had no immediate plans to run for another election and maintained that his detractors "are afraid to ruffle the feathers of the good-old-boy system."

State Rep. John Quiñones, R-Kissimmee, has suggested that the county try to settle the suit by expanding the County Commission from five to seven members, with three or four district seats and the others elected at-large.

"This is the second-fastest-growing county in the state," Quiñones said of Osceola. "We need to address whether we're doing everything possible to make this community better represented in government."

Even some defenders of the current system say Quiñones has the right idea. They worry that a drawn-out lawsuit will fuel an anti-Hispanic backlash and send the wrong message.

"Fighting it at this point . . . it lacks progressiveness on the part of the county," said Rosa Alvarez, Quiñones' aide and the Republican committeewoman for Celebration. "Rather than spending our money and arguing . . . the time is right to move on."

Daphne Sashin can be reached at dsashin@orlandosentinel.com or 407-931-5944.

Tired Of 'Being Nice,' Disabled Group Storms Hill (RC)

By Scott Hechinger

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

More than 500 disability-rights protesters from across the country, most in wheelchairs, descended on Congressional offices today to call for expanded patient rights under Medicaid and to express frustration with some Members' calls for deep cuts to social programs.

DOJ_NMG_0006569

Despite numerous arrests and a heavy Capitol Police presence, the protesters plan to stay on Capitol Hill throughout the week.

"We have been closely monitoring the situation and are now processing those we have arrested," said Capitol Police spokesman Michael Lauer. "We are familiar with this group, however, and are sympathetic to their needs and causes."

Most of those arrested were being held in Room 2128 in the Rayburn House Office Building to be processed, but arrests also were made in the Hart Senate and Cannon House office buildings. No official comment on the number of arrests is yet available.

In addition to general calls for enhancing disability rights, the protesters urged Members of Congress to sponsor and pass the Medicaid Community-Based Attendant Services and Supports Act, as well as the Money Follows the Person Act, both of which were proposed by ADAPT, the disability-rights organization leading Monday's protest and fight on the Hill.

ADAPT argues that these bills would allow the disabled greater control over their health care options under Medicaid, which they say currently forces too many into nursing homes unnecessarily and against their will. The acts have been brought before Congress twice previously, both times unsuccessfully.

"We've tried being nice," said Linda Anthony, an ADAPT spokeswoman. "We've written Congressmen, we've phoned them, we've come to their offices to try to talk, but nothing works. We're done playing nice. We'd rather go to jail then go back to the nursing homes."

Anthony, who was in a wheelchair like most others, was flanked by more than 40 other protesters outside the office of Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) cheering for those either wheeled or carried out of the office by Capitol Police and chanting "No more talk, we need action."

Barton's office was just one of several Congressional offices targeted by the protesters in a coordinated effort that had been planned for months. As chairman of Energy and Commerce, Barton would play a crucial role in helping or hindering both of the acts, Anthony said.

Barton was in his district Monday, and although the protesters were able to meet with an aide in charge of health and human services, the police eventually were called. According to the Capitol Police, protesters were arrested only after Barton's office requested that they be removed.

"We tried to accommodate them, but they weren't agreeing with what we were saying," said Barton's press secretary Karen Modlin. "It kept escalating to the point where we needed to get the Capitol Police involved."

"Our job is to make Medicaid stronger for the people who need it most. I'm sorry ADAPT disagrees," she added.

Flag Issue May Burn Brightly In '06 Races (HILL)

By Bob Cusack And Kipp Lanham

The Hill, September 20, 2005

The Republican-led Senate is unlikely to vote on a flag-burning amendment this fall, but the measure will almost certainly hit the floor months before next year's elections.

Republicans will use the proposed amendment to the Constitution as political ammunition in 2006. Several targeted Democrats in the upper chamber oppose changing the Constitution to prohibit flag burning, including Sens. Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Robert Byrd (W.Va.).

The fate of a pending flag-burning amendment lies in the hands of a few senators. Because Sen. Orrin Hatch's (R-Utah) amendment would alter the Constitution, it needs 67 votes, two-thirds of the Senate, to pass.

Including Hatch, the amendment has 58 co-sponsors. Based on previous votes, the measure has the likely support of 63 senators — if senators vote the way they have previously.

It is unclear how Sens. Tom Carper (D-Del.) and Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) would vote on the Hatch amendment. As a member of the House, Carper voted for a Hatch-like measure, while Kohl has voted against Hatch's amendment previously but is undecided on how he will vote in this Congress.

Regardless of how these senators vote, it appears that the flag-burning amendment is one or two votes shy of reaching 67.

DOJ_NMG_0006570

Democratic senators who are not co-sponsors of the measure but have indicated support for it include Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and Sens. Ben Nelson (Neb.). Bill Nelson (Fla.) and Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.).

Sen. Robert Bennett (R-Utah) has introduced legislation — not a constitutional amendment — that seeks to provide protection for the flag. Sens. Byrd, Conrad and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) are co-sponsors of the legislation.

Others who have expressed support for this approach in lieu of the Hatch resolution are Sens. Cantwell, Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

It is "not likely," Hatch spokesman Adam Elggren said, that Hatch would seek a compromise with Bennett on his flag amendment. "They disagree on the amendment. They agree to disagree."

While the top Senate Democrat backs Hatch's amendment, Assistant Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) opposes it because of First Amendment issues. McConnell is the overwhelming favorite to take over as the top Senate Republican in the 110th Congress.

All five Democratic senators who are said to be considering a presidential run in 2008 — Evan Bayh (Ind.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Clinton, Russ Feingold (Wis.) and John Kerry (Mass.) — oppose Hatch's amendment.

The House earlier this year approved a flag-burning amendment by a wide margin. If the Senate cleared the measure, it would then have to be ratified by 38 states within seven years.

Some on Capitol Hill expected the Senate to vote on the Hatch resolution after the House's vote, but Senate sources say that with the chamber's busy fall schedule, a Senate roll call will probably be pushed back into next year.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee has repeatedly seized on the flag-burning issue and this year has zeroed in on Byrd, running ads on his vote against a constitutional amendment. Byrd fired back, claiming the ad was misleading.

Democrats say that Republicans are just interested in playing politics with the flag, noting that votes on the amendment usually are brought up in election years.

In 1995 and 2000, Hatch introduced similar amendments, which were defeated 63-37 and 63-36, respectively. In 2000, 12 Democrats voted for it.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who faces a potentially difficult reelection campaign next year, plans to vote for Hatch's measure.

The Supreme Court struck down the Flag Protection Act in 1990, ruling in defense of the First Amendment that burning a flag is free speech.

ANTITRUST:

More States Plan Minimum-service Real Estate Laws (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts, Inman News

Inman News, September 20, 2005

Realtor associations in Wisconsin and Ohio are pushing for laws that establish new service requirements for real estate professionals while making room for real estate companies that offer a lesser range of services for lower fees.

In several other states, Realtor-backed efforts to establish a mandatory range of services for all real estate professionals – effectively banning some limited forms of real estate services – have drawn sharp criticism from antitrust officials at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission.

But the Realtor groups in Wisconsin and Ohio say their proposals recognize and provide some protections for real estate business models that offer fewer services than traditional firms. In both of these states, Realtor associations formed task forces to study the law changes, with representation from limited-service real estate companies.

The Association of Real Estate License Law Officials, a group for real estate regulators, conducted a study that found that Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas and Utah have enacted some form of minimum-service legislation within the past couple of years. And other states, too, have earlier approved or are now pursuing minimum-service measures.

DOJ_NMG_0006571

Federal officials opposed the Realtor-backed measures in Alabama, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas, charging that the legislation was anticompetitive and anti-consumer. But legislators and governors in all four states passed the measures despite these objections.

State Realtor associations have been driving the support for these law changes, stating that the laws aim to protect consumers from receiving less services than they expect in a real estate transaction while also preventing situations in which full-service real estate professionals may feel obligated to assist consumers on the other side of a real estate deal who are working with limited-service real estate companies.

But opponents of the measures say that consumers should be able to choose which real estate services they receive in a real estate transaction, and there are not enough complaints against limited-service companies to justify the law changes.

The Ohio Association of Realtors formed a Task Force on Minimum Services for Listings to study possible changes to state law, and the group prepared a report and recommendations. This work did not go unnoticed.

Don Freels, CEO for the state association, said, "It is interesting that the U.S. Department of Justice was very much aware of our progress in developing our report, and I have sent it to them for review." Freels said he hasn't yet received a formal response from the Justice Department on the law changes that the association is seeking, though he doesn't expect any objections.

"I'm extremely pleased with the work product we produced. I think it's going to be very salable to the Ohio Legislature and the Real Estate (Commission) here in Ohio," he said. "Our task force included brokers who offer minimum services. We made a very conscious effort to include representatives of all business models."

Sharon Jebavy, an Ohio Realtor who offers flat-fee property listing services, served on the task force. Jebavy said she would prefer there be no new minimum-services law in the state, though she does not object to the recommendations. "I think we've come up with a real workable plan. I don't really see a need for it, but if you have to have it I think this is a good bill," she said.

Among the task force's findings: "Consumers should have the right to select the level of service they want from a real estate licensee. Regardless of the level of service the consumer chooses, however, there are certain basic fiduciary duties a licensee must always perform to assure the consumer is protected in their real estate transaction. The license law should assure that consumers are making an informed decision regarding the level of service they receive...(and) should not unreasonably restrict or limit emerging business models."

The group's recommendations include a sample "Waiver of Agency Duties" form that allows sellers to waive some of their real estate representative's duties while specifying which duties are required. Among the required list of duties: exercising reasonable skill and care in representing the client; performing the terms of any written agency agreement; following any lawful instructions of the client; being loyal to the interest of the client; advising the client to obtain expert advice related to material matters when necessary or appropriate; and accounting in a timely manner for all moneys and property received in which the client has or may have an interest.

Sellers also can specify which of the following duties they allow their representative to waive: Seek a purchase offer at a price and with terms acceptable to the client; accept delivery of and present any purchase offer to the client in a timely manner; answer the client's questions and provide information to the client regarding any offers and/or counteroffers; assist the client in developing, communicating, negotiating and presenting offers and/or counteroffers; and inform the client of the steps the client must take to fulfill the terms of the contract.

The Ohio Realtor group's board of directors approved the task force report and recommendations this week, and Freels said he anticipated passage of legislation early next year. The proposed legislation will represent the most significant changes that the group has proposed to real estate law since the mid-1990s, Freels added.

Meanwhile, the Wisconsin Realtors Association has found a sponsor for its version of minimum-service legislation, and Rick Staff, senior staff attorney for the group, said he expects a final draft of the legislation within a couple of weeks.

The Wisconsin proposal is "the product of years of discussion and input," Staff said. "We have every confidence that it will go forward. Our approach on limited service has gotten a number of peoples' attention because we took a fairly unique perspective. We don't think that limited-service brokerage constitutes a risk to consumers such that it needs to be banned under the state's law."

DOJ_NMG_0006572

The legislation will be the culmination of the work of a Wisconsin Realtors Association License Law Task Force, formed in 2002. The legislation will create "a duty to provide, upon the client's request, certain types of information and advice and a duty to negotiate on behalf of a client," according to a preliminary draft. "Under the bill, a client may waive the broker's duty to negotiate, but only in writing."

A broker disclosure statement in the preliminary draft of the bill notes that brokers owe certain duties to all parties in a transaction, including: the duty to provide brokerage services fairly and honestly; the duty to exercise reasonable skill and care in providing brokerage services; and the duty to provide accurate information about market conditions within a reasonable time if requested, unless disclosure of the information is prohibited by law, among others.

And when consumers enter into an agency agreement with a broker, "a broker owes additional duties to a client," the preliminary bill states. "The broker will provide, at your request, information and advice on real estate matters that affect your transaction. The broker must provide you with all material facts affecting the transaction. The broker will negotiate for you, unless you release the broker from this duty. The broker will not, unless required by law, give information or advice to other persons who are not the broker's clients, if giving the information or advice is contrary to your interests."

Staff said that essentially the Wisconsin proposal seeks to allow consumers to opt out from receiving negotiation services from a real estate professional, while guaranteeing that they will receive certain services. The legislation defines negotiation as "acting as an intermediary by facilitating or participating in communications between parties related to the parties' interests in a transaction," and "presenting to a party the proposals of other parties to the transaction and giving the party a general explanation of the provisions of the proposal."

The State Bar of Wisconsin had opposed language in the Wisconsin Realtor Association's License Law Task Force report relating to the proposed law changes, as it "would allow brokers, who are not licensed to practice law by the Wisconsin Supreme Court, to provide legal advice (including enhanced abilities to negotiate and draft contracts and explain the consequences of actions taken during transactions," though the lawyers' group has not yet reviewed the preliminary bill text.

Corey Scholtka, BuyHomes.com

Statements in the preliminary bill text note that a "broker or salesperson can answer your questions about brokerage services, but if you need legal advice, tax advice, or a professional home inspection, contact an attorney, tax advisor, or home inspector."

Corey Scholtka, owner of BuyHomes.com, a flat-fee brokerage based in Delafield, Wis., said he is optimistic about the legislative proposal. Scholtka, who was invited to give input to the task force, has been an outspoken advocate of new real estate business models, including limited-service real estate companies.

Scholtka said that there is an important distinction in Wisconsin's minimum-service proposal compared to other states, because Wisconsin allows choices in services rather than mandating a long list of services that real estate professionals must perform.

"I've been assured that it's not going to change my business model," he said. "I'm for choices – this seems to promote choices."

MasterCard Says Millions No-touch Cards To Be Issued (REU)

By James B. Kelleher

Reuters, September 19, 2005

MEMPHIS, Sept 19 (Reuters) - A top executive with Mastercard Inc. (MA.N: Quote, Profile, Research) said on Monday the company, the world's No. 2 credit-card association, expected to have 4 million so-called "pay pass" cards in circulation by year's end.

Speaking at an industry conference here, Ruth Ann Marshall, Americas president for MasterCard, said that Citibank, HSBC and Key Bank had all begun offering the cards, which are equipped with a radio-frequency chip that allows customers to pay for purchases by simply waving their cards at readers posted near cash registers or gas pumps.

DOJ_NMG_0006573

Marshall said the pay-pass cards were "easier to use than cash" and were one of the products MasterCard was counting on to increase revenue and profits as it faces a variety of challenges in the marketplace, including new rivals and regulatory scrutiny.

"It's just one of the ... breakthroughs in technology that we're pursuing in order to increase convenience and boost usage," Marshall said.

MasterCard, owned by more than 1,000 banks, formally revealed its plans last week to go public early next year in an initial public offering.

In addition, to raising money to bolster its balance sheet, MasterCard said it believed the IPO would help quell criticism from merchants and others, who charge that its current structure -- which foes characterize as a cartel of competing banks setting transaction fees in concert -- represents a violation of U.S. antitrust laws.

Marshall said MasterCard was also working with U.S. cellular phone providers to turn mobile phones into "a high-powered payment and sales device." The program was still in the "pre-launch stage" here in the United States, she said, but added its success overseas suggested it would appeal to "young, active consumers."

She acknowledged that the Internet and other technologies were creating "substantial ripples in the personal finance industry."

"Take PayPal, for example," she said. "Ten years ago entering the payment industry from a standing start was nearly impossible. But by providing eBay (EBAY.O: Quote, Profile, Research) customers with a convenient way to move money PayPal quickly became a player in the payments industry and an acquisition target for eBay."

As a result, she said it was conceivable that others would eventually become players in the industry, including Google (GOOG.O: Quote, Profile, Research) , which has signaled it may be interested in getting into payments.

Marshall said MasterCard was taking Google's threat seriously.

"Certainly any company that can develop complex search algorithms has the technological capacity to enter the payments business. And Google certainly has the capital."

She said that Google and others, however, lacked the customer history data that MasterCard and its bank owners have -- and said that that data gave existing industry players a competitive advantage.

"Google, PayPal and other newcomers don't have years worth of data to draw on to structure offerings to particular market segments," Marshall said. "Banks do."

Verizon Wireless, Records Vendor Settle (WP)

By Jonathan Krim

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

A Tennessee company will stop selling personal cell phone records of individuals over the Internet and will provide information on how it acquired such data under an agreement reached last week with Verizon Wireless.

The firm, Source Resources Inc. of Cookeville, Tenn., was among dozens of companies advertising that for fees starting under $100, they would provide records of calls placed to and from any phone user.

Call records frequently are used by law enforcement, which obtains them through court orders. But small data brokers and private investigators have made a business of getting and selling the information online, often acquiring the information using deceptive or illegal practices, according to experts.

Although phone records cannot lead to the type of financial fraud that can result when other types of personal data are stolen, experts said they can be exploited by criminals, such as stalkers or abusive spouses trying to locate their victims.

Wireless carriers say cases of purloined records are rare and that they take measures to safeguard the information. But the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a leading privacy rights group, last month urged the Federal Communications Commission to crack down on carriers for having inadequate security.

Verizon Wireless sued Source Resources in July, after a Verizon Wireless customer complained that his records had been obtained from Source Resources without his permission.

Officials at Source Resources did not return messages seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0006574

Verizon Wireless spokesman Jeffrey Nelson said that the information was obtained through a commonly used tactic known as pretexting.

The companies that sell the records impersonate actual customers, using private data provided by the people seeking to buy the information. Nelson said the company is continually updating its procedures and training of call-center employees to guard against pretexting.

And he said Verizon Wireless is looking forward to learning more about the various sources of call records and how they are acquired.

"If you are one of these companies that are stealing people's identities, you better sleep with one eye open," Nelson said.

U.S. Is Close To Approving Deals Altering The Telephone Industry (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz and John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Federal regulators are nearing approval of two deals that would reshape the telephone industry and are in negotiations over likely divestitures and other conditions intended to preserve competition, especially in the huge market for corporate customers.

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin is pressing the FCC staff to deliver as early as tomorrow recommendations to approve Verizon Communications Inc.'s $8.5 billion purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications Inc.'s $16 billion takeover of AT&T Corp., people familiar with the situation say. FCC votes on the deals could come as early as the agency's Oct. 12 meeting.

At the same time, Justice Department investigators have concluded that the merging companies must sell some assets, moves they believe are needed to preserve competition for high-volume business customers, said lawyers close to the government review. Antitrust enforcers are negotiating with SBC and Verizon on the scope of those divestitures, these people said.

That is a concern for SBC and Verizon, since a major goal of their acquisitions was to acquire lucrative corporate customers in order to sell more packages of telecom services.

As a result of both the FCC and Justice Department reviews, regulators are concerned that consolidation will make it more difficult for business customers to get discounts on telecom services.

In particular, regulators are focusing on increasing consumer access to digital subscriber line Internet connections, which consumers are mostly barred from buying unless they also purchase local-phone service; and on so-called special access lines, essentially fiber-optic lines used to provide voice and data to high-volume business customers.

Regulators are considering requiring the merged companies to sell Internet access without requiring consumers -- mostly home users -- to subscribe to phone service. Verizon already allows some customers to do that, but SBC doesn't. Regulators don't appear to be considering price controls.

Patrick Mahoney, an analyst at Yankee Group, said that traditional phone lines are cash cows, so allowing customers buy Internet access without traditional phone service would be costly to telecom providers. Some companies, notably Qwest Communications International Inc., have decided to market DSL-only offerings as customers shed their traditional phone service in favor of Internet-based calling or wireless phones.

In the Justice Department review, SBC and Verizon have argued against the need for divestitures in the high-volume business market. Opponents say the two companies should be required to sell off nearly all local special-access business lines that AT&T or MCI now operate within the Bells' home regions. Under this approach, for example, most big local lines into corporate offices in Manhattan that AT&T operated in competition with Verizon would be sold to a third company to preserve competition.

Qwest, which had earlier bid unsuccessfully for MCI, argues that the deals would create unprecedented market concentration in the crucial business market if the two companies are allowed to buy their closest competitor. To fix this, Qwest wants the Justice Department to order substantial divestitures in SBC and Verizon's home markets -- and is eager to buy those assets, ensuring greater competition.

DOJ_NMG_0006575

The FCC is examining overlapping networks from a geographic perspective, according to people familiar with the review. That would favor the Bells' argument that there are limited competitive concerns. Justice Department officials are reviewing similar data on a building-by-building basis, which suggests they are examining possible divestitures in markets where there is significant overlap.

"If you're talking about 50 buildings, that's one thing. If you're talking about 500, that's a problem," said a Bell company executive. Other possible remedies include making some high-capacity business lines available to other carriers at AT&T or MCI pricing -- at least temporarily.

An FCC spokesman declined to comment on the deal reviews.

The Bells' desire to wrap up the deals by the end of the year has trumped their concerns that the FCC's evenly split board -- thanks to a Republican seat vacated by former Chairman Michael Powell in March that remains unfilled -- will lead to tougher conditions on the deals by regulators. The FCC's two Democrats -- Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein -- may extract significant concessions in approving the deals since Mr. Martin needs at least one of them to vote in favor. Neither have seen details of the staff report nor discussed what conditions they might seek.

The Bells have little choice but to move ahead: The FCC's only other Republican, Kathleen Abernathy, must leave the agency when Congress adjourns this winter and her term expires. Waiting for her successor to arrive could delay the deals.

The FCC's two Democrats "have enormous leverage," said Blair Levin, a telecom analyst with Legg Mason Wood Walker Inc. He predicts the deals will be approved "with light conditions, during the fourth quarter of the year, and then things will get really interesting."

File-Sharing Services Seek Pact With Record Studios (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

At least five online file-sharing companies have started trying to reach an accord with the music industry to convert the free trading of copyrighted music on their networks to paid services, according to several recording industry and file-sharing executives.

The most advanced discussions are between the recording industry and Grokster, a small California company that has been sued by the entertainment industry, recording industry executives said.

Grokster has agreed in principle to be acquired by Mashboxx, a new company backed by Sony that is trying to start a legal file-sharing service, a person involved in the negotiations said. Mashboxx has made overtures to some file-sharing companies including eDonkey, Morpheus and LimeWire, but negotiations are not active, the person said.

The tentative agreement between Grokster and Mashboxx was first reported by The Wall Street Journal. MashBoxx would make a nominal payment for Grokster, but would share future revenue, the person involved in the negotiations said.

"We are looking at a number of acquisitions," said Wayne Rosso, the founder of MashBoxx, "but they have to make sense."

Michael Page, a lawyer for Grokster, did not return calls seeking comment.

Separately, iMesh, a file-sharing service that last year reached an accord with the music industry to convert to a legal paid service, has made overtures to acquire a number of the other file-sharing services, on the condition that they settle their claims with the recording industry, said Robert E. Summer, the executive chairman of iMesh.

"We have initiated discussion with a number of well-known players," Mr. Summer said. He said it was difficult to say which, if any, of those discussions would lead to acquisitions, in part because of the complexity of potential deals with the recording industry.

Mr. Summer declined to say how much money iMesh was offering the other services, but said "I don't think anyone will get rich off these deals." Rather, he thinks that such arrangements offer the owners of those services the ability to avoid litigation.

Such acquisitions, he said, "are good for iMesh and good for the industry." Mr. Summer is the former president of Sony Music International and former president of RCA records. He was hired by the founders of iMesh, which has moved to New York from Israel, to oversee relations with the record industry.

DOJ_NMG_0006576

IMesh has agreements with all the major record labels and plans to introduce its service to consumers "imminently," Mr. Summer said.

Mashboxx announced a deal with Sony in June that would allow Mashboxx to sell Sony's music on its network. The company is in talks with other record labels, Mr. Rosso said. He hopes to introduce a public test of the service in December. He served as president of Grokster from 2001 until 2003 and remains close to Daniel Rung, the California entrepreneur who founded and owns Grokster.

The recording industry was handed more legal leverage in June when the Supreme Court ruled, in MGM v. Grokster, that the owners of file-sharing services can be held liable for contributing to the infringement of copyrights under certain circumstances. The case, which has both Grokster and Streamcast Networks, the owner of Morpheus, as defendants, was sent back to a lower court for further action. Last week, the Recording Industry Association of America sent letters to several file-sharing services, including LimeWire, eDonkey, and BearShare. The letters demanded that the companies stop allowing users to trade copyrighted files and invited them to discuss potential settlements in advance of litigation. A majority of the recipients of those letters have initiated at least preliminary settlement discussions, according to a recording industry executive.

Jenni R. Engebretsen, a spokeswoman for the recording association, confirmed that those letters were sent but declined to discuss any negotiations that have resulted.

Record industry and file-sharing executives say that the recording industry is looking for settlements that resemble its deal with iMesh, which paid $4 million in damages and promised to convert to a paid service that blocked the trading of copyrighted files without the permission of the copyright owner. None of the executives would discuss the amounts that the industry has been asking in the most recent settlement discussions.

"Ever since the Grokster decision, we have been thinking about what our next iteration should be and obviously the letter last week made that process more urgent," said Sam Yagan, the president of MetaMachine, which distributes eDonkey. He said he had talked to both iMesh and MashBoxx but had not decided whether to sell the company, to offer his own legal service, or to continue to fight the record industry.

Mark Gorton, the chief executive of LimeWire, said his company had not decided how to respond to the recording industry's letter. He declined to discuss any prospective acquisition offers. Michael Weiss, the chief executive of StreamCast, declined to comment on potential deals with iMesh or Mashboxx. BearShare executives did not return calls for comment.

While iMesh has taken nearly a year to develop its paid service - allowing free trading of files in the interim - the industry is likely to demand that other services stop free file-trading relatively quickly. That will require complex software development and business negotiations.

File-sharing services allow users to download files from each other's computers. Both iMesh and Mashboxx intend to use technology that examines files being downloaded and compares them with a master list of copyrighted files provided by record companies. If a user tries to download a copyrighted file, the download may simply be blocked or the user may be asked to pay a fee as with services like Apple's iTunes Music Store.

Both iMesh and Mashboxx have developed methods they hope will help lure users accustomed to free music into paying for songs. Mashboxx will allow users to download files free at low quality several times before being forced to pay for the song. Mr. Summer declined to detail iMesh's marketing plan, but music industry executives say it involves offering a long free trial of a subscription service, which allows users to listen to an unlimited number of songs for a fixed monthly fee.

Financier Weighs Visteon's Assets For Parts Venture (WSJ)

By Jeffrey McCracken

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Billionaire Wilbur L. Ross, the New York-based financier who in recent years merged five faltering steel companies to create a steelmaker he later sold for a huge profit, says he has as much as $4.5 billion in capital to bank on his next venture -- buying up troubled auto-parts makers, possibly including unprofitable operations Visteon Corp. is about to jettison.

Mr. Ross's investment group and other funds he is working have already snapped up half the bank debt of automotive supplier Collins & Aikman Corp., which is under Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection, and stakes in smaller suppliers in Europe and Asia. Another potential target he could be interested in includes the 23 plants and other facilities that Visteon is about to transfer back to former parent Ford Motor Co.

DOJ_NMG_0006577

"Our vision is to build a very diverse, very large, very international company, which could include potentially" the parts of Visteon that are going back to Ford, he said in an interview. "My understanding is Ford has not yet closed on that transaction, but yes they are sure the kind of thing we'd look at. Visteon is the kind of company we are looking at," said Mr. Ross.

Visteon and Ford last week announced an agreement under which Ford will take over 17 Visteon plants, plus six offices, research centers and other facilities in the U.S. and Mexico on Oct. 1.

The assets, with combined annual sales of more than $7 billion, by themselves would make up the world's 17th largest auto supplier by sales. Ford, which will have to spend between $450 million and $650 million this year and $300 million to $500 million after that for buyouts of hourly workers, has said it hopes to sell the businesses to investors or new owners.

A Visteon spokesman declined to comment on the company's restructuring plans. A Ford spokesman said he wasn't aware of any talks between Mr. Ross and Ford regarding the Visteon plants and declined to comment further.

Mr. Ross said he is interested in the auto-parts business because it is "fragmented with too many companies that are too dependent on one company. The existing companies aren't global or they aren't global enough because they don't have operations in Eastern Europe or Asia, which are two obvious places you should be," he said.

Mr. Ross, who sold International Steel Group Inc. to Mittal Steel Co. earlier this year, said his group has been evaluating the auto-parts sector as a potential investment for two years. Besides owning 50% of Collins & Aikman's bank debt, his investment group has a 25% stake in the French operations of Oxford Automotive, a Michigan supplier that was recently liquidated.

He said he is also keeping an eye on Delphi Corp., the country's largest auto supplier by revenue, to see how it resolves its three-way talks with former parent General Motors Corp. and the United Auto Workers union. His interest in Delphi was reported Friday by the Detroit Free Press.

Delphi's new chief executive is Robert S. "Steve" Miller. Mr. Miller was running Bethlehem Steel Corp. when Mr. Ross's International Steel purchased the company two years ago. Mr. Miller has threatened to take Delphi into bankruptcy by Oct. 17 unless he can get major concessions from GM and the UAW.

Mr. Ross said he hasn't talked with Mr. Miller about Delphi and feels like the last thing Delphi needs is a third party like his investment group, W.L. Ross & Co., getting involved.

"We would have potential interest in Delphi, but they are involved in complex talks with General Motors and the UAW and the last thing they need is another part. We may be more interested once we see what they can do. I think we will know a lot more by October 17," said Mr. Ross.

He said the capital he has access to is one thing that gives him a significant advantage over other financial players that have tried to make money in the auto-supplier sector. "We are not capital constrained. We have about $4.5 billion in capital equity and our partners also like to co-invest so we have even more," he said.

He said he would also avoid burdening a company's balance sheet with too much debt. He said that was one of the problems that hurt Collins & Aikman, which was built through a series of acquisitions.

"The margins aren't so high at these companies that you can afford to do that," he said.

StarPoint To Buy Acclaim In Joining Of Energy Trusts (WSJ)

By Tamsin Carlisle

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

CALGARY, Alberta -- StarPoint Energy Trust said it agreed to acquire Acclaim Energy Trust in a stock transaction, in an attempt to create one of the biggest entities in Canada's increasingly crowded energy-trust sector, with the financial clout to pursue larger acquisitions.

Under the agreement, StarPoint unitholders would get 53% of the new trust, receiving one unit for each StarPoint unit held. Acclaim unitholders would receive 0.8333 of a new-trust unit for each Acclaim unit held. StarPoint and Acclaim unitholders also would receive shares in a company exploring for oil and natural gas, to be spun off from the combined entity's assets. Based on

DOJ_NMG_0006578

StarPoint's closing share price, Acclaim shareholders would receive equity valued at about 2.28 billion Canadian dollars (US$1.93 billion).

At a news conference, Acclaim President and Chief Executive J. Paul Charron, who has been named to the same post at the combined trust, said he expects the increase in size to give the trust a competitive edge in pursuing acquisitions in a heated international market for oil and natural-gas assets. "We've been looking for U.S. or international transactions since January," he said. "We felt that was where the market was going, and we like to get ahead of the pack."

Acquisitions are the lifeblood of energy trusts. They don't explore for oil and gas, but instead develop mature properties, paying out much of their cash flow from production to unitholders through monthly distributions. With acquisition opportunities in Canada dwindling because the country's energy trusts have already snapped up most of the conventional oil and gas properties that major oil companies have sought to unload, some of the larger Canadian energy trusts are now seeking transactions in the U.S. and overseas.

Assuming unitholders and regulators approve the proposed merger, which is expected to close in early January, the combined entity would seek a listing for its units on the New York Stock Exchange, joining just a handful of Canadian energy trusts interlisted in the U.S. Mr. Charron said he expects that by joining together, the two Calgary companies will increase access to U.S. capital.

On the Toronto Stock Exchange, StarPoint's units closed at C24.84 Canadian dollars, up C$1.74. Acclaim's units closed at C$20.70, up C$1.15.

Norway's Norsk Hydro To Acquire Spinnaker Of U.S. For $2.45 Billion (WSJ/DJN)

By Ian Talley, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

OSLO -- Norsk Hydro ASA said it will acquire Spinnaker Exploration Co., of the U.S., for $2.45 billion (€2 billion), substantially accelerating the Norwegian company's international production growth and making the Gulf of Mexico a future core production area.

Both Norsk Hydro and analysts said the price is high but that the acquisition is necessary if Norsk Hydro is going to increase the low rate at which it replaces reserves. The Norwegian oil, gas, power and aluminum company said it will pay $65.50 a share for Spinnaker, which has oil and gas assets primarily in the Gulf of Mexico.

"The acquisition ... will significantly raise Norsk Hydro's international oil and gas potential," said Norsk Hydro Chief Executive Eivind Reiten.

Spinnaker's stock jumped 32% to $64.19 in afternoon trading yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange. In Oslo, Norsk Hydro rose 1% to 736.50 Norwegian kroner (€94.50).

Norsk Hydro's decision is in line with its strategy and that of larger Norwegian rival Statoil ASA to look beyond the North Sea for new energy reserves as output in the North Sea slows.

Norsk Hydro, which gets most of its oil and gas at home, pumped 539,000 barrels of oil equivalent daily in the second quarter, down from 569,000 barrels a year earlier.

Norsk Hydro's international output should rise 40% from 2005 through 2008, following the purchase, Mr. Reiten said.

"It's expensive, but positive because they needed to become more aggressive," said Lars Marius Furu at Fondsfinans in Oslo.

Spinnaker's proven reserves, the amount it reports to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, amount to 62 million barrels of oil equivalent, divided roughly equally between oil and natural gas.

"The main reason behind the transaction is the great potential in exploration," Mr. Reiten said.

Analysts said that, based on the SEC-reported reserves, the cost of the acquisition is higher than $40 a barrel. Based on expected reserves of 129 million barrels of oil equivalent, Norsk Hydro said the deal's cost is about $19 a barrel.

Norsk Hydro said its long-term oil-price assumption -- a measure used to determine the economic soundness of deals -- is about $35 a barrel, up from its previous price assumption of $25 a barrel.

Microsoft Acquires Alacris To Beef Up Software Security (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0006579

By Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Microsoft Corp. said it bought privately held Alacris Inc., a small maker of software for managing employees' access to corporate computer networks, to help improve the security of Microsoft's programs.

Terms weren't disclosed. Ottawa-based Alacris's software manages smart cards, or plastic cards that store a person's identification data. The purchase is an extension of joint work by the two companies on security software called idNexus for managing smart cards.

Alacris is part of a recent wave of companies that are developing technologies for administrating the electronic "identities" of computer-network users by means such as granting or removing their access. In March, Oracle Corp. bought identity-management software maker Oblix Inc. Other companies in the field include ActivCard Corp. of Fremont, Calif.

By purchasing Alacris, Microsoft intends to make it easier for users of its server software to administer smart cards -- handling tasks such as setting up people with cards and retiring cards when a person leaves a company.

Under increased scrutiny by its customers over the security of its software, Microsoft has bought technologies in the past two years to help it fight Internet-borne attacks such as spyware and viruses.

The Alacris software could complement Microsoft's security plans for Windows Vista, the next version of its operating system, due for release in the second half of next year. Microsoft executives say that Windows Vista will have improved support for smart-card access to computer systems.

Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates has long criticized the use of user names and passwords as an inferior method of securing access to vital corporate computer systems. In response, Microsoft is trying increasingly to promote smart cards and biometric methods -- such as fingerprint readers -- as alternatives to passwords.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

House Bill Would Limit U.S. Power To Protect Species (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - The chairman of the House committee overseeing natural resources introduced a bill Monday that would make it more difficult for the federal government to set aside land it deems crucial to the health of endangered species.

The proposed amendments to the Endangered Species Act also increase the obligation of government agencies to tell landowners quickly if the law limits their development options, and to compensate them.

The measure, which drew quick denunciations from groups like Environmental Defense, Defenders of Wildlife and the Natural Resources Defense Council, was proposed by the House Resources Committee chairman, Representative Richard W. Pombo, Republican of California. It was immediately put on a fast track, which is expected to bring it before the full House early next week.

In a news conference Monday, Mr. Pombo said his legislation "will put the focus on recovery where it should be and will eliminate a lot of the conflicts we have had with private property owners."

The proposal was markedly different from draft legislation circulated earlier this summer, which put even greater restrictions on federal agencies that enforce the law, and which would have automatically taken the law off the books in 2015. The new measure abandons the latter goal but creates new hurdles for federal agencies - chiefly the Fish and Wildlife Service - as they take actions to protect species.

The Endangered Species Act has been a flashpoint for landowners, property-rights advocates and state and local governments, most in the West, who see its provisions as onerous and costly, and chafe at the ability of people not directly involved in a dispute to sue the federal government to ensure compliance with the law.

DOJ_NMG_0006580

At the same time, the law is credited with preventing the extinction of hundreds of species of insects, plants and animals in the past quarter-century, though only a handful of the more than 1,200 listed species have recovered sufficiently to be removed from the list.

Mr. Pombo's first effort to rewrite the law, in the mid 1990's, failed. Since becoming chairman of the committee, he had made this goal a priority.

An important part of the legislation is a provision that allows the Interior Department, the parent agency of the Fish and Wildlife Service, to provide "conservation grants" to property owners who are deemed to be helping conserve an endangered species. The legislation also requires that property owners be paid "fair market value" if, in the view of federal biologists, their development plans would violate the law.

The purpose of the compensation would be "to alleviate the burden of conservation measure imposed on" landowners who forgo their plans in order to help a species' survive.

Chuck Cushman, the executive director American Land Rights Association, praised this approach, saying: "We're getting away from the command-and-control penalty concept. More landowners will feel free to help species and not feel that they're going to lose their land.

Right now, Mr. Cushman added, "there's a fair amount of shoot, shovel and shut up going on," by landowners who would rather break the law and kill an endangered animal than risk facing land-use restrictions.

But Michael Bean, who heads the wildlife protection program at Environmental Defense and was an early proponent of working with landowners, criticized the new measure as a "big step backwards for endangered species conservation." He faulted a new requirement that federal scientists provide, within 90 days, an answer to any landowner's question about whether a planned activity would run afoul of the act by harming an endangered species.

Under the new law, if the government has not answered within 90 days, the landowner can proceed with the plans. Mr. Bean said "there's potentially no limit to the sorts of requests that could be made of" federal biologists "by businesses seeking to develop, build, cut trees."

The Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service, he added, have traditionally been stretched in trying to meet deadlines in the existing law and have frequently failed to do so.

Losers In Eminent Domain Case Face Hefty Fees (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

Seven homeowners in New London, Conn., who narrowly lost a court battle to save their homes from condemnation say the city is still demanding as much as $300,000 in "use and occupancy" fees dating to the November 2000 condemnation order.

They say the demands are being made even though an eviction order from last week has been rescinded. It had been issued by the semi-public New London Development Corp. and had told the homeowners to move out in the next 30 to 90 days and pay $600 a month in rent while they continue to occupy the premises.

An attorney for NLDC, which wants to demolish the homes to make room for private development, had told the homeowners' attorney last year that the city, for which NLDC has acted as an agent, expects to collect the occupancy fees.

"We know your clients did not expect to live in city-owned property for free, or rent out the property and pocket the profits ... for three-and-a-half years and counting ... if they ultimately lose the case," the corporation wrote then.

NLDC "has not retracted that 2004 demand," said Scott Bullock, senior attorney for the Institute for Justice, which represented the homeowners in their losing U.S. Supreme Court battle to prevent the city from using its power of eminent domain to condemn their properties and give them to NLDC.

Asked yesterday whether those large debts are still owed, David Goebel, chief operating officer of NLDC, said, "I can't say what I don't know."

But Ron Angelo, deputy commissioner for the Connecticut Department of Economic and Community Development, yesterday seemed skeptical of whether NLDC would get the money.

"Those use and occupancy fees are still accruing, but accruing and collecting are two different animals," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0006581

The seven-member New London City Council was to vote last night on a motion to express no confidence in NLDC and its top leaders, Mr. Goebel and President Michael Joplin. But such action would not derail the project.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will hold a hearing today on the plight of the New London homeowners. The House Judiciary Committee plans a hearing Thursday.

The homeowners were plaintiffs in the case of Kelo v. City of New London, which the Supreme Court decided on June 23. In its 5-4 ruling, which outraged property rights advocates, the court held that government can seize property from owners and give it to a private developer who promises to use it to create jobs and generate tax revenues.

The houses in the Kelo case are near a 90-acre waterfront site in New London slated for development, intended to bolster a recently opened global research facility belonging to Pfizer Inc., the pharmaceutical giant.

When Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell learned Sept. 12 of debt-warning letters sent out by NLDC, she was "incensed" that she had not been informed in advance and ordered that the letters be rescinded, her spokesman said.

"Governor Rell thought everyone had agreed to a [voluntary] moratorium" she had requested on eminent domain seizures, said Judd Everhart, a spokesman for the governor.

Mrs. Rell "feels the city of New London and NLDC can work their project around these homes, so the tenants are not forced out," Mr. Everhart said.

Some of the homeowners insist they are not leaving. They include Wilhelmina and Charles Dery, who live in a house that has been in Mrs. Dery's family for 100 years; she was born there in 1918.

NLDC has held title to the 13 homes involved in the legal dispute since November 2000. The compensation paid for those properties was put into an escrow account while the courtroom battles raged.

Alaska Natives Offer A Herd Of Reasons To Block Oil Drilling (WP)

By Vanessa De La Torre

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Solar-powered loudspeakers on a cloudy afternoon is about all the defense Sarah James can muster these days against the threat of government, oil companies and what she calls "cultural genocide" if they have their way.

A protest banner sways in the wind, gently imploring museum-goers, businesspeople, anyone hustling to the Capitol, to slow down for a moment and "Save Gwich'in Way of Life." The words are thickly markered in black and red; drooping toward them is a turquoise flower with a sad face. "Our culture is not for sale to balance national budget," James wrote in small bold letters.

As a Gwich'in elder, James has spent nearly two decades fighting off proposed oil drilling in her Alaskan homeland. Now comes her toughest battle yet: Congress is set to pass a budget bill that includes a provision allowing for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Some environmental groups argue that a limited oil supply in the Arctic's coastal plains won't ease U.S. dependence on foreign oil, or prices at the gas pump post-Katrina, and that development would damage one of the Earth's last untouched lands.

The Gwich'in (pronounced GOO-chin), a nation of 8,000 Native Americans who subsist on roaming caribou in the North Slope, see the prospect of drilling as a sure sign of their own demise.

On this particular afternoon, the Gwich'in protest was in its third week (out of six) in a small park opposite the entrance of the National Museum of the American Indian, some days to little notice.

"Gwich'in?" muses a middle-aged woman, squinting at the banner from Independence Avenue. "I don't know what that is." She decides not to find out. Later, a dapper man, Bogdan Wojciechowski, strolls to the modest Gwich'in table and observes for a moment. "Jay! Come over here so you can learn something."

"No thank you, Dad, no thank you," replies the grade-schooler. (However, a caribou bone ultimately intrigues him.)

James, 61, of Arctic Village, has been trying to inform the public of her native land since 1988, when proposed refuge drilling first threatened the Porcupine caribou herd and the Gwich'in way of life. Eight battles and no losses later, she says, "We must be doing something right." The closest bout came in 1995, when Congress passed a bill that allowed drilling; President Clinton vetoed it after pressure from environmentalists.

DOJ_NMG_0006582

The environmental types return in the ninth showdown, says James, and "they're doing the fight as we are. But their interest is recreation, scenic, protecting animals. Us, it's our life."

The protest allows James to preach about her homeland, Vadzaih googii vi dehk'it gwanlii . "It means 'Sacred Place Where Life Begins' . . . It's not a thing of the past," she says. "It's alive, it's not in a book only." She sits on a metal folding chair, tapping a native drum, her right knee bouncing in rhythm.

"We have to live there for thousands of years . . . so we want to keep it that way. The Gwich'in people are a caribou people. It's our food, tools, clothing. It's our shelter. We have a song called 'The Caribou Skin Hut Dance.' "

A man with two kids passes the table that has a photo album, buckskin jacket, a pair of ceremonial gloves with beaver fur and beaded flowers. A blond girl lingers; she gets tugged toward the museum.

Kelvin Long, 29, a Navajo leader from Flagstaff, Ariz., follows James to the mike. He is one of the few volunteers who have traveled to Washington for the vigil, and says he is here out of solidarity and in recognition that the Arctic refuge is sacred. "It's a place where you can still drink out of the rivers -- good, clean water," he begins. "So tell Congress it's not okay, tell them no.

"Come to our little table, our humble little table. Come take a stand with us, fight the big fight with us. . . . After you go into the museum and learn about native culture, come here and find out what's going on with native people right now."

Then Long breaks into song about the Navajo "red path" and walking that path in beauty, over the beeping of a garbage truck. James sits on a white Igloo cooler, humming along while stapling protest handouts.

"Today's a little bit slow," Long acknowledges later. A security guard lounging on a park bench, smoking a cigarette, waved people toward the table. One tourist from Florida, 71-year-old Barbara Gerber, took a pamphlet and ranted at the Bush administration. "They can't stand it that there might be a place that hasn't been drilled yet," she fumed.

Others say, "Good luck on that," and every couple of hours a person might offer a dollar along with: "I'm with you a hundred percent. One hundred percent." An Alaskan family offers to call their state legislators, wink-wink, and James gets the joke. Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski are among the staunchest supporters of drilling in the refuge.

By 3:30 p.m., the donation vase contains $25. It clearly won't fly in another Gwich'in from the Arctic, but will reimburse Long for the McDonald's chicken sandwiches he bought for their lunch. One visitor, smiling, flashed a Sacagawea dollar before plunking it in.

The biggest crowds tend to come in the evening, says Long, reclining in a lawn chair. On most days, they hold the vigil till 6 p.m., just after the NMAI closes and a steady flow of tourists shuffle out. "I definitely wish more people would stop by," he notes. But Long, with kind eyes and a calm bearing, says he understands. "A lot of people in the museum are on a schedule."

At one point, museum volunteer Donna Brandes wanders by. She explains her native lineage, chats a while. Long informs her of the "Don't Drill, Storm Capitol Hill!" rally planned for today, which organizers from the Arctic Refuge Action coalition hope will attract tens of thousands of people.

"So, you think this will pay off," says Brandes, speaking of the pamphlets, of the native drums, of James making business calls on a park bench. Long is quiet. "Nothing stops this administration," Brandes says.

James gives another go at the microphone. "It's charged by solar panels," she reminds passersby, because that is how the Gwich'in live. But her words meet static as the battery powering the sound system loses its juice. Overcast sky. "Solar energy is clean energy. We need to learn how to use less oil ."

James pauses; her voice is no longer amplified. "I think I have to recharge batteries, so stay put and I'll be back!" And so people milled around, as the vigil drummed on.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds: Internet Drugs Ring Cracked (PHDN)

By Jim Smith

Philadelphia Daily News, September 20, 2005

Dr. Akhil Bansal was one of 17 people indicted by a federal grand jury in Philadelphia last April for allegedly taking part in "an international conspiracy to import and distribute" prescription drugs, using the Internet.

Five additional defendants were charged in a "related indictment" in New York.

The major charges in the Philadelphia case include conspiracy to distribute and import controlled substances, operating a continuing criminal enterprise, and conspiracy to commit money laundering.

Federal authorities seized more than $6 million from defendants' accounts in foreign and U.S. bank accounts.

"This case shows us how the Internet has opened the door to an unregulated universe from which anyone with access to a computer can purchase anything from anti-anxiety drugs to anabolic steroids," said U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan, the Philadelphia-area's top federal lawman, when the cases were made public.

Authorities contend that the drugs were smuggled into the United States from India.

"The Web site owners do not require any prescription for the purchase of these drugs, which is contrary to law.

"The drugs are manufactured abroad, do not bear required labels and warnings, and are being imported without Customs declarations or payment of duty," said Christine Konieczny, a Lower Merion police officer assigned to a DEA Task Force.

Bansal, his father, Dr. Brij Bansal; a sister, Julie Agarwal; and her husband, Yatindra Agarwal, were charged with shipping medicines manufactured in India to Internet pharmacies' customers in the United States.

The other relatives are all in India.

Congress To Probe Orioles' Palmeiro (AP)

AP, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON Sep 19, 2005 — Congressional investigators looking into whether Rafael Palmeiro lied under oath are interviewing players who know him, including a Colorado outfielder suspended this year for steroids, The Associated Press has learned.

Palmeiro testified to the House Government Reform Committee in March that he never had used steroids. The Baltimore Orioles slugger, one of four players in history with 3,000 hits and 500 homers, was suspended by Major League Baseball for 10 days in August for failing a drug test.

A congressional source familiar with the committee's work, speaking to the AP on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said Monday that "several active players" have spoken or will speak with the committee. That source would not identify who was interviewed.

But a baseball source, also speaking to the AP on condition of anonymity because the inquiry is ongoing, said Colorado Rockies outfielder Jorge Piedra spoke on the phone with the committee within the last week.

Piedra, who has trained with Palmeiro in the offseason, was suspended for 10 days in April for a positive steroid test, the second player to be publicly identified under the sport's new rules.

The congressional source indicated that all the players asked to talk to the committee recently were chosen because they have relationships with Palmeiro such as teammates or workout partners and could have knowledge about whether he might have used steroids before his testimony.

On March 17, Palmeiro appeared before the Government Reform Committee alongside Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa, pointed his finger for emphasis and declared: "I have never used steroids. Period."

On Aug. 1, baseball announced his suspension. Palmeiro stood by his statements to Congress, saying he didn't know what caused the test result.

When he returned to the Orioles after his ban, Palmeiro said he would not speak about the case until Congress concludes its perjury investigation.

He had just two hits in 26 at-bats after returning and was booed by spectators at Baltimore and on the road. Palmeiro hasn't played since going home to Texas early this month to rehabilitate knee and ankle injuries.

Afghan Heroin Tied To Terror (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

Washington Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Insurgents and foreign terrorists in Iraq are being financed in part by the illicit drug trade originating in Afghanistan and passing through Iraq to Europe, congressional and defense sources say.

Money from Afghan-produced heroin is being used by terror cells to buy weapons and equipment, and pay Iraqi citizens to conduct attacks on U.S. troops and to plant deadly improvised explosive devices (IEDs), U.S. officials say.

In a Sept. 8 letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde wrote of an "emerging and dangerous growth of the illicit drug trade in Iraq, especially with heroin, now originating and pouring out of nearby Afghanistan."

"We can no longer ignore the threat to our national security from drugs in Iraq," the Illinois Republican said in the letter, obtained by The Washington Times.

A senior military official, who spent more than a year in Baghdad's green zone, which houses the U.S. Embassy, said Iraqi intelligence has documented drug routes that cut through Iran, into Iraq and then to Europe via Turkey. The official said some of the heroin cash goes to insurgents.

Andre Hollis, the Pentagon's top counternarcotics official in President Bush's first term, said there is growing evidence that the insurgents are buying and selling heroin for profit.

"Iraq has become a transit route for drugs, which are sold in both Europe and in Iraq and are used to further destabilize Iraq by funding anti-coalition militant activities in Iraq," Mr. Hollis said in an interview.

He said Iran's hard-line Islamic regime, which opposes the U.S. presence in Iraq, is permitting heroin to cross its territory.

"Iran doesn't want the drugs to stop in Iran," Mr. Hollis said. "They don't care if they end up in Europe or stay in Iraq."

A U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad said he had no immediate comment on any heroin-terror link in Iraq.

Mr. Hyde urged Miss Rice to find $100,000 to fund a study of Iraq's illegal-drug networks by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

Adam Ereli, a State Department spokesman, stopped short of endorsing a study, but added, "We support and are prepared to work with the United Nations to assess Iraq's vulnerabilities and see what we can do to prevent this from being a problem."

Mr. Hyde's letter referred to the seizure earlier this month of 44 pounds of Afghan-produced heroin in the Shi'ite city of Karbala. Last year, The Washington Times quoted a Polish general in charge in southern Iraq as saying his troops seized bags of heroin during various raids in the same area.

To anti-drug advocates, such as Mr. Hyde, the Karbala seizure put the spotlight on the terror-drug connection in Iraq, just like the seizure of two drug boats in the Arabian Sea last year highlighted the al Qaeda connection in Afghanistan. The U.S. Navy said at the time that the boats were manned by al Qaeda-linked traffickers.

Congressional and defense sources say the military downplays the al Qaeda-heroin link because it does not want Congress to push the Pentagon into the counternarcotics mission. It views such work as law enforcement, not war-fighting.

The Washington Times has obtained photographs taken by American special-operations forces of bags of opium gum seized on raids of al Qaeda and Taliban hide-outs in Afghanistan.

"We know that illicit drugs fuel and finance terrorism in Afghanistan, where the opium and heroin in the region originates," Mr. Hyde said in his letter to Miss Rice. "It passes out through terrorist-controlled areas, is taxed by them, and helps finance and arm our terrorists enemies."

The U.N. drug office last did an Iraq survey two years ago, which reported that "Iraq's porous borders, an established culture of smuggling, combined with its geographic location ... suggests the strong possibility of growth in drug trafficking."

Mr. Hyde said he wants to a new U.N. study "to be especially focused on its potential impact in financing insurgent terrorists and their networks."

Drug Trial To Begin For Former Haitian Anti-narcotics Chief (BRAH)

By Curt Anderson

The Bradenton Herald, September 20, 2005

MIAMI - A top Haitian police official in the government of ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide is facing trial on charges that he accepted thousands of dollars in bribes to help Colombian drug lords move huge loads of cocaine through the impoverished Caribbean country.

DOJ_NMG_0006585

Jury selection is scheduled to begin later this week in the case against Evintz Brillant, the only one of four former senior Haitian police officials who has not pleaded guilty in the investigation of drug trafficking inside the Aristide government.

The three who pleaded guilty are expected to cooperate in the U.S. government's against Brillant, who has pleaded innocent and faces a life sentence if convicted. The trial's scheduled Monday start before U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke was delayed a few days by the approach of Tropical Storm Rita.

According the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Brillant used his post as head of Haiti's top anti-drug police unit from 2001 to 2004 to help drug traffickers ship thousands of pounds of cocaine through Haiti, including the airport in the capital of Port-au-Prince, to the United States, Europe and elsewhere.

Brillant and other top Haitian police officials, DEA Agent Noble Harrison said in a court affidavit, "agreed to look the other way when shipments of cocaine were in transit" in exchange for bribes, some of which he used to pay lower-level police officers to provide security and protection for the drugs.

On occasion, Brillant "stopped and arrested drug traffickers for the purpose of receiving payments and bribes," prosecutors said in court papers.

The investigation has produced no evidence implicating Aristide, even though some convicted drug dealers have insisted that the former president was intimately involved in trafficking through Haiti. Aristide was ousted in February 2004 and is now living in exile in South Africa.

"There was never any evidence and there remains no evidence of it," said attorney Ira Kurzban, who represents Aristide in Miami. "They've been trying for two years. There is no case."

Brillant is specifically accused by U.S. prosecutors of being involved in the drug network controlled by convicted Haitian drug trafficker Sergo Edouard. Brillant was paid $10,000 in one instance for agreeing to protect drug shipments and got a share of $150,000 from another trafficker to provide similar security.

Although the Haitian police arrests were trumpeted as a major success in the war on drugs by the Bush administration, a U.S. State Department report issued earlier this year says that the flow of Colombian cocaine and other drugs through Haiti continues virtually unchallenged.

The report says that Haiti, with its 1,125 miles of virtually wide open coastline, clandestine airstrips, uncontrolled seaports and police corruption make it difficult for the Haitian government to stop the drug trade.

"Haitian drug trafficking organizations continue to operate with relative impunity," says the March report. "Haiti remains an important transit country for Colombian drug traffickers."

Freighters are most often used to transport the drugs directly from Haiti to the United States, concealed in shipments of legitimate items such as cement or in hidden compartments. Aircraft are also used, and some drugs are driven over the border with the Dominican Republic to be sent to Puerto Rico and elsewhere, the report says.

The other Haitian police officials who have pleaded guilty are Jean Nesly Lucien, the former national police director; Rudy Therassan, a former commander with the police; and Romaine Lestin, former police chief at the Port-au-Prince airport.

Therassan was sentenced in July to 15 years in prison, while Lucien and Lestin are scheduled for sentencing in November.

194 Youths Arrested In Crackdown On Violence (TUCCIT)

By DAVID L. TEIBEL and HEIDI ROWLEY, Tucson Citizen

Tucson Citizen, September 20, 2005

Tucson police made 356 arrests over the summer in specialized efforts to reduce the number of juveniles involved in crimes and to put a cap on a rash of murders.

Of that number, 194 of those arrested were juveniles while the rest were adults.

Operations Division South Capt. Perry Tarrant said the summer youth deployment, which lasted from May 27 to Aug. 20, was funded by a grant from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and a private grant from Kino Weed and Seed.

On July 28, police and ATF agents expanded the program to target adult troublemakers after there were four homicides in three days: one on July 23, one on the 24th and two on the 25th, said Assistant police Chief Kathleen Robinson.

DOJ_NMG_0006586

The expanded special patrols had officers looking for such things as illegal gatherings in business parking lots, rowdy gatherings and drinking in public, considered precursors to killings. The patrols went on until Sept. 10, Robinson said.

From July 28 to Sept. 10 there were no homicides in the South Side patrol area, said Sgt. Kerry Fuller, a police spokeswoman. During the same period last year there were two, she said.

Citywide there have been 33 homicides this year. There were 38 by this time last year, Fuller said Friday afternoon.

Tarrant said the ATF grant provided for increased enforcement in the South Side patrol division, which covers Tucson south of 22nd Street.

Tarrant said officers focused on getting guns off the street.

In all, 166 weapons, including handguns, rifles and shotguns, were seized.

Thirty-eight firearms cases are ready for prosecution as a result of the deployments, officials said.

Tarrant said that overall, "We had the impact we were looking for."

Robinson said the department will continue violence reduction patrols throughout the year.

Federal Judge Rules That Marshals Service Must Release Photos Of Defendants (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, September 20, 2005

DETROIT (AP) -- A federal judge has ruled that the U.S. Marshals Service must comply with media requests for photos of criminal defendants, but said it can take up to 20 days to process the requests under the Federal Freedom of Information Act.

The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor also said that the requests may be processed through the Marshals Service headquarters in Washington, rather than through its office in Detroit, the Free Press reported in a story on its Web site Monday.

The newspaper had asked in its lawsuit that the photos be provided through the Detroit office. Pictures previously requested in Detroit usually were provided the same day.

The Free Press and the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal sued the Marshals Service earlier this year after it stopped providing the photos on the grounds that it would invade the privacy of defendants.

Diggs Taylor also granted a Free Press request that the government pay its legal fees in the suit. Herschel Fink, an attorney for the newspaper, said he didn't know how much it would cost.

Deadly Rig Blast May Have Been Criminal (NYPOST/AP)

The New York Post, September 20, 2005

INDEPENDENCE, Kan. (AP) -- Evidence of possible criminal activity has been found in a natural gas drilling rig explosion that killed two workers and injured a third, authorities said Monday.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Kansas State Fire Marshal's office and the Montgomery County Sheriff's Department are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and conviction in the June 2 explosion.

"If this tragedy was the result of a deliberate criminal act, we will not rest until whoever is responsible was brought to justice," Sheriff Stan Veach said in a statement announcing the reward.

Paul Marquardt, an ATF spokesman in Kansas City, Mo., would not discuss the evidence in detail.

The rig belonged to McPherson Drilling of Cherryvale. Shortly after the explosion, one of the owners of the company noted the unusual nature of the blast.

"You could tell the way the pipe blew that something inside the pipe blew out instead of up," Nancy McPherson said on the day of the explosion. "My husband says he has never seen anything like this before."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Nominee's Credentials Questioned (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Spencer S. Hsu

DOJ_NMG_0006587

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The Bush administration is seeking to appoint a lawyer with little immigration or customs experience to head the troubled law enforcement agency that handles those issues, prompting sharp criticism from some employee groups, immigration advocates and homeland security experts.

The push to appoint Julie Myers to head the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, part of the Department of Homeland Security, comes in the midst of intense debate over the qualifications of department political appointees involved in the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina.

Concerns over Myers, 36, were acute enough at a Senate hearing last week that lawmakers asked the nominee to detail during her testimony her postings and to account for her management experience. Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) went so far as to tell Myers that her résumé indicates she is not qualified for the job.

But Voinovich has since met with Myers and is now likely to support her, his spokeswoman said yesterday. Myers, who has attracted strong support from many former colleagues, told senators that she would draw upon the experiences of ICE veterans in running the agency.

"I realize that I'm not 80 years old," Myers testified. "I have a few gray hairs, more coming, but I will seek to work with those who are knowledgeable in this area, who know more than I do."

After working as a federal prosecutor in Brooklyn, N.Y., for two years, Myers held a variety of jobs over the past four years at the White House and at the departments of Commerce, Justice and Treasury, though none involved managing a large bureaucracy. Myers worked briefly as chief of staff to Michael Chertoff when he led the Justice Department's criminal division before he became Homeland Security secretary.

Myers also was an associate under independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr for about 16 months and has most recently served as a special assistant to President Bush handling personnel issues.

Her uncle is Air Force Gen. Richard B. Myers, the departing chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. She married Chertoff's current chief of staff, John F. Wood, on Saturday.

In written answers to questions from Congress, Myers highlighted her year-long job as assistant secretary for export enforcement at Commerce, where she said she supervised 170 employees and a $25 million budget. ICE has more than 20,000 employees and a budget of approximately $4 billion. Its personnel investigate immigrant, drug and weapon smuggling, and illegal exports, among other responsibilities.

Myers was on her honeymoon and was not available to comment yesterday. Erin Healy, a White House spokeswoman, cited Myers's work with customs agents on money-laundering and drug-smuggling cases. "She's well-known and respected throughout the law enforcement community," Healy said. "She has a proven track record as an effective manager."

ICE was created from remnants of the former immigration and customs services. It is widely viewed as one of the most troubled parts of the sprawling Department of Homeland Security.

Homeland Security political appointees have come under scrutiny since Michael D. Brown resigned under fire this month as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which he joined with no experience in disaster preparedness. Several other senior FEMA officials were Bush supporters who did not have crisis-management credentials.

Unlike most political appointments, the head of ICE is required by statute to have at least five years of experience in both law enforcement and management.

Many immigration advocates, ICE employee representatives and homeland security experts said they were troubled by the nomination of Myers to take over an agency with so many problems.

"It appears she's got a tremendous amount of experience in money laundering, in banking and the financial areas," said Charles Showalter, president of the National Homeland Security Council, a union that represents 7,800 ICE agents, officers and support staff. "My question is: Who the hell is going to enforce the immigration laws?"

I. Michael Greenberger, a former Clinton administration official who heads the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland, said the Myers appointment represents "pre-Katrina thinking, where political relationships were a very large factor."

"Post-Katrina, we now see that people need to be eminently qualified," Greenberger said.

But Jim Pasco, executive director of the Fraternal Order of Police, which represents several thousand ICE employees, lauded Myers's government experience.

"That organization . . . is on some days almost dysfunctional," Pasco said. "I think Julie may be just the person to pull people and functions together to get them working right for a change."

During a hearing Thursday of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and ranking Democrat Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) quizzed Myers on whether her positions over the past five years qualified her for the job.

The most pointed questioning came from Voinovich, who said during the hearing that he wanted to meet with Chertoff to discuss Myers's qualifications. "I'd really like to have him spend some time with us, telling us personally why he thinks you're qualified for the job, because based on the résumé, I don't think you are," Voinovich said.

But Marcie Ridgway, Voinovich's communications director, said yesterday that the Ohio senator had resolved his concerns by talking privately with both Chertoff and Myers. Ridgway said Voinovich was not available to speak directly about the issue.

DeLay Must Bridge Gap With Bush (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 20, 2005

The White House outlined a comprehensive immigration overhaul during a meeting last week with congressional Republicans, creating a potential conflict between the administration and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), who favors an incremental approach to reform.

The comprehensive package would increase enforcement on the border, create new workplace requirements for employers and expand guest-worker programs inside and outside the United States, said Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who met last week with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and other senior administration officials.

Flake said the administration "insists on comprehensive reform," putting the president at odds with DeLay and those congressional Republicans who would rather change the current immigration code one law at a time. As recently as last week, DeLay said he would prefer passing a bill to increase border security before taking up legislation to address workplace enforcement or the current guest-worker program.

In the House, GOP leaders must try to find legislative language agreeable to those members advocating stronger border protections and those members pushing for an expansion of the country's guest-worker program, although there is considerable overlap.

"We're closer than people think," Flake said of the distance between competing factions within the Republican Conference. "The gulf is not as wide as people assume."

The guest-worker provisions in the White House package would require illegal immigrants employed in the United States to register with the federal government as part of a national database for employers of all sizes. Those workers would then be allowed to stay in the country for an intermediate phase as long as they remained employed.

Flake and Kolbe included a similar provision in the comprehensive immigration bill they co-wrote with Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) and Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.). Their bill would allow these workers to register for two successive three-year terms, during which they would have temporary guest-worker status and could apply for permanent residency.

In contrast, the administration plan would require these workers to return to their countries of origin after the intermediate work phase to register for permanent residency, Kolbe said.

In the Senate, John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) have introduced a bill that would require illegal immigrants employed in the United States to return to their countries of origin before applying for permanent residency or guest-worker status.

Similar legislation is expected in the House, where Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), whose committee will mark up the eventual legislation, told the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel last week that he expected Hurricane Katrina to postpone any bill overhauling the country's immigration policy until next year.

DOJ_NMG_0006589

Neither Flake nor Kolbe would give any details about when the administration would want to see Congress pass an immigration measure, but both members said they were confident the House could tackle legislation this year.

During a Republican Conference meeting the last week in July, President Bush told members that he wanted Congress to address immigration reform "next fall," prompting one member to shout: "We can't wait until next fall."

Bush then clarified his remarks to say he meant this fall, Flake said.

Immigration continues to be a particularly controversial issue for congressional Republicans. Flake and Kolbe both faced primary opponents last year who attacked them for advocating an expanded guest-worker program. Kolbe's challenger, state Rep. Randy Graf, has again made immigration the cornerstone of his campaign to unseat the senior member of the Arizona delegation. Graf won 43 percent of the Republican vote during last year's primary. His website features a Ronald Reagan quote about immigration: "A nation without borders is not a nation."

Flake argues that comprehensive changes to immigration policy are the best way to handle this issue politically because such a strategy would address concerns from every side of the political spectrum.

"If it's comprehensive reform … then that covers the basics for all of us, no matter what districts we're from," Flake said. In contrast, passing one component at a time would be a "recipe for disaster," he said.

A coalition of labor unions, civil-rights organizations and religious groups, including the newly independent Service Employees International Union, has scheduled a series of rallies beginning today at Foundry United Methodist Church in Washington in support of the Flake-Kolbe bill.

TAX:

American `Survivor' Winner Pleads Innocent To Tax Evasion (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 20, 2005

(AP) - PROVIDENCE, Rhode Island-Richard Hatch, who won $1 million (â,¬820,000) on the first season of the U.S. reality show "Survivor," pleaded innocent Monday to charges that he failed to pay taxes on his winnings and other income.

Hatch has been charged with tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. He entered the plea in U.S. District Court.

A grand jury indictment filed earlier this month said Hatch filed false tax returns for 2000 and 2001 that omitted his income from the CBS show, $327,000 (â,¬269,380) he was paid to co-host a radio show and $28,000 (â,¬23,070) in rent on a property he owns.

Hatch, 44, also was accused of misusing $36,500 (â,¬30,070) from a nonprofit camp he set up.

The former corporate trainer said the 10-count indictment was retribution for his refusal earlier this year to follow through with a plea deal.

"It was absurd in the spring, and it's still absurd," he said. "They thought I was going to accept two years in jail for something I didn't do."

Hatch faces a maximum of 75 years in prison if found guilty on all charges. He also could face millions of dollars (euros) in fines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Right Rift Over Roberts (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 20, 2005

A rift has opened between conservatives in the nation's capital and those outside the Washington Beltway over John Roberts and his carefully worded testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week.

DOJ_NMG_0006590

The split has divided those on the right who communicate regularly with the White House from conservative activists whose view of Roberts was shaped by the recently completed hearings.

Though it is extremely unlikely that conservatives who are voicing concerns about Roberts behind the scenes would oppose his confirmation by the Senate, they are sending a message to President Bush that his next nominee to the Supreme Court should have a clear record and be unafraid to express boldly his or her beliefs.

As result, political pressure is growing on Bush to nominate an outspoken conservative to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

So far, Republicans and conservatives have presented to the public unified enthusiasm for Roberts. But since the first round of questions of last week's hearings, conservatives have raised concerns behind the scenes, debating each other in private conversations and conference calls.

"I'm definitely one who has major concerns about the Roberts nomination," said Dr. Virginia Armstrong, the national chairwoman of Eagle Forum's Court Watch Project. "I had questions before the hearing. Since the hearing, those questions and concerns are much more intense than they were."

"The biggest question is what is this man's approach to the Constitution, and we were never told that," said Armstrong, who said she debated Roberts's testimony with fellow conservatives yesterday. "We were told he did not have an overarching philosophy."

She said that Roberts's answers last week indicated that he would follow Supreme Court precedent even if he thought it was not necessarily supported by the text of the Constitution.

For example, Roberts said that, when considering overturning precedent, "it is not enough that you may think the prior decision was wrongly decided."

"You do look at these other factors, like settled expectations, like the legitimacy of the court, whether a particular precedent is workable or not, whether a precedent has been eroded by subsequent developments," he said.

To some conservatives, concepts such as "workability" are alarming because they are considered vacuous and can be infused with a judge's personal views. In essence, such concepts are the building blocks of judicial activism.

Armstrong, who has a doctorate in political science and doesn't consider herself a political operative, is based in Texas. Her foils in recent debates have been conservatives based in Washington, D.C., who have more frequent contact with White House emissaries and Roberts's former colleagues who vouch for the nominee's conservative credentials in the absence of an extensive record.

Ironically, the aspects of Roberts's nomination that have frustrated Senate Democrats and liberal groups trying to inflict political damage on him — specifically the few writings expressing his legal views, and furthermore the reluctance to express those views in Senate hearings — have also frustrated conservatives.

"After four days of testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, there is much that we know about Judge John Roberts and yet much that we still do not know," said Dr. Rick Scarborough, president of Vision America, a Texas-based Judeo-Christian advocacy group.

"We do know that Judge Roberts says he will perform the proper duties of a judge, which is to apply the laws of the land according to the intent of the drafters, and will not legislate from the bench," he said in a statement given to The Hill that praised Roberts for being well spoken and intelligent.

But Scarborough also raised concerns: "We don't know whether he recognizes that the judiciary is subject to checks and balances by the other branches of government. We don't know whether he believes that the Roe v. Wade abortion decision was wrongly decided and should be overruled, or whether the court's homosexual 'rights' cases were wrongly decided and should be overruled."

"In short, we don't know whether a Chief Justice Roberts would be more like Justice Scalia, who is regularly faithful to the Constitution, or like Justice Souter, who regularly betrays the Constitution," he said.

But questions among conservatives have not been confined strictly to those from outside the Beltway.

"I think there is some disappointment in the way that Roberts testified," said an aide to a Republican member of the Judiciary Committee, who noted that the disappointment is not so great that GOP senators would vote against Roberts.

DOJ_NMG_0006591

"In general, people thought that he could answer the question of whether he is a conservative," the aide said.

Aside from Roberts's decision not to endorse conservative views in the hearing, some answers that seemed intended to defuse Democratic criticism have alarmed conservatives.

In particular, responding to Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) during the first round of questioning, Roberts said that he agreed with the Supreme Court's conclusion in Griswold v. Connecticut that marital privacy extends to contraception and its availability.

Roberts noted — seemingly approvingly — that the court has since grounded the right to privacy in the 14th Amendment. The statement created a firestorm among conservatives, which Roberts's handlers scrambled to quell.

Griswold and privacy are hot topics because the court has founded reproductive rights, including the right to an abortion, on the right to privacy that case helped establish.

"Once people understood and looked at the judge's answers and his comments, everyone was comfortable," said former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie, who is overseeing the Senate confirmation for the White House.

Roberts's defenders noted that Roberts's discussion of Griswold was nearly identical to Justice Clarence Thomas's during his confirmation 14 years earlier.

Other D.C.-based conservative leaders have praised Roberts's Senate testimony.

"I think that Roberts was masterful, and he is also a solid conservative," said Manuel Miranda, who formerly handled strategy on judicial nominations for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

Miranda rebutted conservatives who have criticized Roberts avowed respect for precedent.

"His answers on precedent show that he is not like Robert Bork, he is like Rehnquist," Miranda said. "Some people believe nothing overrides the written word of the Constitution, but the rule of stability in law, which is stare decisis, is part of the fabric of the Constitution because undoubtedly the Framers' primary intent was to signal a stable and written law to the people."

Specter Backs U.S. Chief Justice Nominee Roberts (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 20, 2005

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said on Monday he will vote for John Roberts to be U.S. chief justice even though it is uncertain what the conservative appeals court judge will do on the Supreme Court.

"It's my judgment that he's well qualified ... and I intend to vote aye when his nomination is called before the Senate," the Republican chairman, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said in a Senate speech.

"Notwithstanding his answers and my efforts to glean some hint or realistic expectation from his words and body language, candidly it is not possible to predict or have a solid expectation of what Judge Roberts would do," Specter said.

The committee chairman had been expected to back Roberts, who seems headed toward confirmation by the full Republican-led Senate before the court begins its new term on October 3.

But Specter, a moderate, had withheld judgment until four days of hearings he led ended last week.

If confirmed, Roberts, 50, who has spent two years on the appeals bench, would be the youngest chief justice in two centuries and positioned to lead the court for decades. Some Democrats, citing documents stemming from his government work, have challenged his commitment to civil rights and women's rights.

All 55 Senate Republicans are expected to vote to confirm Roberts, and so are a large number of the 45-member Senate Democratic Caucus.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid intends to discuss President George W. Bush's first nomination to the Supreme Court at his party's weekly meeting on Tuesday.

While some liberal groups would like Democrats to send a message to Bush with a strong vote against Roberts, Reid "wants each member to vote his or her conscience," a party aide said.

TOUGHER FIGHT NEXT TIME

Easing Roberts' path toward confirmation is the belief he would not shift the balance of power on the nine-member court. He would succeed the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who had been the court's conservative anchor for three decades.

DOJ_NMG_0006592

A tougher fight is expected over Bush's next nominee, who would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who has often been the court's swing vote.

With that nomination expected shortly, Bush was to meet on Wednesday with Specter and his Democratic counterpart on the Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, as well as Reid and Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Specter hailed the "impeccable credentials" of Roberts, who received the American Bar Association's top rating for a seat on the Supreme Court.

While Democrats voiced frustration that Roberts refused to answer many specific legal questions, on issues from gender bias to abortion, Specter said, "I think that Judge Roberts went about as far as he could." Roberts said he did not want to prejudge cases that might come before him.

Specter also noted that Roberts, while declining to say whether he would reverse the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, declared that the U.S. Constitution gives Americans the right to privacy, which underpinned the 1973 ruling.

Specter, a veteran of many Supreme Court confirmation hearings, also pointed out that Roberts embraced the importance of legal precedent.

The Judiciary Committee is to vote on Thursday on its recommendation on Roberts to the full Senate, which is to vote on whether to confirm him during the week of September 26.

Roberts Seen As The Warm-Up In High Court Battle (LAW)

By Jeff Blumenthal, The Legal Intelligencer

Law.com, September 20, 2005

With U.S. Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter announcing his support Monday, the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States gained momentum.

The Pennsylvania Republican, in a speech on the Senate floor, said "Judge Roberts' answers demonstrated that he would take a fair, non-ideological approach to the law." In Specter's view, Roberts had not tipped his hand on whether he would vote to preserve or overturn Supreme Court precedent on a woman's right to end her pregnancy.

"Notwithstanding his answers and my efforts to glean some realistic expectation from his words and body language, candidly it is not possible to predict or have a solid expectation of what Judge Roberts would do," he said.

On Sunday, Specter -- who chaired last week's sometimes contentious confirmation hearings to generally positive reviews -- even suggested that Roberts serve as the template for President Bush's next nomination to the Supreme Court.

But local legal scholars said Bush faces a much tougher fight when he makes his choice for a new associate justice.

Gregory Magarian, a constitutional law professor at Villanova University School of Law and a former clerk for Justice John Paul Stevens, said Specter managed to run Roberts' hearing equitably.

"Sen. Specter attempted to go after information but he didn't grandstand and he definitely didn't grease the wheels for him," Magarian said.

But Magarian and Temple University's Beasley School of Law professor Mark Rahdert, a clerk for former Justice Harry A. Blackmun, both said Roberts' decision to not answer questions dealing with hot-button issues such as abortion could set a precedent for the next nominee.

"He played that card more than any candidate I have seen in recent memory," Rahdert said. "And each time that happens in the future, nominees will have more room to not answer questions. It's one thing if it's an actual case that will wind up before the court. But he can answer questions about an area of the law and he chose not to do so.

"I think Sen. Specter did a good job. The Democrats complained that Roberts was not answering questions and they were not given access to certain documents. But it was a very orderly hearing."

Magarian, though, said by not answering questions, a nominee gives the opposition party a legitimate reason to cast no votes. But he said Roberts has no reason to worry about the outcome of his candidacy.

"He was a great pick," Magarian said. "He has the conservative credentials but he is not obnoxious about it so he doesn't offend liberals as much as a Thomas or a Scalia."

DOJ_NMG_0006593

Rahdert said bumping Roberts' nomination up to chief justice after the death of William H. Rehnquist is fitting in more ways than one. Roberts clerked for Rehnquist and appears to possess similar ideology and temperament for the chief slot.

"I think Judge Roberts will be just as strong of a conservative vote as Rehnquist," Rahdert said. "But he won't be leading the charge in forming constitutional law in a conservative fashion, and nor did Chief Justice Rehnquist, who was a pragmatist. Now if they replace Justice [Sandra Day] O'Connor, who was not as consistent of a conservative, with another conservative, there will be a conservative block of five on the court."

Magarian, though, sees key differences between Rehnquist and Roberts. Rehnquist began his term in the early 1970s, when the high court was viewed as a font of liberal decisions on highly divisive issues such as privacy, civil rights and the rights of criminal defendants. Conservatives responded by pushing for judicial restraint. As the court grew more conservative, Magarian said, Rehnquist evolved into an exponent of "conservative judicial activism" But Magarian believes Roberts has not demonstrated the same bent toward conservative activism.

Magarian said that with Roberts' nomination as chief justice -- a conservative replacing a solid conservative -- court watchers will intensify their scrutiny of a replacement for O'Connor, viewed as a more moderate figure and one of the court's "swing votes."

"This most recent hearing was just a warm-up for the next hearing, which will be a real fight," Magarian said. "If they were able to get Roberts through in the O'Connor slot, it would have allowed Bush to go back to his list of red-meat conservatives. Ideally, the president would be able to find another Roberts -- someone with conservative credentials who isn't as divisive. But how many of them are walking around? Democrats can now vote for Roberts and say that they played ball with the president on chief justice and now want a more moderate candidate or they will filibuster."

Rahdert said Roberts is a blueprint candidate for getting a nomination through the Senate but may be too mild for much of the president's conservative base.

"This is going to be a much more bitter fight, unless Bush backs down on the type of nominee he sends to the Senate," Magarian said. "And judging from all the short lists we have seen, I don't see that happening."

For '08 Dems, A Tough Choice Lies Just Ahead (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 20, 2005

A vote for Judge John Roberts could be well within the mainstream but that may not be where Democrats with an eye on the Oval Office are looking to swim, according to some political strategists and analysts.

“If you’re running for president, you need to take a hard look at voting no because that’s where the Democratic base is,” said Steve McMahon, a Democratic political consultant who worked on Howard Dean’s 2004 presidential campaign.

Democratic senators, particularly those who harbor presidential aspirations, have plenty of reason to watch each other closely as a floor vote on Roberts’s nomination to become chief justice of the United States approaches.

Support for Roberts could burnish a senator’s centrist credentials and give room to oppose President Bush’s pick to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy. But influential interest groups on the left — a source of strength in Democratic primaries — are pressuring their allies in the Senate to oppose Roberts.

With floor consideration on Roberts slated to start no later than Monday, Democrats’ reaction to Bush’s still-unnamed second nominee could present presidential hopefuls with an opportunity to distinguish themselves from each other.

“Anybody who’s running for president is watching everybody else who’s running,” said McMahon.

Sarah Binder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a professor at George Washington University, said that there would be some value to Democratic presidential hopefuls’ rejecting Roberts because liberal activists would champion their votes.

When the Roberts roll call starts, those senators who are viewed as possible contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 — including Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), 2004 nominee John Kerry (Mass.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and perhaps others — will already be under a microscope. That is particularly true of Clinton, who has not publicly revealed her intentions on either Roberts or the 2008 race.

DOJ_NMG_0006594

Political experts say Clinton has shifted toward the center this year and a vote for the Roberts nomination would be characterized that way.

"She's caught between the swing voters, who she wants and needs for reelection, and the Democratic presidential primary voters and activists who will want her to vote no," said one Democratic strategist.

The Democratic senators will get a chance to test the political waters at today's weekly caucus lunch. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has asked his colleagues not to make a decision on Roberts until they have had a chance to discuss the issue together. But Reid spokesman Jim Manley said Reid is still not asking his colleagues to vote as a bloc. "It's not a party position," Manley said.

Though Roberts would replace the conservative William Rehnquist, who died Sept. 3, the importance of Bush's impending selection to replace frequent swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor has not quelled the left's hopes of spurring Democratic opposition to Roberts.

Comments on the liberal website www.dailykos.com excoriated The Washington Post's editorial page for recommending that senators support Roberts. The more liberal editorial page of The New York Times called Sunday for "no" votes — a position not likely to be ignored by Clinton. "Senators should vote against Mr. Roberts not because they know he does not have the qualities to be an excellent chief justice, but because he has not met the very heavy burden of proving that he does," the Times opined.

The reasoning underscores a dilemma for Senate Democrats. They have expressed few complaints about what the 50-year-old appellate court judge actually said, but the next nominee may be inclined to reveal even less if Roberts is confirmed. Senate Democrats also remain frustrated by White House refusal to release documents from Roberts's stint as a deputy in the solicitor general's office during the presidency of George H.W. Bush.

Still, some Democrats may vote for Roberts to position themselves better to oppose the second nomination, said Jeff Peck, a former general counsel and staff director of the Senate Judiciary Committee under Biden.

"I think there's going to be a lot more peril voting for the O'Connor replacement than the Rehnquist replacement," said Peck, a partner at the lobbying firm Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland and Steward.

Few have raised the Senate's own "F" word — "filibuster" — in relation to Roberts, but the tactic, and Republicans' threatened "nuclear" option, could be employed depending on whom Bush picks.

Confirm Roberts (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

IT WILL BE A DAMNING INDICTMENT of petty partisanship in Washington if an overwhelming majority of the Senate does not vote to confirm John G. Roberts Jr. to be the next chief justice of the United States. As last week's confirmation hearings made clear, Roberts is an exceptionally qualified nominee, well within the mainstream of American legal thought, who deserves broad bipartisan support. If a majority of Democrats in the Senate vote against Roberts, they will reveal themselves as nothing more than self-defeating obstructionists.

Most Democrats have not indicated how they will vote later this week in the Judiciary Committee, or subsequently on the Senate floor. The angst expressed by some senators who feel caught between the pressure of liberal interest groups and their own impression of Roberts is comically overwrought. "I for one have woken up in the middle of the night thinking about it, being unsure how to vote," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.).

One reason Democratic senators are struggling to reach a verdict on the Roberts nomination is that President Bush has yet to announce his nominee for the second vacancy on the court. They are trying to figure out how their vote on Roberts will influence Bush's next choice. This is silly; Roberts ought to be considered on his own merits. But even if one treats this vote merely as a tactical game, voting against an impressive, relatively moderate nominee hardly strengthens the Democrats' leverage. If Roberts fails to win their support, Bush may justifiably conclude that he needn't even bother trying to find a justice palatable to the center. And if Bush next nominates someone who is genuinely unacceptable to most Americans, it will be harder for Democrats to point that out if they cry wolf over Roberts.

DOJ_NMG_0006595

Roberts is, admittedly, no William Brennan. But Democrats' hopes to remake the court in his image died (or should have) the day after Bush was reelected. Senate Democrats need to exercise their advise-and-consent duty within this context.

Indeed, given Bush's own past statements about admiration for justices such as Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, Roberts may be the best nominee liberals can expect out of this administration. He is in the tradition of Justices William H. Rehnquist and Anthony Kennedy, conservatives who believe in the value of stability and restraint. In his confirmation hearings, Roberts repeatedly distanced himself from an extreme "originalist" or literal approach to constitutional interpretation. He may have dodged plenty of questions, as do all judicial nominees, but he said plenty that was revealing and reassuring.

Roberts acknowledged that he believes there is a right to privacy, that many constitutional principles such as "liberty" and "due process" evolve over time and that justices must be mindful of how destabilizing it is to reverse prior decisions. He is no radical activist determined to take the court back to the early 20th century. Democrats, including California's Dianne Feinstein, should back Roberts or risk the consequences of voting against an acceptable nominee.

White House Is Said To Shift Names On List For 2nd Seat (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick And Sheryl Stolberg

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - The White House is reshuffling its short list of potential Supreme Court nominees with a new emphasis on finding someone who will hold up under the pressure of what is expected to be fierce confirmation battle, several Republican allies close to the process said on Monday.

The shifting calculus reflects the increased stakes in replacing the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor as the court's swing vote as well as the expectation that the new nominee will be measured against Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who was hailed by both parties for his performance during almost 20 hours of confirmation hearings for the post of chief justice.

The shift also indicates that the administration expects some Democrats' pent-up frustration with what they labeled as Judge Roberts's evasiveness to spill over into the hearings for a new nominee. Republican aides briefed on the search said the White House was looking mainly at female jurists for Justice O'Connor's seat, but it has expanded its short list and it is examining the contenders anew in the expectation of a trial by fire.

Conservative allies of the White House said the new criteria could hurt the chances of Judge Janice Rogers Brown, a 2005 Bush appointee to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and a favorite of the president's conservative base.

Republican strategists close to the White House worry that Judge Brown, an African-American known for her fiery speeches to conservative crowds, might try to fight back against vigorous questioning. Other conservative strategists say that she also lacks experience on the federal bench and that supporting her highly ideological oratory might strain the solidarity of the Senate Republican caucus.

Another judge said to be on the list is Judge Priscilla R. Owen, a friend of the president also recently confirmed to a federal appeals court after a vigorous Senate battle. In her case, strategists say the White House is evaluating whether her reticence and mild manner would be a strength or a weakness under interrogation in the Senate.

Others said to remain under consideration include the contenders for the last vacancy, Judge Edith H. Jones and Judge Edith Brown Clement of the Fifth Circuit, as well as Judge Alice M Batchelder of the Sixth Circuit, Judge Karen Williams of the Fourth Circuit and Judge Consuelo M. Callahan of the Ninth Circuit. Judge Callahan, a Republican appointee, is Hispanic, and President Bush has made clear that he would like to name a Hispanic to the court.

Senate leaders, who will meet Mr. Bush on Wednesday to discuss the next court vacancy, said they were also bracing for a firefight over the next nominee. On Monday, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, called on Mr. Bush to name someone who will promote "balance and stability" on the court - a reference that seemed aimed at prodding the White House toward nominating a moderate in the mold of Justice O'Connor.

"I think that there's been a lot frustration on this one, and it's been commented upon very broadly and I think that frustration may well be vented on the next nominee," Mr. Specter said in an interview on Monday, after announcing his support for Judge Roberts.

DOJ_NMG_0006596

Democrats, meanwhile, prepared for a meeting of their caucus on Tuesday to debate the vote on Judge Roberts. Democratic strategists said some leaders in the party were arguing that with Judge Roberts widely expected to win confirmation, members of their party should vote for him in order to appear open-minded and save their ammunition for the fight ahead.

Others, including Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, are expected to push for votes against confirmation in order to send a message to the White House.

Liberal advocacy groups staged a last-ditch campaign on Monday to push Democrats to vote against Mr. Roberts. "It would be an invitation for George W. Bush to name someone as extreme as he wants to for the O'Connor vacancy," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way.

Three labor union groups - the A.F.L.-C.I.O., the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, and the Service Employees International Union - announced their opposition to confirmation on Monday, as did the Center for American Progress, a liberal research organization run by John D. Podesta, the chief of staff under former President Bill Clinton.

Diversity Changes The Way Justices See The World (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2005

In the 215 years since the U.S. Supreme Court first convened, 104 of the 108 justices have been white men. (Related: Opposing view)

The exceptions? Thurgood Marshall, Clarence Thomas, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Sandra Day O'Connor.

Marshall died in 1993; the other three sit on today's court. But with the retirement of O'Connor, the nation's highest court will lose more of a commodity already in very short supply — different life experiences.

When President Bush nominates O'Connor's successor, he will have an opportunity to remedy that, and it should be a priority.

In a nation as diverse as America, a diversity of ideas and perspectives adds to the court's ability to wisely decide issues that change lives. If all nine justices see law and life from the same vantage point, their ideas will not be challenged, tested and honed into the best possible rulings.

Appellate Judge John Roberts, who appears headed for confirmation as the next chief justice, is superbly qualified as a lawyer, but he's also very much like the other overwhelmingly white, male lawyers he would join. Five graduated from Harvard or Yale law schools. Most worked in past presidential administrations, sat on lower courts or practiced at elite law firms. O'Connor is the only one from the Southwest and the only one ever elected to public office.

none of the other justices can see life as O'Connor does. She grew up on a ranch, served in the state Legislature and faced gender discrimination. She graduated near the top of her class at Stanford Law, but the only law job she was offered was as a "legal secretary" at a firm in California.

To those who argue that merit and legal scholarship should be the only standards, the answer is it's easy to name a minority or female justice without compromising excellence or creating quotas.

In law, as in other professions, minorities and women have made great strides. Nearly half of law school graduates in 2004 were women; 21% were minorities. Though the federal judiciary still doesn't look quite like America, about 10% of federal judges are African-American, nearly 7% are Hispanic and about 23% are women.

Bush might take his cue from the justice who is retiring. In a 1992 tribute to Marshall, O'Connor wrote about the value of diversity. During the court's deliberations, Marshall's life experiences informed the debates, she said. No one else had gone to segregated schools, represented African-Americans facing death sentences or been told by a gun-toting white man to get out of a small Mississippi town before dark.

After Marshall was gone, she wrote, she often longed for one of his stories that might "change the way I see the world."

Judging is about seeing the world and applying the law. The nation's highest court should not approach that job from a single, narrow perspective.

Choice Should Be Blind ... (USAT)

By Thomas Heiden

USA Today, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006597

We are in danger of making our highest court just another part of our partisan political culture. That is bad for our nation and threatens the unique role of the Supreme Court in our system. (Related: Our view)

The next nominee for the court should be chosen on the basis of merit (and not "diversity," however defined) for several important reasons:

• To maintain a bright line difference between law and politics.

• To re-emphasize that the function of the highest court is to maintain the rule of law.

• So that the court does not become an extension of our increasingly divided political culture, but that it stands as the independent counterweight to those influences.

Our nation is wonderfully diverse, but justices do not sit as representatives of religious, ethnic or other groups. We do not allocate the 535 seats in the Senate and House of Representatives by group, much less the nine seats on the court.

The Congress should be full of the political push and pull of what the law should be. The Supreme Court is different. The justices should be pragmatic, not ideological; neutral, not representatives of groups.

To nominate a justice because he or she is a member of a group obviously signals that his or her decisions in certain cases will be influenced by membership in that group. To do so misperceives the court as a legislature and the justices as legislators. The signal sent in these times of cultural division should be the opposite. We should keep perceptions of politics and partisanship — whether in the disguise of "diversity" or otherwise — out of the independent judiciary, particularly the Supreme Court.

That is not to endorse the next nominee as a politically conservative white male. The top ranks of the legal profession today are full of women, with plenty of African-American and other "minority" lawyers right there with them. Our Supreme Court and our nation will be best served if the next nominee is selected with an eye blind to race, gender, religion and political ideology — a true focus on legal and intellectual merit.

Let's hope that she is.

Thomas Heiden is a partner in the Chicago office of the law firm Latham & Watkins. The opinions are his own.

Cost Of Katrina Relief Splits Republican Ranks (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON - President Bush's call to spend "whatever it takes" to rebuild the Gulf Coast set off alarm bells among some in his conservative base - and stepped up a growing debate among Republicans at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue on how to fix the battered region in ways that promote conservative values.

From vouchers for education and Medicaid to the creation of a giant "opportunity zone" where Katrina struck, the Bush reconstruction effort - which he called "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen" - is reviving prospects for policy initiatives that GOP leaders say could make or break their party's future.

At the same time, fiscal conservatives, often outside of leadership, are calling for deep cuts in existing spending to pay the costs of reconstruction. They, too, see this as a fight for the soul of the Republican Party.

"It's too early to tell. It could wind up being the New Deal on steroids," says Mike Franc, vice president for governmental affairs at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

For a president who campaigned on Ronald Reagan's legacy of limited government, the vast scope of needs in the region pose a special challenge. While President Roosevelt's New Deal and President Johnson's War on Poverty offer templates for a federal response, Republicans have campaigned for decades to roll them back.

"If people can agree that the last 40 years didn't help win the War on Poverty in New Orleans and the Gulf - and even hurt it - then the debate shifts into not replicating the last 40 years," says Mr. Franc.

But if the congressional committees bog down and can't agree on a package of reforms that can be financed without breaking the bank, "the default could be going with what we already have," he adds.

In recent weeks, Republican leaders have tasked every committee in Congress to come up quickly with new ideas that meet needs in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0006598

These range from a vast package of tax breaks to revive business and housing in the Gulf, to Education Smart cards, which give families the option of paying for education wherever it is available and suits their needs, including private and parochial schools.

But to move such a plan, Republicans will need coherence in their own ranks, especially agreement across their caucus on how to pay for it. For fiscal conservatives, the biggest issue in the Gulf cleanup is its price tag, expected to exceed $200 billion. Congress has already appropriated $62 billion in emergency spending..

"Congress must ensure that a catastrophe of nature does not become a catastrophe of debt for our children and grandchildren," says Rep. Mike Pence (R) of Indiana, who chairs the Republican Study Group, a top conservative caucus.

The Heritage Foundation estimates that such levels of spending could bump budget deficits past $500 billion in 2008 to $873 billion in 2015.

In response, some conservative lawmakers are calling on their leaders to find offsets for new spending, including delaying implementing the new Medicare drug benefit, rolling back pork projects in recently passed Highway and Energy bills, and even deferring a vote on the permanent extension of Bush tax cuts. Last week, 11 House Republicans voted against a $52 billion hurricane relief bill in protest against the failure to identify offsets.

In a comment to reporters last week, House majority leader Tom DeLay said that after 11 years of a Republican majority, there wasn't much fat to cut in the federal budget.

The comment alarmed many conservative activists outside government who see the big spending ways of the Bush administration as a betrayal of small- government ideals.

"I have to pretty strongly disagree with the majority leader," says former GOP Rep. Pat Toomey, now head of the Club for Growth, an antitax group that backs Republican candidates.

"Whatever money gets spent on this reconstruction effort really needs to be offset by reductions somewhere else," he adds. "It's not the role of the federal government to be rebuilding houses and strip malls...."

At a closed leadership meeting on Thursday, House GOP leaders tried to bridge divisions in their caucus by promising strong accountability on where new federal dollars are going "Whatever is expended by Congress, we want to make sure it is funded appropriately and that states and local communities, as well as the private sector, share the burden," said a House leadership aide.

While Republicans have stood by the president as he expanded the role of government in local schools and the war on terrorism, the new wave of post-Katrina spending could break that consensus at a time when the Bush's job rating is at record lows.

The bid to work conservative programs, such as education vouchers, into Gulf aid could help bridge those gaps.

"It's window dressing for the benefit of social conservatives," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J.. "The president may feel that whatever support he will lose among fiscal conservatives, he will win from conservatives proud of him for bootlegging vouchers in the relief plan."

Deficit Foes: Defer New Drug Benefit To Offset Katrina Cost (WT)

By Donald Lambro And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

Some House and Senate members want President Bush to postpone his Medicare prescription-drug program to help pay for Hurricane Katrina relief as the fight over the deficit and the cost of rebuilding heats up.

By targeting the Medicare program, which Congress passed in 2003 despite objections from some conservatives, the lawmakers are striking right at Mr. Bush's signature first-term domestic-policy achievement.

A bill to delay for a year the January 2006 start of the new drug entitlement would save $40 billion and will be "front and center" tomorrow when members of the conservative Republican Study Committee present spending cuts to offset Katrina's costs, said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and RSC chairman.

"It is a very serious option," Mr. Pence said, adding that "a broad number of members" have privately expressed support for the idea.

DOJ_NMG_0006599

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, mentioned the delay as an option on "Fox News Sunday," and a spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, said the senator is considering sponsoring a bill or backing other senators' efforts.

Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, said he understands the sentiment, but doesn't think the proposal will go anywhere. "I just don't see formal legislative action coming on that," he said.

One Republican leadership aide said it drives home the point Republicans are serious about cutting spending.

"When you talk about someone's prescription-drug benefits, people get it," the aide said. He said the push for the delay is "probably a message to the White House" more than a policy goal.

White House spokesman Trent Duffy dismissed the delay idea.

"We've made a commitment to seniors. Their lives depend on it. ... Now is not the time to snatch medicines out of medicine cabinets," he said.

But Mr. Pence said the fact that the White House so quickly dismissed it may mean they are nervous. "If it was really going nowhere, it probably wouldn't have been ruled out," he said.

Deficit hawks both inside and outside of Congress say adding the cost of recovery and rebuilding to the deficit is a bad idea.

"Simply adding $200 billion or more to the deficit is unwise and unnecessary," said former Sen. Warren B. Rudman, New Hampshire Republican and chairman of the deficit-fighting Concord Coalition.

Some budget watchdogs say major spending cuts will be politically impossible to make as Congress approaches the midterm elections next year.

"I think this is a time when the leadership of the Congress and the White House should bury the ideological hatchet and suggest small increases in taxes and modest restraints on spending," said Robert Reischauer, former director of the Congressional Budget Office.

"Everybody has to put a few sacred cows on the chopping block for efforts like this to be acceptable, but it's highly unlikely in the climate we have now," Mr. Reischauer said.

But tax-cutters argue that any tax increases would weaken the economic recovery, lower tax revenues and thus worsen the deficit.

"Now more than ever, we need a vibrant economy which enables us to pay for things like helping New Orleans to recover," said Mallory Factor, a New York investor who heads the Free Enterprise Fund, which supports congressional candidates who favor lower taxes. "Tax increases are a nonstarter. We can't tax our way out of this spending, and it probably wouldn't reduce the deficit anyway."

One danger for Republicans is that the deficit will erode support for further tax cuts. Republicans had planned to enact about $70 billion in tax cuts under the budget process later this year, mostly by extending tax cuts from the 2001 and 2003 packages. But they now face opposition from within their own ranks.

RSC Pressing For Deep Cuts (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

Proposals from House GOP conservatives to cut federal spending to offset the costs of Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts ran smack into political reality Monday, as the White House rejected a plan to delay implementation of a new Medicare prescription drug program for one year, an idea that conservatives said would save at least $40 billion.

Other initiatives favored by House conservatives, including re-opening the recently passed highway bill to strip out $26 billion in “add-ons” disparaged as pork projects by budget hawks, also have garnered little support on Capitol Hill, according to GOP insiders.

But Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), chairman of the conservative, 90-plus member Republican Study Committee, vowed to press ahead with his initiative to find spending cuts to help pay for the Katrina reconstruction costs.

Pence, who along with President Bush and other Republican Congressional leaders objects to a tax increase to fund Katrina relief proposals, said Congress must do something to rein in federal spending, even more now that the Gulf Coast recovery effort will add tens of billions of dollars to the federal budget. Pence vowed to continue to push for a vote on delaying implementation of the Medicare drug program, despite White House opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0006600

"With all due respect to the White House and their intentions, House conservatives will vigorously pursue the one-year delay in the Medicare prescription drug entitlement," Pence said in an interview on Monday. Pence voted against the program when it was originally approved by Congress in November 2003, and the Indiana Republican said waiting until January 2007 to roll out the drug initiative would be "a great service to future generations of Americans."

Pence and other RSC members, including Reps. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) and Jeb Hensarling (Texas), will take part in a press conference on Wednesday to unveil "Operation Offset," their plan to pay for at least some portion of the Katrina recovery through cuts in government spending.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other House GOP leaders will meet with Pence and RSC representatives today to discuss their offset ideas, and while GOP leadership aides noted that senior lawmakers will listen to their proposals carefully, Hastert will not endorse anything that alienates other factions within the Republican Conference.

"We have been through this in the past," said a senior House GOP leadership aide of offsetting federal disaster spending. "Getting offsets is a great idea. But getting it through the House is another thing. I don't see where there are the votes" for delaying the Medicare drug rollout or retroactively cutting highway funds.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters that delaying the Medicare prescription drug program is not even being considered by Bush or his top advisers, despite calls from some within his own party to do so.

"Now, in terms of the Medicare drug benefit, that is an important benefit for our seniors that will save them significant money on their prescription drugs," McClellan told reporters on Monday. "And it's important to move forward on the prescription drug benefit and we are."

The new prescription drug program is a centerpiece of GOP efforts to appeal to older voters, and Republican leaders are counting on using the implementation of the drug initiative in the November 2006 elections.

A House Republican leadership aide said the idea of delaying the prescription drug program was a nonstarter with top GOP lawmakers, given that the government already has spent millions of dollars assuring seniors that the benefit is on the way.

"It would be like Lucy pulling the football away from Charlie Brown," the aide said.

McClellan suggested instead that Congress enact some of the cuts included in Bush's fiscal 2006 budget proposal, although many of these overtures already have been rejected by Congress this year.

Bush proposed ending or slashing more than 154 federal programs to save at least $20 billion in non-defense discretionary spending. Some of these proposed cuts provoked outrage on Capitol Hill and were immediately rejected, such as plans to slash funding for Amtrak and reductions in farm support programs.

Bush also proposed cutting $137 billion over 10 years from mandatory programs. The House and Senate Budget committees postponed work on a $35 billion reconciliation package designed to cut spending on entitlement programs last week as the GOP leadership in both chambers struggled to address the concerns of a post-Katrina Congress.

Pence and other GOP conservatives would like to see the Budget committees double or even triple the size of these mandatory cuts, arguing that past reconciliation packages were much larger. Ben Pershing contributed to this report.

Possible Fed Candidate Proposes Hurricane Relief Plan (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 20, 2005

Economic damage inflicted on the U.S. economy by Hurricane Katrina is likely to be modest, making the case for huge government aid questionable, said Glenn Hubbard, who is cited as a possible candidate to head the U.S. Federal Reserve.

In a Financial Times commentary on Monday, Hubbard said that federal fiscal aid should be used to cushion the blow to business and consumer confidence from a nasty regional shock.

But overall the short-term hit to unemployment and production is likely to be modest, offset by rebuilding over the coming year, and long-term damage to energy supplies also seems unlikely.

"Favorable underlying economic growth trends make the need for a national 'stimulus' package -- ironic given the substantial government spending probably of about 1 pct of GDP about to occur -- questionable," Hubbard wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0006601

He is one of three names on the list of likely candidates to replace Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, who retires on January 31, 2005. Hubbard was a former top White House economic adviser and for President George W. Bush, and now is dean of Columbia Business School in New York.

Other possible Fed candidates are Harvard economist Martin Feldstein, and former Fed Governor Ben Bernanke, who now is a White House adviser. No one has emerged as a clear front-runner.

Hubbard in the editorial argued for carefully targeting the federal aid from the hurricane that devastated New Orleans and the Gulf coast. The U.S. government already has provided $62.3 billion in special funding and some lawmakers estimate the final price tag could be $150 billion to $200 billion.

He said three economic principles should guide the relief effort for the U.S. Gulf states.

Firstly, temporary assistance should be given to those people hard hit, especially those without insurance. He suggested appointing a "red-tape tsar" to cut through bureaucracy and help people get local and federal benefits. He also recommended using vouchers for health insurance, housing and education. But long-term support should requires a national debate, Hubbard said.

Secondly, large-scale federal funding should be invested quickly in infrastructure -- draining the area, rebuilding the Port of New Orleans, the energy and transport sectors, and repairing levees. It also could be used for a redevelopment authority, which could issue long-term redevelopment bonds.

Thirdly, redevelopment should be governed by market forces once the infrastructure and city play is in place and people's immediate needs addressed, Hubbard said.

The U.S. government already has provided $62.3 billion in special funding for Hurricane Katrina relief, after the storm devastated New Orleans and the Gulf coast. Some lawmakers estimate the final price tag could be $150 billion to $200 billion.

If The Politicians Really Want To Help ... (LAT)

By Gerald Rafshoon And Doug Bailey

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

Members of Congress have voted more than $60 billion in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, with the total estimated to eventually go as high as $200 billion. But that's (mostly) your money. What about their campaign money?

After all, shouldn't sacrifice for the vulnerable start with the powerful? So how about this unconventional idea: Washington should call a 90-day moratorium on campaign fundraising, and both parties — and all congressional incumbents — should tithe from their campaign funds for Katrina relief.

That means 10% of their war chests should go to hurricane relief, or they should raise that amount and donate it to the relief effort instead of collecting still more for the 2006 campaign battles. While we're at it, how about extending the moratorium to political action committees and lobbyists and asking them to take what they have budgeted for the politicians and give it to Katrina relief instead.

Washington's special-interest, lobbyist-loaded, incumbent-entrenched political system may be broken. But it's certainly not broke. Federal Election Commission records show that the party campaign committees and House and Senate incumbents have more than $400 million with nearly 14 months to go before the elections. Tithing would yield $40 million for Katrina aid, money that otherwise would probably just be used for attack ads.

Are we dreaming? Probably. But it's obvious that the displaced and destitute evacuees need the money — and Washington's politicos don't. In 2004, 403 House members sought reelection and on average spent just over $1 million to do it. Regardless of party. One million dollars per incumbent seat. Almost two-thirds of them outspent their opposition 10 to 1 or more. Only seven of the 403 lost (and two of those because Texas redistricting forced incumbents to run against each other).

Incumbent protection is the only nonpartisan thing in today's politics. Both parties benefit; both parties are guilty. Both use redistricting practices at the state level to draw voter-district lines to protect incumbents. Both use special-interest money to keep them in office.

DOJ_NMG_0006602

But do the incumbents really need the money? It's not as if many of their races are close. In terms of percentage of the vote, only two of those 403 incumbent races were as tight as the presidential contest between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry. And the incumbents who ran still had a total of $157 million left over on election day.

If self-protection comes first in Washington, is it any wonder politicians seem so out of touch?

But Washington's cycle of fundraising and influence-buying and access-selling is just one part of a system badly out of whack. Consider that:

• $2.2 billion was spent on the presidential race in 2004, twice what was spent in 2000, according to the Washington Post.

• Since 2000, the number of lobbyists in Washington has doubled to almost 35,000.

• We know from our own experience that the political consulting profession is increasingly peopled by mercenaries, many of whom work in campaigns just to be able to sell access to those they help elect.

• Many who come to Washington to serve the people tend to stay to serve the special interests.

So maybe rebuilding from the tragedy of Katrina is also an opportunity to rebuild a democracy of selfless public service. How can Washington's incumbents ensure that political money buys more than insider access? How can Washington's invulnerable understand the nation's vulnerable? How can the powerful earn the trust of the powerless?

One starting place is to give of themselves — donating a potful of their campaign money to people who really need it. And maybe we the voters ought to hold them accountable if they don't.

Gerald Rafshoon and Doug Bailey were the opposing advertising consultants in the Carter-Ford presidential campaign in 1976. They are working together on a documentary and book about the collapse of U.

Bush Proposes Vouchers For All Displaced Students (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Under President Bush's plan to cover most of the cost of educating students displaced by Hurricane Katrina, parents could enroll their children in a private or religious school this year at federal expense, even if they had gone to public schools back home, administration officials said yesterday.

In proposing $1.9 billion in aid for kindergartners through 12th-graders whose schools were ruined by the storm, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings originally said the administration was setting aside $488 million for private-school tuition and other help, to re-create as normal an environment as possible for the uncommonly large segment of children from New Orleans who had attended Catholic schools.

Yesterday, however, as new fine print of the proposal emerged, White House and Education Department spokesmen confirmed that the government payment -- as much as $7,500 per child -- would be given for a year to any displaced family that now prefers an alternative to public schools. "Parents may choose to send children to private schools. They may not. But this is their choice," said Susan Aspey, the Education Department's spokeswoman.

According to administration documents, the $488 million allotment is an estimate based on the fact that about 61,000 children had attended private schools in the four Louisiana parishes that were affected most heavily. Asked whether the president would be willing to spend more on private schools if additional parents asked for such help, Aspey replied, "It's far too soon to speculate. Right now, these are just concepts."

The expansive eligibility for private-school payments intensified the dispute over Bush's approach to providing federal relief to people and places harmed by the hurricane. Democrats on Capitol Hill and public education advocates had begun to complain that the president was using the catastrophe to weave into legislation a version of federal funding of vouchers for private education, which the administration has sought, unsuccessfully, since 2001.

"It makes it even worse," Paul Houston, executive director of the American Association of School Administrators, said of the idea that all displaced families could obtain money for private schools. "It is really a tone-deaf response to the crisis. It is a real grab to get an ideological position across that they haven't been able to achieve under normal circumstances."

DOJ_NMG_0006603

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), ranking Democrat on the Senate's Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, said, "Instead of reopening ideological battles, we should be focused on reopening schools and getting people the help that they need."

Some congressional Republicans have embraced Bush's idea. A spokesman for Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), the panel's chairman, said he has not decided whether to add money for private schools into bipartisan legislation providing educational help that the panel drafted last week.

Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, said in a statement, "These children are being welcomed by schools across the nation, both public and private, and we need to support all the affected students and families."

Contractors Get Affirmative Action Exemption (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

The Labor Department has temporarily suspended government requirements that its contractors have an affirmative action plan addressing the employment of women, members of minorities, Vietnam veterans and the disabled if the companies are first-time government contractors working on reconstruction in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

While employment lawyers said it was not clear how strong an impact the exemption would have, the move comes as President Bush has tried to address the perception of unfairness in the government's response to the hurricane.

Under the rules that normally apply to companies hired by the government, businesses with more than 50 employees working on contracts for more than $50,000 must develop an affirmative action plan. But according to a memorandum on the Labor Department's Web site, dated Sept. 9, the goal of the exemption in the case of recovery work associated with Hurricane Katrina is to reduce the burden of paperwork on government contractors and so encourage more companies to jump into assisting with rebuilding from the storm damage.

The exemption is to last for three months, unless it is extended.

"It does not waive affirmative action requirements, it does not waive job posting requirements, it does not waive their obligation not to engage in discrimination," said Charles E. James, deputy assistant secretary at the Labor Department. "It's very, very limited."

The announcement by the Labor Department came the day after President Bush announced the suspension of a law that requires employers to pay the locally prevailing wage to construction workers on federally financed projects. The order applies to parts of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida. In explaining the move, the proclamation stated that "the conditions caused by Hurricane Katrina constitute a 'national emergency.' "

The Labor Department affirmative action memorandum, which Mr. James signed, specifically states that laws against discrimination continue to apply to federal contractors, as do requirements that employers keep records and post notices stating that "equal opportunity is the law." The memorandum only affects the requirement that employers develop a written affirmative action program, Mr. James said.

The memorandum received little attention in the media frenzy over the aftermath of the storm and hearings on the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to the Supreme Court. Protests against it began circulating online late last week.

"It is not simply a paperwork exercise," said Shirley J. Wilcher, deputy assistant secretary for federal contract compliance in the Clinton administration who is now the interim executive director of the American Association for Affirmative Action. "It is the basis for companies to be mindful of their obligation not to discriminate."

But it is not clear how the exemption may, in practice, affect employment practices at companies, said B. Scott Silverman, an employment lawyer at Morrison & Foerster in Los Angeles. Its impact depends on how much affirmative action plans actually affect short-term hiring, he said.

"The only companies that will end up being completely excused are those that are not doing business with the federal government now and might not otherwise try to do business with the government," Mr. Silverman said.

DOJ_NMG_0006604

He added that he thought a three-month exemption would probably not affect employment practices greatly, especially in light of the dire need for employees to rebuild.

"I don't think this exemption is going to restrict those opportunities in any way, shape or form," Mr. Silverman said.

Black Clergy Wary Of Bush's Courtship (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — For many of the black ministers who have allied themselves with President Bush and a Republican strategy to boost the party's African American support, the government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina put a severe strain on new and still-fragile bonds of trust.

But just as some ministers had begun denouncing a government recovery effort that seemed to leave many blacks in the Gulf region behind, a number of those African American clergy say an aggressive outreach campaign by Bush and senior White House aides in recent days has begun reversing what might have been lasting political damage.

Moreover, the ministers — as well as a cadre of conservative policy analysts who consult with the White House — are arguing that the Katrina relief response, while tarnishing the GOP image in the short term, could foster a Republican-led battle against poverty that would give the party a list of new selling points for African American voters who have long viewed Democrats as the best advocates for the downtrodden.

With the federal government spending tens of billions of dollars on the recovery, Republicans have a chance not only to appeal to minorities by creating jobs and other economic opportunities but to use the rebuilding effort as a real-world test of such long-discussed conservative ideas as school vouchers, enterprise zones and the use of faith-based groups to provide social services.

"The strategic question is whether or not the White House senior staff are smart enough to seize this historic and strategic opportunity," said the Rev. Eugene Rivers, pastor of Boston's Azusa Christian Community and one of about two dozen African American ministers Bush has courted heavily. "If they fail to practice the compassionate conservatism that they have preached, history may not be kind to them."

Other ministers said they took solace in Bush's sudden shift in tone last week, as he admitted making mistakes, unveiled a massive rebuilding plan and pledged a renewed look at the relationship between race and poverty.

In language that resonated with many of the black ministers, Bush during his nationally televised speech Thursday cited the "deep, persistent poverty" in the Gulf region and said it "has roots in a history of racial discrimination.... We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action." The Republican Party chairman, in a recent appearance, even talked about a new "war on poverty."

The White House outreach to its allies among black clergy has been intense and has engaged Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, chief domestic policy advisor Claude Allen and James Towey, director of the White House Office on Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

Their efforts show how important the black electorate is to Republican efforts to maintain and build its political majority — and how threatened those plans have been by the images of deaths and destruction in New Orleans, which has a black majority.

Towey said he had spoken to some pastors "two and three times a day" since the storm's wrath became clear, and he acknowledged that some were upset during their conversations.

"I've heard their frustration, and I've heard their deep concern for the people who are suffering," Towey said. But, he added, the fact that a dialogue continues is a sign of potential progress. "I'm encouraged because they're still calling and we're still talking, and we've moved past the first week into the phase the president is talking about now," Towey said.

Interviews with key black pastors who had built alliances with Bush revealed a continued reluctance to fully trust that the administration would follow through on new promises to look fully at race and poverty and to ensure that black residents and minority-owned firms benefited from the rebuilding. But they all expressed hope that Bush was sincere in his words.

The Rev. Bill Owens of Memphis, president of the Coalition for African American Pastors and a supporter of other Bush initiatives, applauded the president's speech, saying his new tone could be redemptive after two weeks of a troubling White House response. But his praise was cautious.

DOJ_NMG_0006605

"I think he now has a golden opportunity to show that he does in his heart care for the African American community," Owens said. "With what he does from here on, he will be judged."

Vivian Berryhill of Mississippi, president of the National Coalition of Pastors Spouses and one of Bush's most vocal black supporters last year, praised the president's new words and promises. But she acknowledged that feelings were raw.

"The president can't make a 20-minute speech and think it's all over," she said. "If Republicans ever hope to appeal to African American voters, they need to come out publicly and support the citizens of American who have a great need."

Even an outspoken member of the all-Democratic Congressional Black Caucus said the Katrina reconstruction outlined last week by Bush could present a history-changing opportunity — if the president and the Republicans in charge of Congress followed through.

"I did not expect [Bush] to be so strong" in addressing race, poverty and the federal commitment to rebuild in the Gulf, said Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.). While cautioning that "rhetoric is one thing and action is another," Cummings wondered whether Katrina's aftermath has been "a life-altering event for the president, making him more compassionate and more empathetic."

Cummings said his Baltimore constituents remain "very, very skeptical" of the Republicans' ability to deliver on the lofty promises of the president's speech.

Yet, the Democratic congressman added, "We have to roll up our sleeves and work with him."

In addition to enhancing the Republican appeal among African Americans, senior party strategists believe that remaking the Gulf Coast has the potential to reignite the Bush "compassion agenda" that had been shunted aside by a post-Sept. 11 focus on terrorism, and provide a laboratory for long-simmering Republican ideas for targeting urban poverty.

Bush outlined some of those ideas last week, promising tax incentives and the pledge that a portion of the relief money would flow to faith-based social service organizations.

Bush increased his share of the black vote last year by as much as 7 percentage points in key battleground states, in part because of a White House initiative that has directed millions in government funds to black churches and other faith-based social service organizations.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman has forged ahead with the party's minority outreach campaign.

Several worried Republicans posed questions about it during a visit last week by Mehlman to Oregon and Washington state, prompting Mehlman to assure them that the administration's response would fit comfortably with the notion of growing the GOP — putting "an effective war on poverty" on par on the administration agenda with the fight against terrorism and reshaping Social Security.

"One of the things this requires us to do is rethink how does our nation do in helping folks who are in need," Mehlman said during an appearance in suburban Seattle.

"What this president says is we need to move from a regulatory system that creates dependency to an opportunity society that creates ownership and says more folks can own their own home and poor parents can choose where their kids go to school and poor people can own a personal retirement account."

While Towey said the black pastors will have a major role in helping to devise policy, the White House has also been soliciting advice from conservative thinkers.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich is advocating vouchers to allow displaced children and families to make their own choices in education and a market approach to housing.

Jack Kemp, the 1996 Republican vice presidential nominee and former U.S. housing secretary, wrote last week that conservatives could turn Katrina into an opportunity just as presidents Lincoln and Franklin D. Roosevelt did during other periods of crisis.

In an essay in the online conservative journal Human Events, Kemp wrote: "In the wake of this national catastrophe we should all be imagining the unimaginable."

Incompetence, Not Racism (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006606

If you told me that George W. Bush is a dummy, I would argue with you but understand why you thought so: all those idiotic statements. But if you told me, as some have been implying, that Bush is a racist or that he doesn't care about black people, I would not only say that you're wrong but add, "Not the George Bush I know."

Of course, I don't know George Bush personally. But in his first presidential campaign, I traveled with him and tried, as he might say, to look into his heart. Conveniently enough, he sometimes wears it on his sleeve -- never more so, as I discovered, than when he talks about poor kids and racial and ethnic minorities. His feelings for them -- especially for poor kids -- are genuine. This is what I believed then and this -- his incompetent performance regarding Hurricane Katrina notwithstanding -- is what I believe now.

Others believe differently. The most non-nuanced statements came from the rapper Kanye West. Appearing on an NBC special to raise money for flood victims, West attributed the slow recovery effort not to ineptitude but to the fact that "most of the people are black." He followed that up a moment later with: "George Bush doesn't care about black people." NBC snipped that comment from its West Coast feed, but no matter: West was clearly not speaking only for himself. National polls showed a racial divide in appraising how the government did after Katrina. Blacks by and large thought race played a role in the laggard relief effort.

The Rev. Al Sharpton, functionally unemployed all these years, put it a bit differently. Appearing Sunday on local New York television, he didn't exactly say that Bush was indifferent to the plight of New Orleans's poor blacks, but he did say this about Bush: "One has to suspect why he had such delayed compassion." Sharpton did point out, as Bill Clinton did in his Sunday TV appearances, that in New Orleans, poor and black are largely synonymous, but still the damage was done: George Bush is no friend of black people.

I have two problems with all this. The first is not just that it's unfair -- Bush, in this case, was an equal opportunity bungler -- but that it rests on a stereotype: Republicans tend to wear lime green pants in the summer and dislike black people all year round. There was more than a little truth to this at one time. The GOP, after all, became a safe haven for Southern bigots who fled the Democratic Party (as Lyndon Johnson knew they would) in the civil rights era. The fight for the rights of blacks turned Dixie as Republican as it once was Democratic. To its everlasting shame, the GOP continues to benefit from raw bigotry.

But Bush is not cut from that cloth. He is a contemporary Republican, a person of another generation who, you may have noticed, has a black woman as secretary of state and had a black man before her. Under him, the GOP began an outreach to black Americans, and unless the Democrats wake up it will ultimately succeed. As Karl Rove well knows, all he has to do is pick up a small percentage of the black vote and he ends the current 50-50 electoral split. Bush, who won an impressive 27 percent of the black vote in his reelection bid for Texas governor, could have been the man to do this. His task is a lot harder now.

My second problem is that yelling racism stops creative thinking. Questions about how reconstruction should be managed, about how relief money should be used, about who will be resettled and where -- all of them fraught with racial issues -- will not be addressed. Instead, as we have already seen, the feds will simply throw gobs and gobs of money at New Orleans and its poor -- never mind how it is spent. Bush has reacted like a conservative's stereotype of a liberal -- just spend the damn money and hope it does some good. This, more than anything, shows true contempt for the poor, regardless of race.

We owe the poor our special consideration. We especially owe the black poor an appreciation of their plight and their dolorous history. But in general it was incompetence, not racism, that slowed the relief effort -- incompetence on the local and state levels, too, and incompetence on the part of black as well as white public officials. The search for racist scapegoats does the poor no good. This relief effort ought to start, above all, with some clear thinking.

Visions Of The New New Orleans (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

PORTLAND, Ore. -- If the rebuilding of New Orleans is to be something other than a new government disaster, a coalition of the skeptical and the visionary will have to stand together and confront the lobbyists and the corporate welfare artists.

Fiscal conservatives in Congress are right to worry about the potential for -- yes -- waste, fraud and abuse if the federal government throws off tens of billions of dollars into a haphazard and ill-planned spending fest. If the goal is to spend as much money as quickly as possible, the benefits will flow primarily to the well-connected, and the result will be a new mess built on the old.

DOJ_NMG_0006607

But because the rest of us are morally obligated to those whose lives have been damaged by natural calamity and government failure, it's a fact that the federal government will be spending a lot of money. That's why the fiscal conservatives need the visionaries. The visionaries are insisting that we put in the time to make New Orleans a model for a better kind of city and the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast a model for a better approach to governing. The people of the region, not the lobbyists, need to lead in creating an environmentally sustainable, socially just and economically viable region.

These thoughts are inspired by one of Congress's rare visionaries. Rep. Earl Blumenauer not only represents his beloved city of Portland but is also evangelical in spreading Portland's gospel of "livability." That odd but increasingly popular word embodies the idea that if governments plan right (and in cooperation with local citizens), they can safeguard the environment, create more agreeable lives for families and individuals and let loose sustainable private-sector growth.

Blumenauer, a Democrat always seeking to put together left-right coalitions on behalf of his eclectic mix of ideas, is both worried and excited by the prospect of rebuilding the Gulf. Speaking for the fiscally conservative, he describes himself as "a little scared by how fast they're doing all this stuff because I don't think there's anybody in charge."

But his excitement burns through during a discussion at a restaurant in Portland's Pearl neighborhood, an old warehouse district near an abandoned rail yard that is now thriving. "I've been in Congress for nearly 10 years and I've never been so optimistic that we have a chance not just to engage in the gargantuan task of helping people in the Gulf, but also of healing the body politic." There is an opportunity, he says, for government to ask the basic questions: "How do you build a community? How do you get people involved? You've got to build a citizen infrastructure along with all the roads and bridges."

Blumenauer has more standing than most on this subject. On Jan. 26, after returning from a congressional visit to areas devastated by the Asian tsunami, he rose on the House floor to ask: "What would have happened if, last September, Hurricane Ivan had veered 40 miles to the west, devastating the city of New Orleans?"

"The city has always been at risk because of its low-lying location," Blumenauer warned, "but that risk has been increased because of rising sea levels, groundwater pumping and the erosion of coastal Louisiana . . . it is hard to imagine what would happen if a disaster of that magnitude hit the United States." Now, alas, we know.

Blumenauer is ecumenical in his criticisms of past practices, including the actions of Congress and the Army Corps of Engineers, and he even likes to think that President Bush might become an ally for the large packet of proposals he is peddling.

Why shouldn't the president want to leave a legacy of a New Orleans built on economically mixed neighborhoods and a thriving public transit system? Blumenauer sees new parks and buffer zones in areas where homes shouldn't be, and economic projects designed to put local people back to work. He wants to revisit past policies that encouraged development in dangerous places.

Above all, he wants to turn the hurricane's victims into decision makers. In the rebuilding, "people should have a role in what it should be like, rather than have it done to them." One of his biggest fears is that outsiders will simply turn New Orleans into a Disneyland.

There will be time to debate all of Blumenauer's ideas. But one thing is certain: If the fiscal conservatives and the visionaries don't come together quickly, the special-interest-lobbyist complex that doesn't care about planning and seeks only cash in the hands of its friends will dominate the reconstruction effort. That would be a disaster for all of us, and especially for the people of the Gulf.

Can You Hear Us Now? Let Poor Americans Speak For Themselves (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

One of the most difficult conversations I have endured in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is the discussion about race and poverty. Oh yeah, I have read the quotes from rapper Kanye West and former first lady Barbara Bush. I saw the early news reports about the victims that made me want to throw my TV out the window. But I made a strategic decision to stay focused on my family and not get pulled into making this horrible tragedy a wedge issue. It's time we shut up and allow poor people to speak for themselves. They have a story to tell us all.

DOJ_NMG_0006608

There's no question that I am super-sensitive and emotional about this topic because of my own background. As a child growing up, I lived right smack on the intersection where race and poverty collide. It's not a pretty corner. Unfortunately, this intersection of despair, hopelessness and turmoil is not unique to the Gulf Coast region. It exists in major cities across America and in some rural areas as well. Many poor inhabitants at this intersection are not black; whites live there, too.

Katrina was an equal opportunity destroyer. She did not care whether you owned a home on the lakefront or rented an apartment in the "projects." This monster hurricane uprooted big elm trees and oak trees that lined our historic neighborhoods as though they were toothpicks.

And Katrina was colorblind. She didn't care if you lived in a house made of brick or one of wood. She moved things out of her way and placed them somewhere else. She was a mighty big storm and from what I was able to witness, it will take time to put things back together.

In the aftermath of all this destruction, Congress should hold a series of hearings that allow the victims to tell their stories to determine how to help them get a fresh start. (We have so many of Katrina's victims stranded in this region — just invite them over.) Whatever is done, poor people must not be excluded from this conversation.

Based on my experience, the worst part of being a member of the chronic poor or the working poor is the uncertainty about how to maneuver the system. Add race to this equation, and you have a recipe for hopelessness.

The reason why so many of Katrina's victims, including some middle-class folks, are upset right now is they cannot get a straight answer. It's bad enough to lose all your material possessions, let alone figure out how to log onto a computer to file for assistance or to get an update on information to help you find housing. This expectation is just plain ludicrous.

Federal officials, working with state and local officials, should begin hiring some of the locals right away. They should get rid of the red tape that forces people to find a computer. Bring computers into the shelters or communities where they are stranded.

When I was back home over the weekend, I saw numerous ads for construction workers, builders and other professional skills. No offense, but can someone cut a radio spot and inform people where to apply? Better yet, post this information in the shelters and organize local transportation to take shelter inhabitants to job interviews. Again, think like the people you want to help. Tell them when and where to report and how they can get back and forth. They are ready to work.

If it takes a national conversation on race and poverty to get things moving, I want to start the dialogue. I want Americans to learn how people who live from paycheck to paycheck budget their time and limited resources. I want America to hear what it's like living with no health insurance and waiting for hours to see a medical professional. I want America to hear what it's like working two shifts at a minimum-wage job so everyone will understand why President Bush's decision to waive the Davis-Bacon Act, which guarantees that federal contracts pay workers prevailing wages, is an awful mistake and an insult to the people of the region.

I want America to hear from small and minority businesses about the cumbersome rules and the maze of red tape they went through to get certified only to learn that they may not qualify for the rebuilding work ahead. I am excited about some of the plans designed to help people rebuild their lives and communities, especially the plan to use excess federal land to build new homes. But, Congress should make sure that local people are involved in this process.

Congress can lead the way through public hearings to examine what went wrong and where we go from here. For God's sake, let's be honest with each other and respect our various opinions.

The people who raised me and so many others along the Gulf Coast did not sit on their behinds all day. They worked three or four jobs to make ends meet. They taught us to play by the rules, respect others, get an education and work hard. I still play by those rules, but my family and many others need support and assistance from Congress to help get back in the game.

Donna L. Brazile, the campaign manager for Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore in 2000, runs her own grass-roots political consulting firm.

President Sinking In Ratings (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0006609

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Americans' views of President Bush and his leadership have soured in the wake of dismay over the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, the course of the Iraq war and the future of the economy.

Bush's rating for handling each of those issues dropped to his lowest yet in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday. Assessments of his personal qualities also fell: For the first time, a majority says he isn't a strong and decisive leader.

Bush's overall approval rating is 40%, equaling a previous low. His disapproval is 58%, a new high.

“Bush stands at a precipice,” says Carroll Doherty of the non-partisan Pew Research Center. “He's lost ground among independents. He seems to be starting to lose ground among his own party. And he lost the Democrats a long time ago.”

By a record 66%-31%, independents disapprove of the job Bush is doing as president.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan says the president “knows a leader must govern based on what he believes is right, not based on polls.” Bush is “working to address the priorities that Americans are most concerned about,” he says.

Of the poll's respondents, 30% identified themselves as Republicans, 33% as independents and 36% as Democrats.

The survey shows signs of friction between the two most pressing concerns on Bush's agenda: the Iraq war and Katrina recovery.

A 54% majority says the best way for the government to pay for hurricane relief is by cutting spending for the war. Just 6% support spending cuts in domestic programs, as Bush has suggested.

Nearly two-thirds of those polled, 63%, say some or all of the U.S. troops in Iraq should be withdrawn. A record-high 59% say it was a mistake to invade.

Bush's standing declined even though Americans, by 45%-27%, approve of the proposals he unveiled in a nationally televised address Thursday to deal with Katrina. Seven in 10 express confidence the administration can assist victims.

But assessments of Bush on the hurricane dipped after the speech: 56% say he has taken steps to help victims mostly for political reasons, not because he cares about them.

By more than 4-to-1, Americans want an independent panel — not Congress — to investigate the government's response to Katrina.

Some Firms Hired In Katrina's Wake Have Checkered Pasts (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

GoldStar EMS was on the ropes earlier this year, beset by legal problems.

The Texas ambulance provider's offices had been raided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of a widening investigation into alleged Medicaid fraud. It faced a $1.3 million tax lien from the Internal Revenue Service. It had been forced to file for emergency bankruptcy protection to prevent the local tax assessors who had seized its airplane from also taking its helicopters. It had closed many of its offices across the state and fired two-thirds of its work force. Dozens of its ambulances sat idle in a parking lot in preparation for a fire sale.

Then Hurricane Katrina tore through the Gulf Coast, and GoldStar's fortunes began to change. Desperate to get ambulances into flood-ravaged areas of Louisiana, the Federal Emergency Management Agency put out a call for help. C. Henderson Consulting Inc., a small East Texas firm, bid for the work and signed a federal contract to provide up to 50 ambulances a day through the end of September at a total cost of $5.2 million.

Then Henderson Consulting went looking for subcontractors capable of providing dozens of ambulances immediately. The only firm it found with that many vehicles on hand was GoldStar, which soon had a subcontract to provide up to 45 ambulances a day at a profit of $800 per vehicle per day.

"Most ambulance companies wouldn't be able to supply 45 ambulances on a dime like that. But ours were just sitting there in the lot, so it was a nice coincidence for everyone," says Edward Rothberg, GoldStar's attorney. "It would be pretty sad for the government to say that we won't use GoldStar because they're being investigated, so we'll leave people to die in the streets."

DOJ_NMG_0006610

The GoldStar contract illustrates one of the unintended consequences of what is shaping up to be the largest government rebuilding effort in U.S. history. As the Bush administration rushes to rebuild Louisiana, it faces the prospect of turning to companies with checkered histories that even include disputes with other arms of the government. It's essentially a no-win situation: If officials don't get quick results, they're likely to be criticized for getting bogged down in bureaucracy. But if they push some of the contracting formalities aside, they may find themselves employing unreliable or unsavory companies.

Companies that are involved in earlier disputes with the government are often "so clearly unreliable" that similar problems could well arise during the relief work, says Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a government watchdog in Washington.

FEMA officials say they do have a procedure to review the background of Katrina contractors. First, they check with the General Services Administration to see if a company has been suspended or barred from government contracts. Then they check FEMA's own database to see if the agency has had problems with the contractor in the past. If problems are found, FEMA won't sign up the company.

But such checks aren't likely to disclose much about first-time contractors or about companies that haven't been formally barred from federal work but still face tax liens, criminal investigations or other disputes with other parts of the government. And FEMA doesn't investigate the backgrounds of subcontractors at all, because, as spokesman Michael Widomski says, its work is "specifically through the main contractor."

The potential problems are complicated by the sheer volume of federal money being devoted to rebuilding the Gulf Coast. Yesterday, in response to congressional concerns about potential contracting problems, the Bush administration announced it was hiring FEMA's former acting chief financial officer, Matthew Jadacki, to head a new Office for Hurricane Katrina Oversight, with offices in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. But that may not assuage a bipartisan group of lawmakers that has questioned FEMA's ability to monitor spending. Last week the group proposed legislation to create an independent watchdog modeled on a similar office in Iraq.

GoldStar isn't the only company hired in the wake of Katrina that has had prior run-ins with government agencies. Last month, Illinois state police terminated a $7 million contract with Bode Technology Group Inc., a subcontractor for the company hired by the U.S. to recover and identify Katrina victims. The Springfield, Va., company, which is a division of ChoicePoint Inc., found "false negatives" on many of the samples it was testing for the state police. Bode, which was reviewing rape kits, said it had found no usable evidence in many of the samples. But the state police, which performed its own quality-control tests, found otherwise.

In a written statement, Bode expressed "regret" about the state police decision on the contract and said the dispute centered on an older type of lab work rather than DNA testing.

The Katrina contract has been a lifeline for GoldStar, whose fortunes had plummeted after a meteoric rise. GoldStar Chief Executive Ralph Crall served as the pastor of a small church he founded and funded in East Texas. He launched GoldStar in 1998, along with an associate he met when the two handled public relations for American Medical Response, then the largest private ambulance provider in Texas. The new company soon displaced AMR. At its peak it owned 90 ambulances, two helicopters and two Learjets, held contracts with cities like Galveston and Corpus Christi, and had annual revenue of more than $20 million, Mr. Rothberg says.

But GoldStar's ascent was soon shadowed by accusations of billing irregularities and poor ambulance response times. Since 2003, eleven complaints were lodged against the company with Texas regulators, far more than any other ambulance organization had. A former employee sued, claiming he was fired after reporting "a potentially serious safety concern." And an investigative article in a Houston alternative newspaper, the Houston Press, concluded that the company "maximized profits and growth at the expense of the injured."

Last April, FBI agents raided seven of GoldStar's offices, confiscating patient records and other files as part of an intensive investigation into whether the company and its top executives had committed Medicaid fraud, according to people familiar with the probe. Mr. Rothberg denied wrongdoing and blamed a competitor or disgruntled former employee for lodging the complaint that triggered the probe. Prosecutors in the U.S. attorney's office in Beaumont, Texas, said last week that the investigation is ongoing but declined further comment.

DOJ_NMG_0006611

GoldStar's problems deepened weeks later when tax collectors in Jefferson County sent constables to seize one of the company's jets over an unpaid tax bill of more than $70,000 and made plans to seize its helicopters as well, according to Miriam K. Johnson, the tax assessor there. "It's an unusual move for us to make out here," she says. "We only do it when we know a company is in trouble and we realize we need to protect the county the best we can."

The company filed for bankruptcy protection so that it could keep the helicopters but began scaling back significantly. It pulled out of Jefferson County and a half-dozen other East Texas counties and fired hundreds of workers, reducing its total work force to about 120, Mr. Rothberg says. It also closed a debt-ridden air-service subsidiary called GoldStar Angel Flight, selling off its helicopters and turning its remaining jet over to creditors, he says.

The legal and financial problems had put GoldStar on life support until Katrina hit and its unused ambulances suddenly became a valuable resource. Under the terms of its deal with FEMA, Henderson Consulting is paid $3,100 a day for each ambulance and two-person crew, Mr. Rothberg says. Under the agreement between Henderson and GoldStar, the two companies split the profit on each ambulance equally, he says, allowing each company to net about $800 a vehicle.

John C. Henderson, the owner of Henderson Consulting, says he knew about GoldStar's troubles when he struck the deal but accepted the company's assurances that they would be resolved in its bankruptcy proceedings. "Their legal and financial problems aren't any concern of ours," he says.

Mr. Rothberg, meanwhile, says the company is proud of its work in Texas and hopes its initial monthlong subcontract will be extended. He defends the company's right to win Katrina contracts. "We still live in America, and we're still innocent until proven guilty," he says.

Federal Contractors Seek Liability Shields (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Contractors working on Hurricane Katrina relief efforts for the federal government want Congress to limit their liability from lawsuits and are drafting legislation to seek such protection, industry officials said yesterday.

The Army Corps of Engineers and the Federal Emergency Management Agency have relied on contractors, including several who started work without a contract, to fix the levees in New Orleans and pump water out of the city. But the companies have become concerned about the liability issue because of lawsuits filed against construction firms that helped clean up the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"We're asking for some reasonable limits for going into the Gulf Coast and dealing with unknowns," Michael E. Kennedy, general counsel for the Associated General Contractors of America, said after a meeting of the trade group in Washington. "A contractor goes into an unknown situation to remove debris or fix a utility line, and three years from now someone decides they did it improperly."

The Corps has already contracted with more than a dozen companies for work worth $2.8 billion during the next year. Those companies will be joined by dozens more as reconstruction of the region begins.

The bill that the trade group is drafting would limit contractors' liabilities but still hold them responsible for following government regulations, Kennedy said. It would be similar to regulations the Homeland Security Department unveiled last year that protect companies selling security technology from lawsuits triggered by a terrorist act.

Legislation was introduced in the House last week to shield volunteer contractors from liability. The general contractors' bill would extend the coverage to companies working under the government.

"You can consider these contractors as an extension of the government; they are performing a lot of public" duties, Kennedy said.

Robert S. Boh, president of Boh Bros. Construction Co. of New Orleans, said yesterday that he favors such a bill. His firm moved its New Orleans offices to Baton Rouge, La., after the hurricane hit but was soon hired by the Corps to fix the levees and pump water out of the city.

"We're simply showing up and responding to verbal direction," Boh said. "We're not adequately able to assess the request for risks."

DOJ_NMG_0006612

Also yesterday, the Homeland Security Department's inspector general appointed a National Weather Service official who once served as acting chief financial officer of FEMA to lead the office's work overseeing Katrina spending.

Matthew A. Jadacki, who worked at FEMA from 1991 to 2004, will "be responsible for overseeing the management and expenditures of all contracts, grants and governmental operations related to Hurricane Katrina relief efforts," according to a Homeland Security Department statement.

Jadacki's appointment comes as members of Congress continue to debate other ideas for how the government will monitor the flow of money for Gulf Coast reconstruction. The proposals include establishing a special inspector general's office, expanding the duties of the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction or establishing a chief financial officer.

Some in Congress are concerned that Homeland Security's inspector general's office will not have the resources to monitor the department's regular work, as well as the tens of billions of dollars flowing into the Gulf Coast. Homeland Security Department officials, however, have said the department's IG office is up to the task.

House GOP Scraps Plan For Joint Probe On Hurricane Response (LAT)

By Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Congressional Republicans signaled today that they have abandoned their plan to conduct a joint House-Senate probe of the government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

In announcing a joint probe this month, the Republican leadership had said it would be the most efficient way to investigate the administration's much-criticized initial response to the hurricane. But today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) conceded that he could not overcome Democratic opposition to a joint investigation.

The Democratic leadership has refused to appoint members to a joint committee, citing the lack of equal representation of Democrats on the panel, and the lack of power to issue subpoenas that the majority opposed. Democrats also have insisted on an independent inquiry.

Democratic opposition has left Republicans little maneuvering room for mounting a credible probe. With the joint investigation apparently off the table, Republicans can only hope that Democrats will participate in each chamber's separate investigation. It was far from clear today that Democrats would do that.

In a letter sent to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Frist offered that instead of a joint House-Senate probe, the Senate would conduct its own investigation and "coordinate" its efforts with the House "so as to minimize the burdens placed on those who are coming to Washington, D.C. from the gulf coast region."

Frist also said he was willing to name the members of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs committee as members of the Senate's special panel to probe the disaster. But a spokeswoman for Reid said the majority leader had rejected the proposal.

Meanwhile, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was having no more luck persuading House Democrats to participate in that chamber's probe.

Late last week, Hastert named Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), chairman of the House Governmental Reform Committee, to head the House's special panel investigating the hurricane response. Davis may name Republican members to that committee as early as Tuesday and is planning his first hearing later this week.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) remains adamant that Democrats will not participate in the House committee.

Congress — Again — Misses The Boat (USAT)

By Ross K. Baker

USA Today, September 20, 2005

The first reaction to Hurricane Katrina from members of Congress was not one to inspire confidence in our legislative branch.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., when asked about the devastation in New Orleans, told a Chicago newspaper on Aug. 31 that it made little sense to spend billions of dollars to rebuild a city that is7 feet below sea level. This drew a sharp rejoinder from Louisiana's Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu and compelled Hastert to spend much of the day trying to soften his remarks. The episode set the tone for what was to follow — a rancorous debate over how to get to the bottom of the failure of governments at all levels to cope with the ravages of the storm.

In a well-ordered world, a calamity of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina ought to be the subject of a congressional investigation. From the earliest days of the republic, the House of Representatives and Senate had unquestioned responsibility for probing and, yes, finger-pointing in calamities' aftermath.

That, sadly, is no longer true. Congress has fallen victim to a number of problems that have caused Americans to look elsewhere for answers.

The first of these problems is the fractious spirit of partisanship that has so infected Capitol Hill that no conclusion Congress might reach about who was responsible for the botched response to Katrina would have much legitimacy in the eyes of Americans.

A panel of one party

Republican leaders in Congress proposed the creation of a House-Senate committee to investigate the belated relief efforts. They reached this decision without the involvement of Democrats and further undercut the authority of this committee by announcing that Republican members would outnumber Democrats. Democratic leaders in both houses hastened to denounce the plan and have, thus far, declined to participate.

This kind of partisan bickering caused some lawmakers — Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., most prominently — to call for the establishment of an independent panel modeled on the 9/11 Commission to ferret out the causes of the debacle on the Gulf Coast. A panel, along the lines of that commission, with its widely acclaimed hearings and best-selling report, would satisfy the American people that they were getting the straight story. But it is deeply troubling that only by bypassing Congress would citizens conclude that the truth is being told. In all likelihood, the public would be equally skeptical of a panel dominated by Democrats.

But it is more than partisanship that has impeded Congress' ability to avert or probe causes of disasters. The perverse arrangement of committees supervising agencies responsible for disaster relief also impairs the lawmakers. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and the Coast Guard have their operations monitored by two committees. Fear on the part of congressional committee chairmen of losing control over federal agencies to other committees makes a mockery of accountability.

The money Congress spends to avert disasters such as Katrina are distributed, not to those places at greatest risk, but often to those localities represented by legislators who are most influential.

Spoils go to influential

Homeland security money, for example, went to the organization that operates the ferry to fashionable Martha's Vineyard, and a rural county in Kentucky received money to fend off biological and chemical attacks.

Given the preference of terrorists for spectacular acts of violence against heavily populated places, these grants to inconspicuous rural communities is without justification, yet the heavy-hitters on Capitol Hill have resisted apportioning money to the most vulnerable cities and states and insist that all states get a decent ration of pork.

There are a few bright spots in this otherwise dismal picture of business as usual in Congress. Even before Katrina struck, the House Committee on Homeland Security was upgraded from a "select committee" with no legislative authority to a standing committee that can write and process bills. It has a new chairman, Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., who is likely to be sensitive to the security needs of large cities.

On Friday, Sept. 16, the Republican and Democratic leaders of the Senate agreed to put aside, for the time being, the question of how the joint House-Senate committee would be organized and concentrate instead on expediting spending bills to aid the hurricane victims. This does not dispose of the issue but at least enables Congress to deal immediately with the most pressing problems of recovery.

But even these few glimmers of hope can quickly dim if relief and reconstruction after the hurricane degenerate into squabbles over pork, turf and partisan credit. It's truly an ill wind that blows no good, and perhaps one beneficial result of Katrina would be to infuse Congress with a new determination to restore itself to being the place we turn to for help — and for answers.

DOJ_NMG_0006614

Ross K. Baker is a political science professor at Rutgers University. He also is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Storm Threat Halts Returns To New Orleans (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 19 -- With Tropical Storm Rita bearing down on the Gulf of Mexico and growing political pressure from federal leaders, Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Monday that New Orleans residents could not return home after all and that any people already in the city should evacuate.

Nagin had been allowing business owners to return over the weekend, and on Monday residents of one dry neighborhood were to return to their homes. But Nagin reversed himself and ordered another mandatory evacuation, to begin Wednesday, just hours after President Bush questioned whether the city was safe enough for people to return.

"We are suspending all reentry into the city of New Orleans as of this moment," Nagin said. The mayor said he backed away from his earlier decision because of fresh fears about Rita, which forecasters said could become a hurricane by Tuesday.

"If we are off, I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," Nagin said.

The city's levees, overwhelmed by Hurricane Katrina, "are still in very weak condition" and many of the pumps used to push the mucky floodwaters back into Lake Pontchartrain are not yet operating, Nagin said. If Rita were to dump nine inches of rain on New Orleans, the result would be "three to four feet of flooding in most parts of the city," he said.

Asked if anything could be done to buttress the levee system before Rita were to strike, Nagin replied: "Just tell people to run."

Current weather projections indicate that Rita, which was threatening Key West, Fla., Monday night, could roar across the Gulf and strike the lower portions of Louisiana by the weekend. If, as some suggest, New Orleans sits on the "eastern side of the storm, we take the brunt of it," Nagin said.

As New Orleans residents faced the grim prospect of an even slower recovery, state officials put the still-rising Katrina death toll at 736 in Louisiana and the overall toll at 973.

Bush administration officials and Nagin have sparred publicly and in private in recent days over the mayor's push to demonstrate that New Orleans will be back in business soon. Last Thursday, he laid out a plan to permit up to 182,000 people to return over the course of 10 days.

Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard chief of staff tapped by Bush to lead the federal response here, said that move was "extremely problematic." Allen said it was dangerous to invite tens of thousands of people into a city with little clean water, a severely compromised sewer system, a manual 911 emergency call system and few hospitals or traffic lights.

Nagin, interviewed over the weekend in Dallas by Fox News, questioned Allen's credentials: "Since I have been away a day or two, maybe he's the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

That prompted Bush to reinforce Allen's message, telling reporters he was taking the unusual step of commenting publicly to be certain the mayor got the message.

"We have made our position loud and clear," the president said Monday.

Although he defended his initial plan to reopen New Orleans, Nagin said the new decision to evacuate was based solely on long-range projections that show Rita has the potential to bring high winds and downpours to a city ill-equipped to handle another natural disaster.

"This is not a diversion," he said from his new command center in a downtown hotel. "This is a real threat."

Initially criticized for failing to move many of the city's impoverished black residents out on the weekend prior to Katrina, Nagin promised a more aggressive approach to the evacuation set to begin Wednesday.

"I don't play around with hurricanes," Nagin said. "I've seen Katrina."

Although Nagin said he would turn to active-duty soldiers and the National Guard to help the city's depleted police department enforce the new evacuation order, a Pentagon official said that is not the role of the military.

DOJ_NMG_0006615

"They have not asked us to help them take anyone out of the city at this time," said Brig. Gen. Mark A. Graham, deputy commanding general of Fifth U.S. Army, which oversees the 82nd Airborne Division and other active-duty Army forces in the region. "We don't forcibly evacuate anyone. That's a law enforcement job."

The Department of Defense was also evaluating whether to send out to sea vessels such as the warship USS Iwo Jima, which is tied up at a Mississippi River dock in downtown New Orleans and is serving as command center for the military in the region.

"I'm certain they are contemplating that" because ships "have a better chance of riding out the storm" at sea than if they are tied up to moorings, said Maj. John Thomas, a spokesman for the federal recovery effort in Baton Rouge, La.

Many emergency responders who have helped rescue survivors and locate the dead here were pondering their next move, weighing whether they ought to flee before Rita's arrival or hunker down.

Alexandria, La., Police Capt. John Henderson, who is helping run the city's command center, said aides were drawing up evacuation plans that would enable out-of-town relief workers to move to high ground if necessary later in the week.

Throughout the day, there were pockets of activity in Algiers, the neighborhood across the Mississippi River where residents were officially permitted to return. Even before Nagin's announcement, most residents said they had no intention of staying.

"I just came to clean up, salvage as much as I can," said Ramsey Washington, who drove back from his temporary home in Houston. "It's not livable. They got no jobs. No banks are open."

Sonia Badon, 35, has already rented an apartment in Baton Rouge; her employer has relocated his computer company there, too. On Monday, she and her boss and two friends were nailing a tarp onto the roof of her Halsey Avenue home.

Although her best friend has moved to Nashville in search of a job, Badon said she will return to her native New Orleans. But for now, she said with sweat rolling down her face, "It's too soon to come back."

City Clears Out Again (USAT)

By Laura Parker And Alan Levin

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Mayor Ray Nagin on Monday reversed his call for people to return to the city and ordered most people out over worries that a new tropical storm could flood the city again.

The announcement came after President Bush and the federal government's Hurricane Katrina response team urged the mayor to reconsider his plans, saying the city was not safe.

“The levee system is still in a weakened condition,” Nagin said at a late-afternoon news briefing. “Any type of storm will put the east bank of the city in harm's way.”

Tropical Storm Rita, which is heading toward the Gulf of Mexico, could become a major hurricane, the National Weather Service said.

Earlier in the day, Nagin had criticized Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen for publicly imploring him to stop people from returning. He called Allen a “good man” but said, “There's only one mayor of New Orleans, and I'm it.”

Allen warned that the city's water was largely undrinkable and its hospitals not working. He said there was no evacuation plan in case new floods rose from another storm, so residents should stay out.

Bush urged the mayor to heed Allen and reconsider. Nagin and Allen met later in the day.

“He's got this dream about having a city up and running, and we share that dream,” Bush said. “But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans.”

Nagin planned to have one-third of the city's 460,000 people return over the next week and a half. On Monday, he ordered everyone out except for people in Algiers, a neighborhood that was the first to be reopened. Thousands of people returned there Monday, but Nagin warned them to be ready to leave.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco told coastal residents to be ready to go. “We will weather this storm as we have weathered Katrina,” she said.

DOJ_NMG_0006616

Kelly Jordan, 27, who was dispensing pizzas from a trailer to emergency workers, said Nagin erred by reopening. “If he hadn't let people back in too soon, he wouldn't be having this problem,” she said. “He should have at least waited until the boil order (for water) was lifted.”

Mayor Suspends Flow Of People To New Orleans (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 19 - Under pressure from President Bush and with a new storm threatening the Gulf of Mexico, Mayor C. Ray Nagin suspended on Monday his controversial plan to allow people to return to this vulnerable city.

Instead Mr. Nagin called for a "mandatory" evacuation of many of the residents who have returned or never left.

"This is a different type of event," the mayor said of the storm, Rita. "Our levee systems are still in a very weak condition. Our pumping stations are not at full capacity, and any type of storm that heads this way and hits us will put the east bank of Orleans Parish in very significant harm's way. So I'm encouraging everyone to leave."

The mayor reversed himself hours after Mr. Bush had questioned whether it was safe for residents to return. The president reiterated warnings by Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, leader of the federal recovery effort, that the levee system was weakened, that the 911 emergency telephone system was not working, that the hospitals remained closed and that pollutants were in the air and water.

"Admiral Allen speaks for the administration," Mr. Bush said on Monday in Washington. "We have made our position loud and clear. The mayor needs to hear, and so do the people of New Orleans, our objective.

"Listen, I went there and stood in Jackson Square to say we want this city to re-emerge. As I said, I can't imagine America without a vibrant New Orleans. It's just a matter of timing, and there's issues to be dealt with.

"If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break. And so therefore, we're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history."

The dispute over access reflected three weeks of tension, despite public reconciliations, between federal and local authorities over the response to Hurricane Katrina, which struck on Aug. 29.

Mr. Nagin said the new storm and sewer problems, but not political problems, had prompted the change.

"I understand the federal government was a little, uh, excited about the plan," he said. "They didn't feel as though conditions were quite right. But my thought has always been that if we have this many resources in the city working cooperatively, then we could correct just about any situation that was out there."

Forecasters said the new storm, which passed through the Bahamas on Monday, was expected to strengthen into a major hurricane in the Gulf of Mexico this week and potentially strike Texas, near the Louisiana border. The mayor asked people remaining in the city to leave or at least "be prepared" to evacuate as soon as Wednesday, depending on the storm track.

The terms of the evacuation were not fully clear. The mayor said the east bank of the city, which includes historic neighborhoods like the French Quarter, as well as those most devastated by flooding, was under the same mandatory evacuation he issued before Hurricane Katrina. But he said people in those areas would not yet be forced to leave.

Mr. Nagin and Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, said buses would be in place to remove people who needed transportation. In a statement after the mayor's announcement, the city said it that it had requested 200 buses and that it already had 150. If the storm threatens the city, the plan calls for residents to start boarding the buses 48 hours before the projected landfall from the Ernest M. Morial Convention Center downtown and from Behman Stadium in the Algiers section.

The governor said more details of the plan would be available on Tuesday.

In Algiers, a section of the city across the Mississippi that did not flood, Mr. Nagin asked residents to "be prepared to evacuate as early as Wednesday." He made that call hours after the city had officially begun letting residents return to that area, the first major neighborhood, with 60,000 people before the storm, to reopen.

Word of another potential evacuation was met with some acceptance, some resistance and much frustration in Algiers. After a long drive home from Pensacola, Fla., Roy McGinnis parked his Dodge Caravan on Magellan Street, home at last.

DOJ_NMG_0006617

"I can't take another evacuation," Mr. Magellan said. "I have my grandchildren with me. I have my whole family with me. The first storm to hit, we haven't gotten over that yet. We've been on the road. We can't get back on the road.

Others were less defiant. Diane Craik, a real estate broker who had stayed in San Diego during Hurricane Katrina, made a half joke about moving to California for good.

"If they say evacuate, we're going," Ms. Craik said. "It's crazy. This is just stuff. I wouldn't stay for stuff."

The death toll in Louisiana from Hurricane Katrina rose to 737 on Monday, from 646 on Sunday.

By Monday afternoon, a police officer on Interstate 10 turned away all residents going into the city because of the new storm threat. Just contractors and the news media entered, said the officer, Gus James.

Some low-lying areas close to Lake Pontchartain remain under water.

"Three inches will cause some flooding," Col. Terry J. Ebbert, homeland security director of the city, said about more rain.

"The real problem," he said, citing the weakened levees, "is storm surge."

The Army Corps of Engineers has warned for days that the repaired levee system around the city, most of which is below sea level, would not protect the area from another hurricane or even a heavy storm.

"Initially when the storm struck, we thought they might be in a little better condition," a spokesman for the corps, Eugene A. Pawlik, said. "We had not had the opportunity to go out and do a full inspection of the levees."

Now, Mr. Pawlik said, it is clear that the city "can't take much of a hit."

After inspections, the corps has found that many areas of levees that had been "overtopped" have become significantly lower than their designed heights. Some levee stretches, including those along the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet canal, have been entirely eroded away, from original heights of 17 feet "to almost ground level," Mr. Pawlik said.

In the coming months, the corps plans to work through three phases. The first one to close the gaps in the levees, the second to rebuild the levees to their former height and the third to return the levees to their pre-storm structural strength.

The corps plans to have the third phase completed by next June, when the 2006 hurricane season begins. The repairs would restore the levees only to their strength before Hurricane Katrina.

The mayor, asked whether the city could allow residents to safely return at a point in the near future, knowing that hurricane seasons does not end until Nov. 30, said the city would resume its phased in re-entries in some form after the threat from the new storm had passed.

He emphasized that the program was not intended for everyone in a city with no open schools and no public transportation.

"I think we can, as long as those are mobile residents that come back and as long as we're not encouraging children to come back and elderly," Mr. Nagin said. "I think we can do it. We need a very flexible citizen that comes back. And I think our citizens are smart enough to understand the difference."

A spokesman for the Louisiana Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparation, Mark Smith, said emergency personnel would also have to be evacuated if the new storm turned toward New Orleans. He said 16,000 National Guard and regular Army soldiers were in New Orleans, along with several thousand workers from contractors for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, FEMA employees and other relief workers would be affected.

Mayor Nagin has said the federal presence proves how safe the city is after widespread looting and violence in the first days after Hurricane Katrina. But he has also resisted federal intervention at times.

Noting that Admiral Allen had urged residents not to return, the mayor said: "The admiral's a good man. I respect him. But when he starts talking to the citizens of New Orleans, that's kind of out of his lane. There's only one mayor of New Orleans and I'm it."

Bush Questions Reopening Of New Orleans (AJC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Criticized for weeks for failing to react aggressively enough to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush on Monday put some muscle behind concerns that a new tropical storm could again deluge New Orleans and the people being allowed to return to the ruined city.

DOJ_NMG_0006618

It worked. Six hours after Bush questioned New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's plan to bring as many as a third of the city's population back over the next week, Nagin reversed course and said he was suspending it.

Appearing at the White House with his homeland security council, Bush said he had "deep concern" about the possibility that Tropical Storm Rita, which was headed toward the Florida Keys, could move into the Gulf of Mexico and impact New Orleans.

"If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break," Bush said. Among the many other concerns are a lack of drinkable water and fears about contamination levels in the remaining floodwaters and the muck left behind in drained areas.

As Bush spoke, residents had begun trickling back into the city.

Besides the president's public words, White House chief of staff Andrew Card pressed the point on the phone with Nagin. And Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, head of the federal government's hurricane response, delivered federal officials' concerns to Nagin later Monday — after appearing on numerous TV shows to express dismay with the city plan.

"The mayor needs to hear him. So do the people of New Orleans," Bush said. "We're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history."

The president stressed that it's not a question of if residents return, but when — "it's just a matter of timing," he said. And the White House rebuffed any discussion of forcing the city to bend to Washington's wishes, preferring to let discussions take their course.

At a news conference in New Orleans, Nagin not only said the reopening was off, but that everyone who was in the city needed to evacuate because of Rita. "I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," he said.

Bush, however, continuing his effort to undo the political damage from the bumbled early response by keeping a heavy storm-related schedule, was heading into New Orleans. Making his fifth trip to the hurricane zone, the president was meeting Tuesday with local officials and business leaders in Gulfport, Miss., followed by a stop to a business trying to get back on its feet.

He planned to return south Friday and Saturday, traveling to Alabama, Texas and Arkansas. "The trip will be an opportunity for the president to personally thank some cities and states that have taken in large numbers of our fellow citizens affected by Katrina," said White House press secretary Scott McClellan.

Being away from Washington on Saturday will keep Bush far from an anti-war march that organizers hope will attract 100,000 people. The demonstration is expected to include Cindy Sheehan, the California mother of a soldier killed in Iraq.

Sheehan, who set up camp outside Bush's Texas ranch in August and drew thousands of fellow protesters, has been on a 25-state bus tour scheduled to end at the Washington march.

On another front, 21 House Republicans sent a letter demanding that Bush find offsets in the budget to defray the massive cost of rebuilding the Gulf Coast. Conservatives, worried that the deficit will balloon, have been alarmed at the pace of spending with no talk of how to pay for it.

"We find this fiscal situation troublesome and urge your administration to follow the examples of previous administrations facing fiscal difficulties in time of emergencies and exercise spending restraint," said the Sept. 15 letter by Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., suggested dropping the Medicare prescription drug plan, which he has long opposed. "It was supposed to cost $400 billion dollars," he told CBS Evening News. "It's now up to $700 billion. We ought to cancel it, go back to square one."

Bush on Friday ruled out raising taxes to pay Katrina expenses and said other government spending must be cut. His aides have said, though, that no such cuts have yet been identified and that the hurricane relief effort will temporarily swell the deficit. Estimates of the final cost have reached $200 billion and more.

—

Associated Press writer Jonathan M. Katz in Washington contributed to this story.

—

On the Net:

White House: http://www.whitehouse.gov

DOJ_NMG_0006619

New Orleans Suspends Reopening Of City (AJC/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Under pressure from President Bush and other top federal officials, the mayor suspended the reopening of large portions of the city Monday and instead ordered nearly everyone out because of the risk of a new round of flooding from a tropical storm on the way.

"If we are off, I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," Mayor Ray Nagin said.

The announcement came after repeated warnings from top federal officials — and the president himself — that New Orleans was not safe enough to reopen. Among other things, federal officials warned that Tropical Storm Rita could breach the city's temporarily patched-up levees and swamp the city all over again.

The official death toll from Hurricane Katrina reached 973 across the Gulf Coast, with the number in Louisiana alone rising by 90 to 736.

The mayor reversed course even as residents began trickling back to the first neighborhood opened as part of his plan, the less damaged Algiers section.

Nagin wanted to reopen some of the city's signature neighborhoods over the coming week to reassure the people of New Orleans that "there was a city to come back to."

But "now we have conditions that have changed. We have another hurricane that is approaching us," Nagin said. He warned that the city's pumping system was not yet running at full capacity and that the levees were still in a "very weak position."

The mayor ordered residents who circumvented checkpoints and slipped back into still-closed parts of the city, including the French Quarter, to leave immediately.

Nagin also urged everyone already settled back into Algiers to be ready to evacuate as early as Wednesday. The city requested 200 buses to help if necessary.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, in a televised address Monday, also urged residents of coastal southwest Louisiana to be prepared to leave. More evacuees would strain the shelters in Texas, she said, so she urged people to head for central and northern Louisiana instead.

"We will pray that Rita will not devastate Louisiana, but today we do not know the answer to that question," Blanco said.

Tropical Storm Rita was headed toward the Florida Keys and was expected to become a hurricane, cross the Gulf of Mexico and reach Texas or Mexico by the weekend. But forecasters said it could veer toward Louisiana and New Orleans' weakened levees.

"We're watching Tropical Storm Rita's projected path and, depending on its strength and how much rain falls, everything could change," said Col. Duane Gapinski, of the Army Corps of Engineers task force draining New Orleans and repairing levees.

The dispute over the mayor's plan to quickly reopen New Orleans and bring back about 180,000 of the city's half-million inhabitants was just the latest example of the lack of federal-local coordination that has marked the disaster almost from the start.

Nagin saw a quick reopening as a way to get the storm-battered city back in the business of luring tourists. But federal officials warned it would be premature, pointing out much of the area does not yet have full electricity, drinkable water, 911 service or working hospitals.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who heads the federal recovery effort in the region, went on one news show after another over the weekend to warn that city services may not be able to handle an influx of people.

Allen said repeatedly that he intended to have a frank discussion with Nagin about his concerns on Monday, but the two didn't meet until after Nagin held a news conference to announce he was suspending re-entry to the city, a mayor's spokeswoman said.

Nagin had spent the weekend in Dallas, where he moved his family and has enrolled his daughter in school, and he missed an appointment with Allen because his flight home was delayed, she said.

Earlier, a clearly agitated Nagin had snapped that Allen had apparently made himself "the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

DOJ_NMG_0006620

Allen tried unsuccessfully to reach the mayor by cell phone over the weekend, a Coast Guard spokesman. President Bush said White House chief of staff Andrew Card had also been pressing Nagin to pull back on the plan.

With the approach of Rita, Bush added his own voice to the mix, saying he had "deep concern" about the possibility that New Orleans' levees could be breached again.

In addition, Bush said there are significant environmental concerns. New Orleans still lacks safe drinking water, and there are fears about the contamination in the remaining floodwaters and the muck left behind in drained areas of the city.

"The mayor — you know, he's got this dream about having a city up and running, and we share that dream," the president said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

About 20 percent of the city is still flooded, down from a high of about 80 percent after Katrina, and the water was expected to be pumped out by Sept. 30.

But officials with the Army Corps of Engineers said the repairs to the levees breached by Katrina are not yet strong enough to prevent flooding in a moderate storm, much less another hurricane. Brig. Gen. Robert Crear said Monday they hope to have the levees capable of handling a Category 3 storm by June, the start of hurricane season.

Nagin did not give any specifics about how he plans to enforce the renewed evacuation order.

In the raucous French Quarter, about a half-mile from where Nagin made his announcement, businesses were getting up and running, and bars were serving cold beers to National Guardsmen and passers-by.

Del Juneau, owner of a Bourbon Street lingerie shop, said it would be premature to order an evacuation based on the storm nearing Florida. "Where are you going to go? What are you going to do?" he said. "I'm not going anywhere."

Down the street at the Famous Door, bartender C.B. Dover, said: "If we have a forced evacuation, we'll go. If it's not forced, we're not going anywhere." Dover said the mayor "has been overreacting the whole time. ... He's reacting emotionally, and you can't do that."

Earlier in the day, as residents began streaming in at the mayor's invitation, cars were backed for two hours at an Interstate 10 checkpoint into the city. Tractor-trailers, emergency vehicles and National Guard trucks shared the highway with cars towing trailers full of hurricane gear and pickup trucks with their beds loaded with water, cleaning materials and coolers.

It was clear that at least some of the traffic was headed to sections of the city that had not yet officially opened.

Algiers, a neighborhood of 57,000 just across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter, is home to many of the companies that make floats for Mardi Gras parades. Unlike much of the rest of the city, it saw little damage from Hurricane Katrina three weeks ago and has electricity and drinkable water.

"Obviously we need to get businesses up and running any way we can," said Barry Kern, whose float businesses is stocked to the rafters with oversized imaginary creatures. "If we don't start somewhere, where do we start?"

Elsewhere across the city, where the damage was more severe, much of the sentiment seemed to be with the mayor and his attempts to reopen the city quickly.

"Send Bush here and we'll make him a po' boy and tell him to leave us alone," Kathleen Horn said as she cleaned up the debris piled in front of Slim Goodies Diner on Magazine Street in Uptown.

New Storm Halts Reopening Of Big Easy (WT/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- The mayor yesterday suspended residents' re-entry into the city and ordered nearly everyone out, fearing a new round of flooding from an incoming tropical storm, just as about 90 percent of floodwaters had been pumped out.

"If we are off, I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," said Mayor C. Ray Nagin, who was implementing a plan to open large parts of city, including the French Quarter, over the objections of federal officials.

President Bush and other top federal officials yesterday said New Orleans was not safe to reopen, warning that, among other things, Tropical Storm Rita could breach the city's temporarily patched-up levees and swamp the city all over again.

DOJ_NMG_0006621

News of Mr. Nagin's reversal came as the death toll from Hurricane Katrina reached 973 across the Gulf Coast, with an increase in Louisiana by 90 to 736, and as U.S. Army Corps of Engineers officials predicted that they would have the floodwaters removed from the city by Sept. 30 -- about five months faster than initial estimates.

"We have another hurricane that is approaching us," Mr. Nagin said, warning that the city's pumping system was not running at full capacity and that the levees were still in a "very weak position."

He ordered residents who circumvented checkpoints and slipped back into the still officially closed parts of the city to leave immediately. Those areas include the historic French Quarter, the Garden District, Uptown and the central business district.

Mr. Nagin also urged everyone already settled back into Algiers to be ready to evacuate as early as tomorrow. The city requested 200 buses to help if necessary.

Tropical Storm Rita was headed toward the Florida Keys and was expected to become a hurricane, cross the Gulf of Mexico and reach Texas or Mexico by the weekend. But forecasters said it could also veer toward Louisiana.

"We're watching Tropical Storm Rita's projected path and, depending on its strength and how much rain falls, everything could change. Residents moving into the area may have to evacuate again," said Col. Duane Gapinski, commander of the Army Corps of Engineers task force that is draining New Orleans and repairing the levees.

Under the mayor's plan, Algiers opened yesterday, and Uptown, the Garden District and the French Quarter were supposed to reopen one ZIP code at a time between Wednesday and next Monday, bringing about 180,000 of New Orleans' half-million inhabitants back.

The dispute over reopening large parts of the city was just the latest example of the lack of federal-local coordination that has marked the disaster practically from the start.

Mr. Nagin saw a quick reopening as a way to get the storm-battered city back in the business of luring tourists. But federal officials warned that such a move could be a few weeks premature, pointing out much of the area does not have full electricity, drinkable water, 911 service or working hospitals.

With the approach of Rita, Mr. Bush added his voice, saying he had "deep concern" about the possibility that New Orleans' levees could be breached again.

Mr. Bush said White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. had been pressing the matter with Mr. Nagin. The concerns were also echoed by the top federal official in charge in New Orleans, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, who appeared on one news show after another to warn that city services might not be able to handle the influx of people.

Before reversing course yesterday, a clearly agitated Mr. Nagin snapped that Adm. Allen had apparently made himself "the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

It was not known whether Mr. Nagin met with Adm. Allen, who said this weekend that he intended to have a frank discussion with the mayor yesterday.

About 13 percent of the city is still flooded, down from a high of about 80 percent after Katrina hit, a top Army Corps of Engineers official told the Los Angeles Times.

But officials said the repairs to the levees breached by Katrina are not strong enough to prevent flooding in a moderate storm, much less another hurricane.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, in a televised address yesterday, also urged residents of coastal southwestern Louisiana to be prepared to leave. More evacuees would strain the shelters in Texas, she said, so she urged people to head for central and northern Louisiana instead.

"We will pray that Rita will not devastate Louisiana, but today we do not know the answer to that question," she said.

In the raucous French Quarter, about a half-mile from where Mr. Nagin made his announcement, businesses were getting up and running and were serving cold beers to National Guardsmen and passers-by.

Del Juneau, owner of a Bourbon Street lingerie shop, said it would be premature to order an evacuation based on the storm nearing Florida.

"Where are you going to go? What are you going to do?" he said. "I'm not going anywhere."

Reopening Of Parts Of New Orleans Delayed (KRT)

DOJ_NMG_0006622

By Gary Estwick, Susannah A. Nesmith And Eric Frazier

Knight Ridder, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Facing the threat of another powerful storm and besieged by questions from President Bush and others, Mayor Ray Nagin on Monday halted the reopening of large sections of the city.

And anyone who is holding out on the city's east bank - the main part of the city - should evacuate, he said.

"I am urging and encouraging everyone who knows of someone who may be at their homes somewhere in Orleans Parish ... to call them and encourage them to leave the city," Nagin said.

Within about an hour of his announcement, security tightened in several parts of the city.

Flooding from Tropical Storm Rita, which is expected to develop into a hurricane, is possible because the city's levees are weak and its pumping stations are not operating at capacity, Nagin said.

He warned that residents he had invited back Monday to neighborhoods in the Algiers section of the city, across the Mississippi River from the city's east bank, might have to turn around and leave Wednesday.

Although most forecasts project Rita will hit Texas as a major hurricane, Nagin said some scenarios show it crashing into the Louisiana coast.

The Army Corps of Engineers said Monday that if Rita veers toward New Orleans, heavy rainfall could flood the northern and some central parts of the city with two to four feet of water.

The developments came on a day when the death toll from Hurricane Katrina rose to 973, with 90 more bodies reported in Louisiana.

Nagin made his decision after a weekend of questions about the city's readiness, raised first by the federal commander of relief efforts in New Orleans, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, and underscored on Monday by Bush.

"There is deep concern about this storm causing more flooding in New Orleans," Bush said.

Earlier in the day, Nagin had defended his plan to repopulate the city.

"The admiral is a good man. I respect him. But when he starts talking for the citizens of New Orleans, he's kind of out of his range," Nagin said. "There is only one mayor of New Orleans, and I'm it."

Nagin said the hurricane was not providing him an excuse to follow the advice of federal officials, and pledged to resume his plan as soon as Rita's danger has passed.

Forced evacuations on the east bank are being considered. Residents are not supposed to be living in that area now, but have not been forcibly removed. The city cannot estimate the number of people there now, but at least several hundred are living there.

Nagin's repopulation plan had barely begun, and the return of residents to Algiers on Monday was more a trickle than a stampede.

The mayor last week announced plans to reopen the city's Garden District later this week, followed by the historic French Quarter, but backed off a specific timetable when federal officials cautioned that he was moving too quickly.

Earlier Monday, a number of state officials also urged caution.

Bill Doran, chief of operations for the Louisiana Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, said levees damaged by Hurricane Katrina could fail if faced with any type of tropical storm or unusual high tide. Some of the major evacuation routes used as Hurricane Katrina approached are now unusable, Doran said.

"We want to do it," he said of Nagin's repopulation plan, "but not in a hasty method that would put those people in harm's way."

Should Rita threaten the area, there would be far fewer people to evacuate because so many are still outside New Orleans. But there are more than 16,000 National Guard troops and other rescue workers in the area, said Mark Smith, a spokesman for the state homeland security office. They would have to be evacuated, and the state is already making plans to do so if Rita approaches.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco urged residents in southwestern Louisiana to begin making preparations to leave if necessary. She said FEMA has buses to help those who can't evacuate on their own, and a task force is arranging shelters.

DOJ_NMG_0006623

"We are in a very dangerous place," she said. "Because we do not know where this hurricane will end up, we are taking Rita very, very seriously."

A few people trickled back on Monday to Algiers, which escaped the city's most serious damage. Some people never left, and others had managed to get in shortly after Katrina passed.

Over the past week, they have been sustaining the rest of the city.

"We're like ground zero for the National Guard and Immigration dirty clothes," said Jim Ritchie, owner of the Spin Stop.

Algiers is where rescue workers, soldiers and journalists can get fresh laundry, gas, cigarettes, even a cold Coke or beer.

At a Red Cross assistance center set up at a high school, volunteers were having trouble giving away hot meals. There just wasn't much need in Algiers.

"I would welcome anybody. We've got a ton of food and I don't want it to go bad," said volunteer Charles Way of New Jersey. The center was the first to open anywhere in the city of New Orleans.

Pamela Gregory was glad to get the help. She had stayed through the storm, but found that neighboring Jefferson Parish wouldn't let her in to buy supplies.

"I'm so hungry," she said, laughing. "I've lost weight since this thing happened. A co-worker brought us in some supplies. She lives in Jefferson Parish so they'll let her in. But we've been getting pretty low around here."

The mayor's hope that the city would start returning Monday, beginning with Algiers, seemed dashed on this neighborhood's deserted streets.

Timothy Allen came Monday to gather his belongings, but he was headed back to Texas.

"Even though the house is OK, I'm a physician at Baptist Hospital and it's closed," he explained, a bit melancholy to be leaving a neighborhood his three little children loved. "This is a great neighborhood. We walk to the park, and I take the ferry over to the aquarium with my daughter. But because of the situation in the rest of the city, we can't come back for now."

New Orleans Mayor Halts Return Of City's Residents (LAT)

By Scott Gold, Susannah Rosenblatt And Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Facing pressure from Washington and with another storm system on the way, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin halted his campaign to repopulate the city Monday and ordered the few residents and business owners who had returned to leave again.

Three weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast, flooding New Orleans, Tropical Storm Rita was expected to bear down Tuesday on the Florida Keys -- where all 80,000 residents have been told to evacuate. Rita then is likely to move over the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico, where officials said it could strengthen into a Category 3 hurricane.

Rita could make landfall on the Gulf Coast as early as Thursday, although Friday or Saturday is more likely.

According to government forecasts Monday night, the storm could land anywhere from northern Mexico to Mississippi. But Nagin said his advisers had determined Rita most likely would strike near the island community of Galveston, Texas -- where authorities were planning evacuations starting Tuesday afternoon -- or pass to the west of New Orleans.

If Rita makes landfall anywhere near New Orleans and its damaged levee system, it could send water cascading into a city just starting to dry out after Katrina.

Nagin said a three-foot storm surge, which can be kicked up by even a moderate tropical storm, would leave as much as four feet of water in New Orleans. Rita was expected to rake the Keys with an eight-foot storm surge; authorities said that even if Rita's eye strikes in Texas, it could still send a three-foot surge to New Orleans.

"I'd rather err on the side of conservatism," Nagin said in ordering residents back out of the city. "Today there is a significant threat of this thing turning north. ... Any type of storm that heads this way and hits us will put Orleans Parish in a very vulnerable position."

Nagin said he considers the threat from Rita equal to that posed by Katrina, but called it "a different event" because there were not a significant number of people left in the city.

DOJ_NMG_0006624

As Katrina approached New Orleans, authorities had issued a mandatory evacuation. And with the city under water after the storm, they threatened to use force to remove stragglers from their homes. But many refused to leave, and the city backed down. Residents since have trickled back to the city despite roadblocks, a collapsed infrastructure and the threat of toxic sludge.

Last weekend, Nagin allowed some business owners to return. On Monday, he opened the Algiers section -- across the Mississippi River from the central business district -- to residents, and thousands of cars streamed back into the city. Then the mayor said everyone needed to be out again by Wednesday.

"I am hopeful that people have seen the threat of Katrina and that they understand the threat," he said.

Asked whether he expected that some people would refuse to leave, Nagin said: "We're all adults."

"All I can do is tell you exactly what I'm seeing," he said. "If anybody wants to sit this out ... God bless them."

Meanwhile, energy prices skyrocketed in New York futures trading Monday over worries that Rita would deliver another blow to the key Gulf Coast oil and natural gas production region.

Oil futures jumped $4.39 to close at $67.39 a barrel. Natural gas surged to a record $12.663 per million British thermal units, up $1.519.

As oil companies began evacuating workers from production platforms and drilling rigs in the Gulf on Monday, experts predicted the recent decline in retail gasoline prices could come to a halt.

Nagin had clashed with federal officials in recent days over his proposal to bring 180,000 residents back into the city by the end of the month.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, head of the federal government's relief effort, had encouraged Nagin to slow down -- citing lingering environmental threats and lack of a potable water, a 911 system and operable sewer pipes, among other problems.

While calling Allen "a good man," Nagin said that he was only attempting to repopulate the safest portions of the city; he reminded Allen that "there is only one mayor of New Orleans."

President Bush jumped into the debate Monday, citing a "deep concern" about Rita. Bush said he disagreed with Nagin's efforts to allow residents to return to New Orleans, but called it "just a matter of timing."

"The mayor has got this dream about having a city up and running. And we share that dream," Bush said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. spoke with Nagin by telephone Monday before the mayor announced he was halting the effort to bring residents back.

Authorities were staging buses outside New Orleans Monday night that could be used to ferry residents to safety. Nagin said he planned to amass 200 buses, and that evacuations would begin 48 hours before projected landfall. Citizens would be loaded onto buses at the New Orleans Convention Center along the Mississippi River and at Behrman Stadium in Algiers.

Another 350 buses also are ready west of New Orleans to begin evacuations at shelters housing thousands of people who fled Katrina.

New Orleans Mayor Reverses Plan To Reopen Parts Of The City (WSJ)

By Rick Brooks And Corey Dade

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, already under criticism from federal officials and the White House for reopening parts of the city too early, reversed his plans and ordered those returning to their homes and businesses to leave before the area is threatened by another major storm later this week.

Yesterday's announcement by the mayor was a major setback in efforts to bring life back to New Orleans, about 15% of which still is underwater three weeks after Katrina barreled past the city. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers warned that Rita, which was expected to reach hurricane strength last night in the Bahamas and is expected today to approach the Florida Keys before entering the Gulf of Mexico, could inundate some areas with as much as four feet of additional rain and floodwaters.

While breaches of levees along three canals in New Orleans have been at least temporarily closed, more than a dozen breaches remain in neighboring St. Bernard Parish. Army Corps officials said some levees that weren't breached during the storm were nonetheless damaged by Katrina so badly that they could be defenseless against another storm surge. If Rita approached New Orleans, metal pilings would be used to attempt to block water from Lake Pontchartrain from flowing into two canals that flooded large parts of the city after Katrina struck. There is no guarantee of how well that would work.

DOJ_NMG_0006625

Mr. Nagin denied that criticism from the White House had anything to do with his reversal. "All I can tell you is exactly what I'm seeing," he said at a news conference. "If anybody wants to sit this storm out with rain-soaked levee systems ... then God bless 'em."

The National Hurricane Center said Rita could make landfall anywhere from southern Texas to the Louisiana-Mississippi border. Galveston, Texas, officials yesterday called for a voluntary evacuation beginning today if Rita's storm track remains unchanged. Officials said they would consider calling for a mandatory evacuation by tomorrow.

In 1900, an estimated 8,000 residents of Galveston and surrounding towns died from a storm that remains the most deadly to hit the mainland U.S. The island has no coastal marshes or other natural barriers.

It isn't clear how many residents and business owners were trying to return to New Orleans. Yesterday, cars and trucks along Interstate 10 were gridlocked for more than a mile as authorities at a checkpoint allowed only one vehicle to pass at a time. Some frustrated motorists turned into the grassy median and went back the way they came.

United Parcel Service Inc. made its first deliveries in the city's central business district, sending four trucks, but found few recipients. "Nothing but soldiers and cops," said UPS driver Ricky Folse, 35 years old, his eyes darting out both sides of the truck as he looked for regular customers along Canal Street.

At one stop, David Munn, owner of Orleans Optical, emerged from his store dripping sweat and wearing a pair of latex gloves and black rubber boots up to his knees. "Who are you going to sell to?" asked Mr. Munn, who had pulled enough debris from his store to make a three-foot-high pile outside. He took the package from Mr. Folse, but didn't open it.

Officials At All Levels Butt Heads Over Hurricane Relief Operations (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

The latest in a long line of disputes among local, state and federal officials over Hurricane Katrina was defused yesterday when New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin called off reopening the city, although he cited another storm for his capitulation rather than federal officials' litany of concerns.

The various levels of government have disagreed over when to call in federal troops and whether the entire operation should be federalized. They also have clashed over when and how to evacuate New Orleans and when to let residents return.

"We share the goal of the mayor, but we have got concerns," Mr. Bush said early yesterday, when Mr. Nagin still was allowing residents to return.

"The mayor has got this dream about having a city up and running -- and we share that dream," Mr. Bush said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

The obstacles include the possibility of additional flooding from Tropical Storm Rita, which was heading toward the Gulf of Mexico yesterday, and the lack of electricity, drinking water and sewage facilities. Early yesterday, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen said it might be as much as a week before residents could return safely.

"We just think that conditions need to be set so when people come back in, they can operate safely, and, moreover, with the weakened levee system, that there's a plan to evacuate whatever number of people are allowed back in the city," he told CNN.

"When those conditions are met and the risk has been reduced, then the population comes in," he added. "That could be two days, five days, one week."

Mr. Nagin initially criticized the remarks and insisted that up to 180,000 people -- about a third of the city's population -- be allowed to return during the next 10 days.

"I'm a little surprised the admiral came out publicly on this," Mr. Nagin told Fox News Channel in the morning. "Maybe since I've been away a day or two, maybe he's the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

Mr. Nagin, who spent the weekend in Dallas, said: "If he's suggesting I'm pushing a little hard, I am. The citizens of New Orleans deserve the opportunity to see what they have left and what they can salvage."

DOJ_NMG_0006626

Later in the day, however, Mr. Nagin began reassessing the timing of his plan because of Tropical Storm Rita and other "external factors," said Nagin spokeswoman Sally Foreman.

By the end of the day, the mayor reversed himself, agreeing with Mr. Bush and Adm. Allen that it was too soon and too unsafe for residents to return.

The rift yesterday was the latest in a series of high-profile disagreements among federal, state and local officials about how to handle the hurricane and the subsequent flooding of New Orleans.

The discord began Aug. 27, when Mr. Bush asked Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco to order an evacuation of New Orleans. Mrs. Blanco did not issue the order until Aug. 28, a day before Hurricane Katrina made landfall.

Mrs. Blanco also neglected to ask the president for federal troops when she wrote him a letter on Aug. 27 and when she spoke with him on Aug. 29. She had not made the request even on Aug. 31, when she gave a series of television interviews in Baton Rouge.

"I really need to call for the military," she told her press secretary between interviews. "And I should have started that in the first call."

Later that day, she asked the White House for troops, which were dispatched to assist Louisiana National Guard forces.

Mrs. Blanco hesitated again when she met Sept. 2 with Mr. Bush, who offered to have the federal government take over the chaotic evacuation. Mrs. Blanco said she needed 24 hours to make a decision and ultimately rejected the federal offer.

Mr. Nagin later told CNN that Mrs. Blanco and Mr. Bush needed to "get in sync." But within days, Mr. Nagin and Mrs. Blanco were feuding with each other over whether New Orleans residents should be ordered to leave their homes.

"My mandatory evacuation is still in effect," Mr. Nagin said Sept. 6.

But Mrs. Blanco refused to enforce the order, saying she needed more time for scientists to test the toxicity of floodwaters, even though health officials were warning that the waters were very dangerous.

"The mayor certainly has ordered that, but the governor -- and that would be me -- will have to enforce it or implement it," Mrs. Blanco said Sept. 7.

Mr. Bush will make more trips to the storm-hit areas this week, meeting today with Mississippi business owners and civic leaders in Gulfport and visiting a recovering business in New Orleans.

On Friday and Saturday, he will travel to Alabama, Texas and Arkansas, which have absorbed thousands of refugees from the harder-hit neighboring states.

"The trip will be an opportunity for the president to personally thank some cities and states that have taken in large numbers of our fellow citizens affected by Katrina," White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters.

Weary, Wary Residents Trek Back Into The City (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Oren Dorell

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The prospect of another fierce storm hitting wasn't going to stop Malcolm Poree from spending the first night in his home since Hurricane Katrina struck more than three weeks ago.

Poree, 38, was among hundreds of residents of the city's Algiers section who returned to their homes Monday only to be told by Mayor Ray Nagin to be prepared to evacuate again as early as Wednesday because of Tropical Storm Rita.

Poree figured another storm would do more damage to his embroidering business than to his home, which survived Katrina virtually unscathed.

“Being self-employed, I can't take much more of not having a city to sell to,” Poree said.

As for his safety, Poree said he and his wife have a car and a minivan and are ready to leave the city again with sons Malcolm, 9, and Marcus, 6.

“If we have an emergency, we know our way around,” Poree said.

The Algiers area, across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter and downtown, never flooded during Katrina and now has electricity and water service to most homes. Nagin announced last week that Algiers residents could begin returning Monday. However, hundreds ignored pre-storm evacuation orders and never left or have already returned.

DOJ_NMG_0006627

Nagin said Monday afternoon that the potential for Rita to hit the area was enough to suspend plans to reopen other high and dry parts of the city, including the French Quarter and Garden District.

For some, the mayor's abrupt reversal was another disheartening example of what they said was a disorganized and inept local response to Katrina.

Just down the street from Poree, David Gautreaux and his wife, Dolly, rode out Katrina but plan to move to Dallas or Houston at the first opportunity.

"We're ashamed to be citizens of this city," Gautreaux said. "There's no leadership. The mayor blamed the president. The governor blamed the president. This is in God's hands, not the president's."

Many other Algiers residents said they were relieved to be back home and were committed to remain as their city rebuilds. "Even though this hurricane happened to New Orleans, I'm coming back to stay. It's my home, and I'm not going to leave," said Cinder Anderson, 34.

Anderson and her family left New Orleans for Houston shortly before Katrina hit. She enrolled her children, 12-year-old Miquel and 8-year-old Michael, in schools there.

Soon, everyone was homesick.

"My son cried every day he had to go to school there," Anderson said. "He wanted to come home. I cried every day, too."

Their trip back was nerve-racking. They wondered: Had the storm thrown the huge pine tree in their front yard into their house?

"When I came in, I drove up slow. I had my hand over my heart," Anderson said. "I saw the tree didn't fall on the house, and I said, 'Thank you, God.' "

Like many of her neighbors, Anderson left her refrigerator at the side of the road to be picked up by cleanup crews. Weeks without electricity left the inside so contaminated by rotting food that even a scrubbing with bleach couldn't eliminate the stench, Anderson said.

Anderson and her husband, Elbert Bender, said they're relying on the military and aid groups for food and bottled water.

The closest place to buy food was the convenience store at the Spur Gas Station, which has been open since Saturday.

Owner Ibrahim Attamari did a brisk business Monday in liquor, beer, gasoline and cigarettes. The shelves were stocked with motor oil, candy and toiletries.

Attamari said he has been receiving deliveries and has enough gasoline to last a week, but staying open has been hard. "I have 13 employees; none of them are here," he said.

Schools are closed.

About a half-mile from Anderson's brick house is St. Andrew the Apostle Catholic Church, which has a school for about 800 students in pre-kindergarten through eighth grade. Principal Sybil Skansi said she's trying to prepare her school to reopen by Oct. 3.

"The school is one of those things that has to be here for people to come back," she said.

Anderson's son normally attends the public Alice Harte Elementary School adjacent to the church; her daughter would attend the Karr Junior High School behind their house. New Orleans school officials say they hope to have some schools in Algiers open by Nov. 5.

Poree also was waiting for Harte Elementary to open so his sons could return home. He had another reason to hope for the schools to reopen as soon as possible: The schools are the best customers for his embroidery business, which personalizes clothing such as jackets and ball caps.

"My customer base is New Orleans," Poree said. "Since there's no New Orleans, I have no business."

Rita Rages Toward Florida Keys (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 20, 2005

MIAMI — Tropical Storm Rita was expected to become a hurricane and slam the Florida Keys today, then gather strength and threaten the entire Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0006628

On Monday, thousands of people jammed the one highway leading out of the Keys, a string of low-lying islands that were under a mandatory evacuation order.

Rita was still a tropical storm late Monday with winds of 70 mph, but the National Weather Service predicted it would be a Category 2 hurricane today with winds of 100 mph as it closed in on the Keys.

After it passes over the Keys and heads into the Gulf of Mexico it is expected to become a Category 3 hurricane, meaning one with winds of 111 to 130 mph, the National Hurricane Center said. Rita's track has it landing anywhere from the Texas-Mexico border to Louisiana by the weekend, the center said.

Jennifer Pralgo, a meteorologist with the National Hurricane Center, said New Orleans isn't the likely target but isn't in the clear. The city hit by Katrina last month could still get heavy rain and high winds.

"Everybody on the Gulf Coast should pay attention to this," she said. "They're like ping-pong balls in the Gulf. They can bounce around, but they're going to land."

Rita's starting path is similar to Katrina's. Both sprang to life near the Bahamas, headed for South Florida and set a course for the Gulf. Strengthened by the Gulf's warm waters, Katrina was a Category 4 hurricane when it made landfall.

On the Keys, where 78,000 people live, hurricane-force winds are expected to thrash the islands overnight. Rain totals of 15 inches are possible.

A storm surge (a rise in the sea level) of as much as 9 feet is forecast. At that height, the sea could swallow the one road out of the Keys.

Holly Elomina, 33, kept close watch on the forecast as she shuttered her home on Big Coppitt Key on Monday. She has four children — ages 3 months to 16 years — and was deciding whether to leave.

"That storm surge is what scares me," Elomina said.

The last Category 2 storm to hit Key West was Hurricane Georges in 1998. That storm damaged hundreds of homes and closed the island to tourists for weeks.

In Miami-Dade County, home to more than 2.2 million people, shopkeepers and residents braced for hurricane-force winds today. Schools were ordered closed and shelters opened. Residents in mobile homes and those in low-lying areas were told to evacuate. Tourists on Miami Beach were asked to leave.

On South Beach, a stretch of trendy, art deco hotels, restaurants and shops, workers screwed corrugated metal shutters over windows.

Joe Monteiro, 35, executive chef at the Avalon Hotel, was unconcerned.

"This happens every year," he said. "People get all freaked out about it."

On the beach, a 25 mph wind whipped waves into a froth but did not chase away all swimmers. Nor did a red flag warning of hazardous conditions.

Lifeguard Vlad Sazonov, who hoisted the flag, said it was foolish to underestimate the storm.

"We had really bad preparations for Katrina," said Sazonov, 39. "People regret that now. All I can say is, 'God save us all.' "

Florida Keys Are Ordered Evacuated As Rita Nears (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Residents of the Florida Keys were ordered to evacuate yesterday as Tropical Storm Rita approached hurricane strength on a path similar to that of Katrina, which devastated the Gulf Coast three weeks ago, and the mayor of New Orleans suspended a plan to start repopulating his flood-ravaged city.

With Rita forecast to become a Category 1 hurricane last evening and to reach Category 2 strength today, tourists streamed out of the Keys, and residents boarded up homes and shops.

But a potentially greater threat looms later in the week, when Rita is projected to intensify over the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico, just as Katrina did late last month before slamming ashore about 60 miles southeast of New Orleans. On its current path, meteorologists said, Rita could hit the Texas coast by the weekend, bringing hurricane-force winds and torrential rains to an area that houses thousands of evacuees from flooded New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0006629

In view of the new storm, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin announced he was calling off his plan to allow displaced residents to return, one neighborhood at a time. (See story, A1.)

Rita is "not an exact reprise" of Katrina, "but it's probably pretty close," said Frank Lepore, a spokesman for the National Hurricane Center in Miami. "It's got similar characteristics, except it's just a little lower in latitude. The issue is what happens when it gets out over the very warm waters of the central Gulf."

The storm was packing winds of 70 mph last night and was projected to hit Key West about 6 p.m. today with winds around 105 mph, making it a Category 2 hurricane, Lepore said.

As Rita gathered strength, the hurricane center issued a hurricane warning for the southern tip of the Florida peninsula and for all of the Florida Keys. It said that at 11 p.m. Eastern time, Rita was 270 miles east-southeast of Key West and was moving west-northwest at 14 mph.

The hurricane center said the Keys could be hit with storm surge flooding of six to nine feet above normal tide levels, "along with large and dangerous battering waves."

A mandatory evacuation order issued by Monroe County, Fla., covered about 80,000 people in the Keys, including 25,000 residents of Key West. Buses were sent to Key West High School to evacuate people who needed help to leave, and a military C-130 transport plane was dispatched to Key West Hospital to evacuate patients there. In addition, about 134,000 Miami-Dade County residents who live in coastal areas were under a voluntary evacuation order.

A voluntary evacuation was set to start today in Galveston, Tex., where officials said residents who could not leave on their own could take buses -- and their caged pets -- to shelters starting tomorrow.

President Bush, after a meeting with homeland security officials to discuss Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, suggested that in view of Rita's approach, it would be a mistake for evacuees to return to New Orleans.

Rita "now looks like it's going to head out into the Gulf, and could track Katrina, or it could head further to the west," Bush told reporters. "But, nevertheless, there is deep concern about this storm causing more flooding in New Orleans."

Nagin "has got this dream about having a city up and running, and we share that dream," Bush said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

He said that if Rita brought heavy rains, "there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break. And so, therefore, we're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history."

According to Lepore, a five-day projection shows Rita reaching Category 3 strength in the middle of the Gulf, with sustained winds of about 115 mph and gusts up to 130 mph. Although its path is difficult to predict at this point, the latest projection has Rita heading toward Houston, a major oil industry center that is now also home to thousands of Katrina evacuees.

One concern is that Rita will hit "the general area where all these folks from New Orleans have been evacuated," Lepore said. "And there is enough hardship in that area as it is without throwing another hurricane at them."

As Its Coffers Swell, Red Cross Is Criticized On Gulf Coast Response (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom And Campbell Robertson

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

In New Orleans and the coastal flood plains of Mississippi, many people are complaining that the American Red Cross was missing in their worst hours of need and are worried that its billowing relief fund may bypass them entirely.

The organization did not open shelters in flood-prone areas and was therefore unable to provide food and other necessities to people closest to the coast ravaged by Hurricane Katrina.

"The Red Cross has been my biggest disappointment," said Tim Kellar, the administrator of Hancock County, Miss. "I held it in such high esteem until we were in the time of need. It was nonexistent."

Even some volunteers are disgusted. "I will never, ever wear the Red Cross vest again," said Betty Brunner, who started volunteering in 1969 when Hurricane Camille destroyed her house but quit last week over the organization's response in Hancock County.

Two days after Hurricane Katrina struck, the Red Cross had only one shelter in the county, and it was far from some of the most populated coastal towns. It had no shelter in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0006630

"It's purely a safety issue," said Armand T. Mascelli, vice president for response operations at the Red Cross. "People expect a Red Cross shelter to be safe, not to be at risk of flooding." Frustration over the early absence of the Red Cross is now compounded by the realization that the organization has collected the bulk of public contributions, money that will be spent on emergency rescue and relief, not long-term assistance, and may never get to the coastal areas.

The organization has garnered almost three-quarters of the $1 billion that Americans have donated to help the hurricane victims, with endorsements from President Bush, corporate America and many nonprofit organizations. Its duty, mandated by Congress, is to provide immediate assistance, a need that is rapidly diminishing as victims leave shelters.

Some people are asking whether the Red Cross can use all its money effectively as its role winds down. "Once we're out of the relief phase, what capacity does the Red Cross have to rebuild communities?" asked George Penick, president of the Foundation of the Mid South. "That's not their core competence."

The Red Cross says it will need every penny, and it just raised its estimated costs for Hurricane Katrina to $2 billion from $1.5 billion. "The scope of this is just so huge," said Joe Becker, the Red Cross senior vice president for preparedness and response. "If you took New Orleans out of the equation, Mississippi and Alabama would be a bigger job than we tackled in all four of the storms that hit Florida last year."

But time and again in past disasters, the Red Cross has raised more money than it has needed for relief. It has also been less than clear in the past about where its money goes, and it has rarely shared its money with other organizations that tackle long-term needs of victims.

So, at a meeting of charity officials last week in Jackson, Miss., Mr. Penick asked whether the Red Cross would share its wealth.

"Especially in rural areas and small towns, the Red Cross was either absent or overwhelmed," Mr. Penick said. "You had churches and nonprofit groups taking care of the evacuees in any way they could with whatever money they could scrape together."

Mr. Penick said that when he asked a Red Cross representative at the meeting whether it would reimburse these organizations, "he said he didn't know."

Responding to the complaints from coastal Mississippi, Winnie Romeril, a spokeswoman for the Red Cross in the disaster area, said the organization was unprepared for the scope of the disaster and initially lacked enough fuel and supplies. She added that the Red Cross had 23 shelters in three of the most affected counties in Mississippi.

The Red Cross decided in the mid-1990's that it was unsafe to maintain shelters in flood plains, a decision that piqued New Orleans officials, said Dr. Bernadine Healy, a former president of the organization.

Dr. Healy said she negotiated with Louisiana officials to support state-operated shelters until the disruptions caused by Sept. 11.

"The obligation of the Red Cross is to oversee the sheltering of people in disasters," she said. "I had been working with the governor to find a compromise so that the Red Cross would be there at the very least to provide supplies for their shelters."

The Red Cross's mission is to provide immediate shelter, medical care, sustenance and small amounts of cash, usually $800 to $900, for clothing and other necessities.

It said on Monday that $1.4 billion of the money it hopes to raise will go to financial assistance, $744 million for food and shelter, and $78 million for mental health services. As of Monday, the Red Cross had spent more than $521 million.

Some victims have complained that the Red Cross is reluctant to dispense cash; the organization maintains that tight control of cash helps foster accountability. Outside a shelter in Baton Rouge, volunteers distributed papers last Thursday with a toll-free number for assistance and pointed to a sign saying that only residents in the shelter would be helped there. Some tried to argue the point, to little avail. "We were just getting the runaround from the Red Cross," said Mia Norflin of Carrollton, La.

Through Friday, the organization had handed out roughly $225 million in cash assistance to 236,000 people. Its shelters have housed more than 2 million people for at least one night, and, together with the Southern Baptist Convention, it has served more than 12 million hot meals.

About 36,000 people remained in 232 Red Cross shelters on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0006631

In Texas, Charlotte Toney applauded the organization for reuniting her with her husband and three foster children last week. Evacuated from New Orleans early because she had diabetes and was recovering from surgery, she ended up at a hospital in Houston.

"I was so out of it, but when the lady from the Red Cross called and said, 'I found your children,' I was screaming and hollering," Mrs. Toney said.

Mr. Becker said the Red Cross was unlikely to give money to other groups that might pick up the recovery effort after the relief stage.

"If we feel we have enough money to meet our mission, we'll tell America we have enough money and recommend giving to other organizations," he said.

On Oct. 30, 2001, the Red Cross said it had received $547 million in Sept. 11 pledges, which would be enough, but the total swelled to twice that amount as donations continued to roll in for victims of the attacks.

Devorah Goldburg, a Red Cross spokeswoman, said that it would take many organizations to address the needs of the hurricane victims and that the Red Cross had told CBS and MTV not to raise money on its behalf and to find other charities. During the broadcast of the Emmy Awards on Sunday by CBS, donations were solicited for Habitat for Humanity.

In some of the nation's biggest disasters, the Red Cross has raised more money than it has needed. As of June, the organization still had roughly $40 million of the more than $1 billion it collected for a fund it created after the Sept. 11 attacks.

It raised $55 million for the 1989 earthquake in San Francisco and spent only $12 million on direct disaster relief, angering local officials who wanted some money to build a homeless shelter.

It spent about a quarter of the money raised after the attack on the federal building in Oklahoma City in 1995, and the Minnesota attorney general held public hearings to prod it to release $4 million retained after the Red River flood in 1997.

The Red Cross and other organizations use money generated in response to giant disasters to offset the costs of other, smaller crises. But many donors are insisting that their gifts be used for a specific disaster.

The Red Cross has always pledged to honor those designations, and it created the special fund for victims of the Sept. 11 attacks. But many people became upset after laerning that some of the money would be used to prepare the Red Cross to respond to future attacks.

Dr. Healy resigned, and the Red Cross recommitted to spending all the money on the victims. The special fund swelled to more than $1 billion.

In his book "After: How America Confronted the September 12 Era," Steven Brill described livery drivers parked in fleets of cars outside a Red Cross facility in lower Manhattan to pick up checks to help make up for lost business.

Red Cross Official To Meet With Lawmakers (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 20, 2005

Marty Evans, president and CEO of the American Red Cross, will brief lawmakers today on the organization's recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region, said congressional aides familiar with the meeting. The Red Cross, the largest nongovernmental organization operating in the hurricane- and flood-battered area, contacted House Republican Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) earlier this month, asking whether lawmakers would be interested in a briefing.

Pryce passed along the Red Cross's request to Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) last week after he was named chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. King, along with Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), the ranking Democrat on the panel, arranged the meeting and invited Republican and Democratic lawmakers.

The briefing is the second bipartisan event organized by King; he led a trip with more than a dozen lawmakers to New Orleans on Sunday to view the damage caused by the flooding.

From FEMA To WEMA (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

SLIDELL, La.

I don't think Washington needs any more czars. But if President Bush feels compelled to put someone in charge of rebuilding the Gulf Coast, let me suggest a name: Lee Scott.

Scott is the chief executive of Wal-Mart, one of the few institutions to improve its image here after Katrina sent a 15-foot wave across the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain. If you mention the Red Cross or FEMA to people in Slidell, you hear rants about help that didn't arrive and phone lines that are always busy. If you mention state or national politicians, you hear obscenities.

But if you visit the Wal-Mart and the Sam's Club stores here, you hear shoppers who have been without power for weeks marveling that there are still generators in stock (and priced at $304.04). You hear about the trucks that rolled in right after the hurricane and the stuff the stores gave away: chain saws and boots for rescue workers, sheets and clothes for shelters, water and ice for the public.

"This was the only place we could find water those first days," said Rashan Smith, who was shopping with her three children at Wal-Mart on Saturday. "I still haven't managed to get through to FEMA. It's hard to say, but you get more justice at Wal-Mart."

That's the same assessment you hear from public officials in Louisiana, and there's even been talk of letting Wal-Mart take over FEMA's job. The company already has its own emergency operations center, where dozens of people began preparing for the hurricane the week before it hit by moving supplies and trucks into position.

I realize that Scott would not be a popular choice with Democrats. They concede that Wal-Mart and other private companies were far better prepared for Katrina than FEMA was, but they say FEMA would work fine if it were under the control of a virtuous, compassionate public servant - someone, as Bill Clinton suggested, like himself.

Clinton looks back on the 1990's as FEMA's Age of Pericles. "I think we did a good job of disaster management," he said on ABC's "This Week." While criticizing the Bush administration for leaving poor people stranded in New Orleans, he said that he and his FEMA director, James Lee Witt, had been especially sensitive to the needs of poor people because of their own backgrounds.

But if they cared so much, why didn't New Orleans ever work out a feasible way to evacuate poor people? FEMA had a golden opportunity to plan it during the 1990's. The threat of nuclear war had receded and terrorism wasn't yet a priority, so the agency's biggest concerns should have been an earthquake in California and a flood in New Orleans.

But it was too busy dealing with the record number of other "disasters" that Clinton declared - an average of one a week, which meant FEMA was mailing out checks for every flash flood within range of a major media market. Upstate New Yorkers suddenly became incapable of coping with the cost of snow removal.

In 1997, Congress gave FEMA $500,000 and ordered it to develop a comprehensive plan to evacuate New Orleans. The agency passed on the money to Louisiana, which used it instead to study building a new bridge. As Rita Beamish of The Associated Press reported on Sunday, FEMA didn't bother making sure a plan was drawn up - an aide to Witt said its job had just been to pass on the money.

How often do you suppose someone at Wal-Mart headquarters dispenses $500,000 and doesn't bother keeping track of it? The company can tell you the precise location of every thumbtack in its inventory. It's legendary for tracking every transaction and pinching every penny.

Its executives fly coach, and they empty their own wastebaskets. When Scott, the chief executive officer, travels with the chief financial officer, they cut costs by sharing a hotel room.

That's the kind of leader we need to oversee the tens or hundreds of billions that Washington will be spending on the Gulf Coast. Scott could insist on low everyday prices while still leaving the area as well prepared for the next disaster as Wal-Mart was for Katrina.

David Vitter, the Republican senator from Louisiana, was so impressed with the rapid response of Wal-Mart and other companies that he promised to introduce a bill to abolish FEMA and contract its job out to the private sector. I'm afraid the Wal-Mart Emergency Management Agency will be a tough sell on Capitol Hill. But I'd vote for WEMA.

Kerry, Edwards See Chance For Change After Katrina (REU-Y2)

By John Whitesides, Political Correspondent

Reuters, September 20, 2005

The two Democrats who challenged President George W. Bush for the White House last year said on Monday the devastation of Hurricane Katrina provided a historic chance to reevaluate government priorities and address long-neglected issues including endemic poverty.

In separate speeches, John Kerry and John Edwards said the administration's inadequate response to the hurricane revealed a failure of competence and values, while the public outpouring of support for storm victims showed Americans wanted more from their government.

"This horrifying disaster has shown Americans at their best -- and their government at its worst," Kerry said in a speech at Brown University, in Providence, Rhode Island. "Katrina stripped away any image of competence and exposed to all the true heart and nature of this administration."

The Massachusetts senator and 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who fell short in his bid to oust Bush from the White House, said the storm created "a rare accountability moment" when not just the administration but all Americans could take stock of the country's direction.

"That's our job -- to turn this moment from a frenzied expression of guilt into a national reversal of direction," Kerry said.

Edwards, Kerry's vice presidential running mate and a former senator from North Carolina, said in a speech in Washington that the storm offered a chance to reopen the debate about poverty.

"We do not have to live in an America that accepts poverty as a fact of life or chooses to ignore it," said Edwards, Kerry's one-time rival for the Democratic nomination.

Edwards talked frequently during the 2004 campaign of "two Americas" -- one for the struggling and one for the wealthy -- and opened an anti-poverty center in North Carolina earlier this year.

"Katrina has given us an opportunity to tap into the conscience of the American people," he said.

Edwards introduced a series of proposals to build opportunities for the poorest Americans, including "work bonds" to expand the earned income tax credit for the poor, a savings plan to help families buy a home, an increase in the minimum wage and programs to make college more affordable.

Both Kerry and Edwards are potential presidential candidates again in 2008, and both called on Bush to abandon his plan to pay for the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast without any tax increases.

They said the rush to rebuild should not distract attention from the need to address growing economic and environmental crises elsewhere in the country.

Kerry made pointed reference to the 2004 campaign several times in his speech, saying Bush's response to the hurricane was politics as usual and revealed a "betrayal of trust and abuse of power" designed to shift power to the privileged.

"The plan they are designing for the Gulf Coast turns the region into a vast laboratory for right-wing ideological experiments," Kerry said.

"They're already talking about private school vouchers, abandonment of environmental regulations, abolition of wage standards, subsidies for big industries."

Tracy Schmitt, press secretary for the Republican National Committee, said Kerry's speech was designed to politicize a tragedy.

"Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry," she said. "Such tactics haven't served him well in the past and today is no exception."

(Additional reporting by Jason Szep in Providence)

Kerry, Edwards Criticize Bush Over Response To Hurricane (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

President Bush came under withering criticism for his handling of Hurricane Katrina yesterday, with Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) charging that the storm exposed the administration's incompetence and ideological blinders and former senator John

DOJ_NMG_0006634

Edwards (D-N.C.) asserting that even in its response, the administration backs policies that support the privileged over the working poor.

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, said in a speech at Brown University that Michael D. Brown, who quit under fire as the Federal Emergency Management Agency's director, exemplified the administration's failures over the past five years.

Using the nickname Bush used for Brown, Kerry said, "Brownie is to Katrina what Paul Bremer is to peace in Iraq, what George Tenet is to slam-dunk intelligence, what Paul Wolfowitz is to parades paved with flowers in Baghdad, what Dick Cheney is to visionary energy policy, what Donald Rumsfeld is to basic war planning, what Tom DeLay is to ethics and what George Bush is to 'Mission Accomplished' and 'Wanted Dead or Alive.' "

Bremer was the head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq. Wolfowitz served as deputy defense secretary until becoming president of the World Bank.

Edwards, who has made poverty a signature issue, said the plight of many of those displaced by the flooding in New Orleans underscores an urgent need for the nation to attack the problem again. He offered policy initiatives aimed at ensuring that Americans who work full time do not fall below the poverty line.

The former senator -- who was tapped by Kerry to be his running mate last year and, like Kerry, is contemplating a 2008 presidential run -- said the administration has long favored wealth over work. He criticized Bush for suspending a law requiring federal contractors along the Gulf Coast to pay prevailing wages on reconstruction projects.

"I might have missed something, but I don't think the president ever talked about putting a cap on the salaries of the CEOs of Halliburton and the other companies . . . who are getting all these contracts," he said in a speech at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "This president, who never met an earmark he wouldn't approve or a millionaire's tax cut he wouldn't promote, decided to slash wages for the least of us and the most vulnerable."

The two speeches followed pointed comments along the same lines by former president Bill Clinton, who criticized the administration's response to the storm Sunday. Speaking on ABC's "This Week," Clinton said Bush should roll back tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans to offset the cost of rebuilding, and he asserted that the poverty exposed by the storm-forced exodus was caused in part by the administration's own policies.

"Whether it's race-based or not, if you give your tax cuts to the rich and hope everything works out all right, and poverty goes up, and it disproportionately affects black and brown people, that's a consequence of the action made," he said. "That's what they did in the '80s; that's what they've done in this decade. In the middle, we had a different policy."

Of the speeches delivered yesterday by the Democrats' 2004 ticket, Kerry's was harsher by far, and it drew a sharp rebuttal from the Republican National Committee's Tracey Schmitt. "Armchair-quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry," she said. "Such tactics haven't served him well in the past, and today is no exception."

According to a text of Kerry's speech made available in Washington, he said Katrina had provided an "accountability moment" for the administration.

"This is about the broader pattern of incompetence and negligence that Katrina exposed and beyond that a truly systemic effort to distort and disable the people's government and devote it to the interests of the privileged and the powerful," he said.

Kerry also charged that the administration is pursuing politics as usual in its prescription for rebuilding. "The plan they're designing for the Gulf Coast turns the region into a vast laboratory for right-wing ideological experiments," he said, citing private-school vouchers, subsidies to business and other proposals.

Edwards called for a restoration of community. "The administration may think every American is an island," he said. "But Americans know that Katrina's victims shouldn't have been out there on their own and that no American should be out there on their own."

Edwards used the metaphor of the flooded levees in New Orleans to describe what he called society's inadequate efforts to bolster the poor. Although he called for many new programs to help, he also said everyone, from parents and clergy to those most in need, must accept the responsibility to speak hard truths about behavior -- particularly out-of-wedlock pregnancies -- that condemn many to perpetual poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0006635

Kerry Blasts Bush On Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 20, 2005

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) unleashed a furious attack on the Bush administration at a Brown University speech yesterday, upbraiding the president's response to the hurricane that recently devastated the Gulf Coastand tying it to what he sees as other flaws at the White House.

"This is the Katrina administration," read prepared remarks posted on 2004 Democratic presidential nominee's website, www.johnkerry.com. "Katrina is a symbol of all this administration does and doesn't do," read Kerry's script, portions of which were included in an e-mail to supporters that ended with a fundraising appeal.

"Michael Brown [Bush's former emergency-management director] … is to Katrina what [former Iraq administrator] Paul Bremer is to peace in Iraq; what [former CIA Director] George Tenet is to slam-dunk intelligence; what [former Deputy Defense Secretary] Paul Wolfowitz is to parades paved with flowers in Baghdad; what [Vice President] Dick Cheney is to visionary energy policy; what [Defense Secretary] Donald Rumsfeld is to basic war planning; what [House Majority Leader] Tom Delay [R-Texas] is to ethics; and what George Bush is to 'Mission Accomplished' and 'Wanted Dead or Alive.'"

In a brief interview, Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, called Kerry's pitch for cash "repulsive."

In a news release, she said, "John Kerry's attacks on President Bush's efforts to assist the victims and rebuild the Gulf Coast don't come as a surprise. Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry. The American people have pulled together during a difficult time and Democrats' efforts to politicize this tragedy are unsavory at best."

Kerry's speech is the latest salvo in a political battle over accountability that has pitted the parties against each other in Washington and federal officials against their state and local counterparts in the Gulf region.

While Kerry's speech may play well with the Democratic base, Sarah Binder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a professor at George Washington University, said the senator has a tough challenge to pin blame on Bush.

Kerry And Edwards Say Bush's Actions Have Been A Disaster (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Both members of the 2004 Democratic presidential ticket sharply criticized President Bush in dueling speeches Monday that highlighted the partisan conflict over Hurricane Katrina and early maneuvering for the 2008 White House race.

Speaking at Brown University in Rhode Island, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) delivered his most sweeping indictment of Bush's priorities and performance since last year's campaign.

The crisis caused by the hurricane, Kerry said, exposed a "pattern of incompetence and negligence" in the Bush administration, as well as "a truly systemic effort to distort and disable the people's government, and devote it to the interests of the privileged and the powerful."

At a liberal think tank in Washington, former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) offered more policy proposals in a speech focused on combating poverty. Echoing former President Clinton's famous campaign formulation about welfare, Kerry's 2004 running mate urged "a serious, long-term effort to end poverty as we know it."

Tracey Schmitt, press secretary for the Republican National Committee, accused the two of attempting to politicize the tragedy along the Gulf Coast.

"Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues was never a problem for the Kerry/Edwards campaign," she said. "Such overt tactics didn't serve them well in the 2004 campaign, and today is no exception."

Monday's speeches offered a reminder that Kerry and Edwards, rivals during the 2004 Democratic primaries, could find themselves competing for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

"In a sense, these are two guys who have never stopped running; they have never gotten out of campaign mode," said Democratic consultant Jim Jordan, who served as Kerry's campaign manager early in the 2004 race.

DOJ_NMG_0006636

Kerry and Edwards each began their speeches with a similar argument, contending that the devastation in New Orleans revealed social and governmental problems that the administration had not sufficiently addressed. But from there, they moved in different directions.

At the Center for American Progress, Edwards portrayed the suffering among those left behind in New Orleans as a metaphor for the struggles of poor families across America.

Edwards, who last year spoke often about disparities between the "two Americas" of affluence and need, on Monday promoted elements of what he called a "Working Society."

For New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast, he proposed a modern version of the Works Progress Administration that President Franklin D. Roosevelt devised to create jobs during the Great Depression.

Edwards' agenda also included an increase in the nationwide minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.50 an hour (California's minimum wage is $6.75), and new government subsidies to help working-poor families purchase a first home or build savings accounts.

Edwards said he would pay for his ideas partly by allowing tax cuts for top income brackets that Bush pushed through Congress to expire.

Far more directly than in 2004, Edwards said that reducing poverty would also require more progress in discouraging teen pregnancy and encouraging young men to take responsibility for the children they father.

Rhetorically linking such problems with the flooding, Edwards declared: "When a 13-year-old girl thinks there's nothing wrong with having a baby that will drive both her and her child into poverty, we haven't built the levees high enough."

Trent Duffy, a White House spokesman, would not comment directly on Edwards' speech. But he said Bush has focused on "the root causes of poverty" through his economic and education reform agenda.

"No. 1, the best anti-poverty program is a job," Duffy said. "And second, it is education. We are closing the achievement gap between black, Hispanic and white children."

Kerry focused his speech on broader themes, critiquing Bush on two fronts.

He charged that the administration's response to the hurricane showed a lack of competence evident in other areas, such as planning for the reconstruction of Iraq. Accusing Bush of ignoring warnings about the threat of flooding in New Orleans, Kerry declared: "This horrifying disaster has shown Americans at their best — and their government at its worst."

Kerry said the recovery agenda for the region that Bush announced last week "turns the region into a vast laboratory for right-wing ideological experiments," such as waiving requirements that federal contractors pay prevailing wages during the cleanup.

Second, he said the hurricane should show Americans the need to take collective action through the government to attack entrenched problems, such as persistent poverty and lack of access to healthcare.

"It's time we framed every question — every issue — not in terms of what's in it for 'me,' but what's in it for all of us," Kerry said.

Schmitt, the RNC press secretary, criticized Kerry for sending excerpts of the speech to supporters in an e-mail that included a box asking recipients to make a contribution to his political action committee

La. Begins Probe Into 14 Nursing Home Deaths (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 20, 2005

BATON ROUGE — The Louisiana attorney general launched an investigation Monday into 14 deaths at a New Orleans nursing home that happened after the elderly patients were not evacuated for Hurricane Katrina.

Attorney General Charles Foti's office has been besieged with complaints about patients being left at medical facilities during the hurricane or receiving shoddy treatment, said Kris Wartelle, a spokeswoman for Foti. She said state investigators are checking additional reports of patients and residents who died at 20 to 30 other hospitals and nursing homes. The nursing home under investigation was identified as Lafon Nursing Facility of the Holy Family in New Orleans. The home's operators — a team of nuns and nurses — told The New York Times last week that patients were moved to the second floor and given care throughout the hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0006637

Wartelle said Foti's office is “close” to beginning probes into two hospitals where numerous other patients died.

She identified them as Memorial Medical Center and Lindy Boggs Medical Center, both in New Orleans.

Wartelle said there was a “pretty strong” likelihood that the two hospitals would be investigated.

Informal inquiries will be made to see whether complaints can be verified before starting a full probe and gathering documents, witnesses and other evidence that could support criminal charges, Wartelle said.

Foti is hiring additional investigators to look into the complaints made at hospitals and nursing homes.

His office disclosed the latest investigation six days after charging Salvatore and Mable Mangano, owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home near New Orleans, with negligent homicide in the deaths of 34 people who were left in the home despite evacuation orders.

Foti said he is planning to write a report when investigations are finished “on how things should be changed for a disaster in the future” and recommend possible changes in evacuation policies for medical facilities.

Foti said most of the 9,000 to 10,000 nursing home residents in the hurricane's path were evacuated without any problem.

Nurse Says Hospital Owner Left Her 'High And Dry' (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi And Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

CHALMETTE, La. -- Charlene Gonzalez wanted to get out of town before Hurricane Katrina hit, but because she was a nurse at the only hospital in this low-lying waterside town, she would lose her job if she did not stay at her post.

Then, after Gonzalez, her husband and more than 100 other employees and their families spent days trapped by rising floodwaters, the Pennsylvania-based corporation that owns Chalmette Medical Center, Universal Health Services, told its employees that they could count on only two more weeks of pay.

"They left me to die," Gonzalez said. "And now nobody's even called to say `Thank you,' nobody's even called to say `I'm sorry.' "

In the days following Katrina, southeastern Louisiana's hospitals became isolated deathtraps as power failed, water rose and severely ill patients could no longer survive. Officials have not accounted for all the patients at the two-story Chalmette hospital, but staff members say at least four died, three of whom were critically ill and had do not resuscitate orders.

But it is UHS' behavior after the water cleared that has infuriated the residents of St. Bernard Parish, a devastated suburban region of 65,000 residents, where every neighborhood was inundated. The area remains uninhabitable, buried by mud. The hospital is severely damaged.

Officials at UHS say the anger is understandable after such a catastrophe, but they contend they did everything they could for their patients and employees. They say they tried to evacuate their hospital -- albeit at least a day after emergency officials say they urged it -- but that it was too late to get all the patients out. The company, which had $3.9 billion in revenue last year and says it is the nation's third-largest hospital management corporation, says it is trying to place employees with some of its 84 other facilities and has started a foundation to aid those who lost their homes.

But UHS says on its Web site that it is "committed" to paying through Saturday the 2,800 employees at its three New Orleans-area hospitals, including the 900 at Chalmette. It says they will receive insurance coverage through "at least" the end of October.

Marc Miller, a vice president at UHS, said the cutoff of pay on Saturday is subject to change."This is a highly unusual situation," Miller said. "No final determination has been made on salary and benefits."

Jon Sewell, the hospital's chief executive, said that as he and his employees were trapped in the hospital, the most common question people asked was: Will I have a job?

Three weeks later, he could offer his workers no reassurance.

"Everybody's very emotional about what's in our future," Sewell said.

DOJ_NMG_0006638

St. Bernard residents say the other major employer in the parish, Exxon Mobil Corp., is still paying employees even though its refineries have not come back on line. Bitterly, they say they do not expect additional help from UHS.

"It's a betrayal," Parish Councilman Kenneth Henderson said. "The people treated them good and they turned their backs on us."

For Henderson, it's personal. His daughter, Kendal Guerra, is a nurse at the hospital and is seven months pregnant. She will lose her health insurance, Henderson said, before she gives birth.

Based in King of Prussia, Penn., UHS drew 7 percent of its revenues during the first half of this year from its three New Orleans-area hospitals. All were damaged by Katrina.

Before the storm, the company had invested heavily in its 230-bed hospital in Chalmette, an oil town eight miles east of New Orleans' French Quarter. It had just opened a new 30-bed intensive care unit when Hurricane Katrina began to form.

Dr. Lee R. Domangue, the hospital's director of emergency medicine, said that late on Friday, Aug. 26, he heard the news about the storm turning toward New Orleans and made a frantic call to hospital administration.

"I said `Close the hospital,' " he recalled in an interview. "'You have a category five storm going right over you. You have a medical obligation to evacuate."

Domangue said the answer was no. "It was an administrative decision, against my better judgment," he said.

Sewell said he does not recall the conversation, but parish emergency officials said they also pleaded with the hospital before Saturday to evacuate quickly, to no avail.

"It was nothing less than depraved indifference," said Dr. Paul Verrette, medical director of the parish's emergency preparedness office.

After meeting Saturday with parish officials, Sewell said he was convinced that the hospital needed to evacuate. As in prior storms, intensive-care patients were taken out first. Sunday, less than 24 hours before Katrina hit, the hospital began evacuating other patients from its first floor.

"Our intention was to do it as long as we could," Sewell said.

But with medical facilities throughout New Orleans also scrambling to relocate their patients, Chalmette could not find any available beds in Louisiana or surrounding states. Late Sunday, the hospital moved the 50 or so remaining patients to the second floor.

With patients in the facility, employees on hand were required to remain on duty, something the hospital's officials said was standard emergency procedure in the industry. "It's like being a policeman or a fireman," Sewell said.

About 150 staffers and their families hunkered down. Gonzalez, the nurse, had her husband come along. She couldn't believe they were riding out such a storm in a two-story building, and brought the family airboat.

Several hours after the hurricane struck early Monday, Sewell lay down in his first-floor office for a nap. He felt water on his back. Water was pouring into the hospital, drowning the first-floor generators. The floodwaters that were beginning to rise in New Orleans were inundating St. Bernard Parish. Within two hours, about 16 feet of water covered the first floor, and rescue workers were launching airboats off the second floor terrace to retrieve neighbors stranded on their roofs.

For the next three days, as many as 400 evacuees took shelter on the second floor of the hospital. Food and water were tightly rationed -- meals consisted of a scoop of cottage cheese, a few slices of fruit and two pieces of ham. Staff desperately tried to keep conditions sanitary without a sewage system and attempted to break shatter-proof windows to let fresh air into the scorching building.

By Wednesday, parish officials had found a scrap of dry land to function as a triage center. Sheriff's deputies, firefighters and civilians began to shuttle patients to the parish jail, which sat on high ground. The next morning, the last of the staff was evacuated by a National Guard helicopter. Sewell was on the last flight off the hospital roof.

Most staff made their way out of the parish on Sept. 2. The following week, at a parish meeting in Baton Rouge, word began to travel among nurses that UHS would give them only two weeks' pay.

"They would always stress to their employees [that] they want to be active in their community, give to the United Way, and then they do something like that," said Brenda Ingargiola, the wife of the parish's emergency management director and a nurse at Chalmette for 29 years.

DOJ_NMG_0006639

Charlene Gonzalez's three grown children have all been promised by their employers that they will not lose their jobs, as has her husband, who works at the Port of New Orleans.

"Everybody's been taken care of," she said, "but UHS has left me high and dry."

For Illegal Immigrants, Some Aid Is Too Risky (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- The man who stood with his head bowed outside a cheap motel room here said his name is Almicar of Guatemala. He crept across the Mexican border into the United States a few years ago and since that time has found work as a painter in New Orleans.

But several weeks ago, Hurricane Katrina turned his world upside down along with everyone else's. Almicar, who gave only his first name for fear of being deported, said his situation is worse because he is an illegal immigrant. Since the storm hit, he has watched his neighbors at the motel call the Federal Emergency Management Agency to get money he will never see and food stamps that are forbidden to his family of five, and to seek jobs at the Social Security office, where he dares not show his face.

Almicar didn't speak a word of English, but his body language said it all. Eyes down, arms folded, back slumped, he had the visage of a defeated man.

"I'm afraid," he said in Spanish. His family's "situation is getting harder and harder. You don't know what to think, starting from zero again."

Much has been said about the suffering of the poor in New Orleans, but Latino civil rights advocates and relief workers say those troubled Americans are better off than immigrants who live in Gulf states illegally, working in restaurants, casinos, farms and construction.

Some have managed to get into shelters run by the Red Cross and Catholic Charities, which provide food and medical care, no questions asked. But when U.S. citizens in those shelters flock to cardboard tables where FEMA, Social Security and Internal Revenue Service agents sit, Latinos stay behind, watching from their cots, relief workers said.

The Department of Homeland Security recently announced that information provided by illegal immigrants seeking federal aid could be used against them later in deportation proceedings.

"The administration's priority is to provide needed assistance: water, food, medical care, shelter," said Joanna Gonzalez, a DHS spokeswoman. "However, as we move forward with the response, we can't turn a blind eye to the law."

That point was driven home when two illegal immigrants, from Honduras and El Salvador, were taken into custody in West Virginia by state police after a military cargo plane carrying 305 evacuees arrived there Sept. 5. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials say the two, who were friends, were taken into custody after state police received a complaint that one had been accused of a sexual assault.

"What that suggests is that the federal government is prepared to serve some victims but not others," said Cecilia Muñoz, vice president for policy at the National Council of La Raza. "That sends a terrifying message to the larger community."

In his national address Thursday, President Bush read off a list of services that the estimated 40,000 Mexicans and 150,000 Hondurans who lived in the New Orleans area cannot get: checks from Social Security, mail delivery by the Postal Service, money to rent apartments and temporary trailer homes.

Opponents of illegal immigration, such as Numbers USA, have fought giving financial aid to illegal immigrants. On the other side, a group of U.S. senators including Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) urged DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff to issue a statement reassuring immigrants that they could come forward without fear of deportation.

"We are very concerned because they're afraid to ask for help," Brent A. Wilkes, executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, said of illegal immigrants. "It's difficult to get word to them. They're in the dark much more so than other folks. They have a default position: to avoid authorities at all costs."

About 65 Latinos were staying at the $30-a-night motel where Almicar stood. Some were documented; many were not. A Guatemalan woman said she is consumed by worry and fear. She would not give her name, she said, because people would come to deport her.

DOJ_NMG_0006640

What if my children get sick? she wondered. "I guess I will have to go to the hospital and take my chances," she said.

Her friend Merling Buchanan, a Tulane University master's student from Honduras who speaks English, is the eyes and ears to the world for several of the Peruvians, Guatemalans and Ecuadoreans living at the motel.

"Normally when I get up, there's always someone I need to take somewhere," said Buchanan, a naturalized citizen. On Monday, a friend from Guatemala wanted to speak with a caseworkers at Catholic Community Services.

"The lines are long, so I stay all day," she said. "There is a list, and people write their name. I was number 102."

Days before, FEMA deposited $2,000 directly into her bank account, she said. At the cheap motel, that pittance seems like an embarrassment of riches.

Mario Fletes, 31, a Honduran painter, said he's very frustrated, watching his wife and three sons worry.

"I went to get unemployment, and they said they couldn't process my Social Security number," which, he insisted, is legitimate. "I went to apply for food stamps. They told me to come back in two days. I went Thursday. I went Friday. Finally, they told me not to come back."

Wilkes said FEMA doesn't have enough Spanish-speaking officials to handle even those who work legally on farms, in hotels and in casinos.

But David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, denied that. "We have Spanish-speaking operators on our registration phone lines," he said. "We understand the need to communicate with people in several different languages. If we have areas were we're lacking, advocacy groups can tell us. We're open to input."

Rony Reyes said his friends are almost out of money for the motel. Catholic Community Services of Baton Rouge paid the motel manager about $200 to keep some under a roof for a week.

"Thank God for the church," he said. "We would be sleeping in the parking lot now, no doubt."

But others are helping.

In Mississippi, a group called Project Prep braved floodwaters in Biloxi to get aid to Latino migrant farmworkers and others who feared deportation, said John D. Arnold, the project's director and co-founder.

Jacob Prado, who is coordinating relief efforts for the Mexican Embassy, distributed cash and airline tickets in and around Biloxi to Mexican citizens wishing to return to Mexico, an embassy spokesman said.

In San Antonio, a convoy of 45 Mexican army vehicles rolled into the city with troops and mobile kitchens capable of feeding 14,000 people. Elsewhere in Texas, Catholic Charities of Galveston/Houston doled out $300,000 to immigrant families as of Friday, about $25,000 a day, said Julissa Guerrero, the communications director.

"As quickly as the donations are coming in, they are going right back out," she said. "We are worried that people who are undocumented are falling through the cracks."

In Louisiana, Diane Chisholm, the director of migration and refugee services for Catholic Community Services of Baton Rouge, said documented and undocumented Latinos have poured through the group's doors every day for a week.

"I can say it's been hundreds of people," Chisholm said Monday.

Almicar and other immigrants living at the motel in East Baton Rouge Parish were residents of Metairie, La., near the New Orleans airport.

On the Saturday before Katrina struck, Buchanan was doing the wash when the New Orleans mayor said on television, in English, "We're facing the storm most of us have feared."

She woke her sleeping husband, who snapped at her. "How are we going to go? We don't have money." He eventually agreed to go and borrowed money from a friend.

"Hispanic friends . . . followed us because they didn't know where to go," Buchanan said. "They followed us because we speak English."

They formed a caravan of five rickety cars, one of which broke down en route to Baton Rouge.

The men work where they can find it, usually in towns more than an hour away. It costs about $20 in gas per trip, eating into their pay of about $90 each.

Right now, Reyes said, work is worth the sacrifice. The motel rooms are too precious to give up.

"If you leave, there are three people waiting to take them," he said. "It's all we have right now."

DOJ_NMG_0006641

Dying For A Drink Of Clean Water (WP)

By Jan Eliasson And Susan Blumenthal

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

In the United States and Europe, people take it for granted that when they turn on their taps, clean water will flow out. But for those living in U.S. cities devastated by Hurricane Katrina, as in large parts of the world, obtaining safe water requires a constant struggle.

Water is essential to all aspects of life, yet 99 percent of water on Earth is unsafe or unavailable to drink. About 1.2 billion people globally lack safe water to consume and 2.6 billion do not have access to adequate sanitation. There are also stark comparisons: Just one flush of a toilet in the West uses more water than most Africans have to perform an entire day's washing, cleaning, cooking and drinking.

Ensuring access to safe water worldwide is imperative. Water is an economic issue since it is essential for poverty reduction, agriculture, food and energy production, as well as recreation. It is a women's issue in the developing world because women have primary responsibility for household water gathering in many of these countries. Time spent hauling water robs women and girls of getting an education or engaging in meaningful work. It is a children's issue because water is essential for healthy development. A youngster dies every eight seconds from water-borne disease. And water is a national security issue because some of the world's conflicts today arise from disputes over arable land and water: The tragedy in Darfur, for example, was driven in no small part by tensions over access to water.

But most of all, water is a fundamental global health issue. Unsafe water and sanitation is now the single largest cause of illness worldwide, just as it has been a major threat to the health of people affected by Hurricane Katrina. A recent U.N. report has estimated that:

· At least 2 million people, most of them children, die annually from water-borne diseases such as diarrhea, cholera, dysentery, typhoid, guinea worm and hepatitis as well as such illnesses as malaria and West Nile virus carried by mosquitoes that breed in stagnant water.

· Many of the 10 million child deaths that occurred last year were linked to unsafe water and lack of sanitation. Children can't fight off infections if their bodies are weakened by water-borne diseases.

· Over half of the hospital beds in the developing world are occupied by people suffering from preventable diseases caused by unsafe water and inadequate sanitation.

If action is not taken now, 135 million people could die of water-related diseases by the year 2020. That is a larger number than those expected to fall victim to the HIV/AIDS pandemic, a catastrophe that has already killed 23 million people worldwide. Furthermore, water plays a critical role in this disease since many deaths from AIDS are linked to illnesses resulting from dehydration and diarrhea caused by unsafe water.

The United Nations has set a Millennium Development Goal -- to be reached by 2015 -- of reducing by half the percentage of people without access to safe drinking water and basic sanitation. There is a long way to go to reach this goal. That's why the U.N. General Assembly has declared the next 10 years to be the International Decade for Action on "Water for Life" to focus attention on this vital issue.

When poor people are asked what would most improve their lives, water and sanitation is repeatedly one of their highest priorities. We should heed their call. The recent decision by the leaders of the Group of Eight nations to double economic assistance for Africa has the potential to help if a significant portion of this aid goes to address the problems of water and sanitation. Developing countries should involve their citizens in decision making about how best to get improved water and sanitation services to their people. And developed nations should work with the ideas and aspirations of those countries and people they are seeking to help -- particularly women -- so that improvements can be sustained over the long term.

Nations in both the developing and developed world must share knowledge and experiences in public education, disease prevention, emergency response strategies, the application of new technologies and training. A global coalition of organizations, businesses and individuals must be mobilized across the public and private sectors for infrastructure development and innovation.

DOJ_NMG_0006642

Time is of the essence. By 2025 the world's population is projected to increase from 6.4 billion to 8.4 billion. At that time, 3.4 billion people could live in countries where water is scarce. Today we are talking about our planet as a global village. With coordinated efforts and a large influx of funding, the Gulf Coast region of the United States will, we hope, restore its water and sanitation systems within months. But unless we soon implement a global action plan for water with increased awareness, activism and resources, large numbers of people around the world will continue to suffer and die needlessly for generations to come for want of clean water.

Jan Eliasson, former Swedish ambassador to the United States, is the president of the United Nations General Assembly. Retired Rear Admiral Susan Blumenthal, a physician, served as assistant surgeon general of the United States. She is a clinical professor at the Georgetown and Tufts University schools of medicine.

Cameras Headed To Court? (RC)

By John Mcardle, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

Bill Would Put Supremes on Air For the past 20 years, every time a vacancy arises in the Supreme Court, C-SPAN General Counsel Bruce Collins is teased by the possibility that new blood on the bench might mean the highest court in the land would reconsider its stance on allowing cameras into its halls.

But while Collins waits, hoping the court's two new justices will allow proceedings to be televised, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee is ready to force the matter.

According to a GOP Congressional source close to the issue, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) — who has said that Congress legally has authority over court administration issues — intends to drop new legislation, possibly as early as this week, that will push for opening the Supreme Court to television cameras.

Specter had discussed the possibility of a bill at last week's hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice when the issue was brought up by Members on both sides of the aisle.

On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) pointedly asked Roberts if he was against cameras in the courtroom "like Justice [William] Rehnquist was."

"Well, you know, my new best friend, [former] Sen. [Fred] Thompson [R-Tenn.], assures me that television cameras are nothing to be afraid of," Roberts responded. "But I don't have a set view on that. I do think it's something that I would want to listen to the views of — if I were confirmed — to my colleagues."

On Tuesday, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) also asked Roberts about the issue and made clear his support for cameras in the Supreme Court.

"Americans can watch virtually every significant event of national importance on television, except for oral arguments and announcement of decisions at the Supreme Court," Feingold said. "If you are confirmed, you will essentially disappear from public view ... The possibility of televising trials raises some complicated issues, because we have to consider the safety and rights of criminal defendants and witnesses and jurors, but such concerns are not so present in the case of appellate proceedings ... I think it would benefit the country and the court if all Americans had a chance to see the court conduct its work."

But with Roberts noncommittal, Collins — who first worked to get the Supreme Court to open its oral arguments to C-SPAN and other network audiences in 1985 and has continued to push for cameras in the court several times in the past two decades — continues to wait.

"We've got so much experience with these bursts of interest in this issue that never go anywhere that we're taking a 'wait and see' attitude," Collins said. "If there seems to be a serious interest this time we will definitely follow up by restating our many-year-old commitment to air every minute of every oral argument of every court term and we would be in the middle of these efforts to ensure they happen."

For the past four years, Grassley and several other Senate co-sponsors have been pushing the Sunshine in the Courtroom Act. The bill, which was reintroduced to the 109th Congress in April, would give full discretion to the presiding judge of a case as to whether cameras or recording devices would be allowed during proceedings in federal trial and appellate courts, including the Supreme Court. In appellate courts, the most senior active judge — the chief justice in the case of the Supreme Court — would have discretion on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0006643

It's not yet clear how Specter's new bill would differ from Grassley's, but in an interview earlier this month on C-SPAN's "Q & A" that was filmed before Rehnquist's death, Specter said that pushing for cameras in the Supreme Court was something he had been wanting to move forward with for a long time. He said he hadn't done so "out of deference to Chief Justice Rehnquist."

"I think Congress has the authority to say there ought to be television of the Supreme Court," Specter had said. "Nobody can tell them how to decide cases. But Congress decides, for example, how many justices there will be ... We established time limits. We say when they start to sit on the first Monday in October, and I think, on an administrative matter, that the Supreme Court is subject to a Congressional determination.

"Now they may disagree with this and say, 'It's an invasion of separation of powers.' I don't think it is," Specter said. "But they decide so many cases five to four on the cutting edge. And I think that it would be very helpful for the public to have a great understanding as to what they do."

While C-SPAN's Collins agreed that Congress does have the authority to pass legislation to open the Supreme Court to cameras, he said that "in the end, I can't see the Congress forcing the Supreme Court" to allow cameras in.

And even if Roberts were to come out in favor of cameras in the court and gets confirmed as chief justice, "as a new chief getting his sea legs, so to speak, I don't think he's going to cause trouble over the issue of television.

"I don't think this is a policy issue that can be won on points and authorities, it'll be a personal decision on the part of the judges. And I don't think it'll be a five-four decision, I think it'll have to be a nine-zero decision."

But Henry Schleiff, Court TV CEO, who has been looking to open federal courts to television cameras since the network's founding in 1991 and, like C-SPAN, would carry the court's oral arguments gavel to gavel, said he thought that Roberts' statements at last week's hearings exhibited a fresh sort of open-mindedness to the issue.

"We were encouraged to hear the modern thinking by what is clearly a modern jurist taking a more modern approach," Schleiff said.

Schleiff said Court TV has actively supported Grassley's bill in the past and is in the midst of preparing letters to Roberts, Specter and other Judiciary Committee members to lobby on its behalf.

But Collins said he remains skeptical.

"In 1985 when we started on this, C-SPAN and others, if you'd asked me then if we would have had cameras in the Supreme Court in the next 20 years, I would have said 'well certainly,' because the Court would change its membership and it would have new justices with new views on it," Collins said. "All I can tell you is that the generational change seems to be slower than we thought earlier. There might be a possibility that we might get them but I'm not going to put a date on it."

Senate Poised For Test Vote On Drug Reimportation (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, September 20, 2005

The Senate is poised to vote for the first time on language to ease access to prescription drugs imported from abroad during consideration of the agriculture-appropriations bill currently on the Senate floor, fulfilling a promise made by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in July.

Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) has proposed an amendment to the agriculture spending bill that would block the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) from preventing people from importing prescription medicines.

The language was introduced Thursday but had not been placed in the queue for a vote by press time yesterday. Frist hopes to wrap up the agriculture bill by the middle or end of this week, according to a spokesperson. Vitter is the author of a measure that would establish FDA regulation of imported drugs.

As part of an agreement with Vitter, Frist vowed to permit the amendment as a test vote for Senate support of relaxing restrictions on consumers' obtaining drugs at lower prices from countries such as Canada that use price controls to hold down the cost of medicines

DOJ_NMG_0006644

Vitter had threatened to block the confirmation of FDA Commissioner Lester Crawford but backed down when Frist promised not to stall the drug-imports amendment when the agriculture-appropriations bill came to the floor.

Prescription-drug importation, or "reimportation," as it is it is sometimes called, enjoys broad support in the Congress but is opposed by the GOP leadership in both chambers and by the White House.

On Wednesday, the Senate took action that could augur well for Vitter's amendment. It adopted legislation by unanimous consent that would prevent the U.S. trade representative from making deals that would preclude drug imports.

The House passed a bill virtually identical to Vitter's measure during the last Congress, but the Senate never took up the legislation. Sens. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) are the chief sponsors of a rival bill. Backers of drug importation, including Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), are expected to vote in favor of whatever vehicle first reaches the floor.

According to the agreement with Frist, if the Vitter amendment attracts more than 60 votes, a standalone drug-imports bill would be given floor time at a later date. If the amendment is attached to the agriculture bill, it is expected to be stripped out during conference discussions.

The pharmaceutical industry repeatedly has cautioned that drug makers cannot guarantee the safety of medicines entering the U.S. market from abroad, often citing the proliferation of counterfeiting rings and other criminal enterprises linked to the cross-border trade of prescription drugs.

Social Security Appears To Be DOA In Senate (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

Though it might be premature to say the nail is in the coffin of President Bush's push to overhaul Social Security, there appear to be plenty of Republicans on Capitol Hill these days who are willing to serve as pallbearers.

In fact, with last week's revelation that National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) thinks that voting on a Social Security overhaul would be political suicide for House Republicans in 2006, Senate leaders are doing little to quell a notion, floated by Reynolds, that any measure offering personal investment accounts under the government's retirement security program would be dead on arrival in the Senate.

Asked if Reynolds was correct to assume that the Senate would be unable or unwilling to take up Social Security in this Congress, Senate Majority Whip

Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said, "It is my personal opinion that Social Security reform ought only to go forward on a bipartisan basis. And as of this moment ... I am unaware of any Democrat who has signed on" to negotiations over personal accounts.

Indeed, Democrats in both chamber have steadfastly refused to even consider the notion of private accounts, saying that the change would make current promised benefits to retirees subject to the whims of Wall Street, and the costs to transition to private accounts would bankrupt the system.

On Monday, Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) unveiled "lockbox" legislation that would keep Social Security revenues from being used for anything other than benefits — a proposal that places the focus on the solvency of the existing program rather than on a major overhaul. Bush's plan, "in my opinion, is not going anywhere," he told reporters.

Republican backers of the president's plan, however, argue that personal investment accounts are the only way to salvage a retirement system slated to become insolvent by mid-century and that retirees stand to reap even more money from the stock market than they are guaranteed under Social Security.

Of course, the uppermost worry among Reynolds and other Republicans with cold feet on Social Security is not about whether the Bush plan will work. Rather, their concern is whether voting to create private accounts will trigger a voter backlash that significantly weakens the GOP Congressional majority — or even hands control to the Democrats.

Indeed, one aide to a Senate Finance Committee Republican said that Reynolds' concerns mirror those of many Senate Republicans who have been "privately for months ... voicing the same concerns."

"I don't think we have the time [on the Senate floor schedule], and I don't think we have the political will," the aide said.

Even one of the most vocal supporters of private accounts, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), acknowledged that Republicans in the Senate are skittish about taking up Social Security before the 2006 midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0006645

"I think the Senate, like the House, has got to get over being afraid for ourselves," Graham said. "It's a short-sighted view for our party to put off addressing this issue. There will never be a politically opportune time."

Despite admonitions like that from true believers, it isn't as if Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) or Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) are clearing their chambers' schedules for the debate, especially given the onslaught of legislation related to Hurricane Katrina in both chambers, plus two Supreme Court nominees for the Senate to confirm.

While the timeline for House action this fall on Social Security was vague to begin with, Hastert gave an even hazier timeline when asked about it by reporters last week. "Social Security is something very important. It's something we've talked about doing, and when we decide to move forward we'll let the press know," he said, adding that the House is focused on aiding Katrina evacuees first.

Similarly, Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said the Senator is "still interested in considering Social Security reform," but noted the loaded Senate schedule has pushed the issue off the front burner. "We'll see where we are later in the fall," she said.

Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) also put Social Security at the bottom of his list recently, saying that the response to Katrina, Supreme Court nominations, a budget reconciliation bill and the 12 annual appropriations bills take precedence, according to a spokeswoman.

Still, Grassley noted that if the House takes action on Social Security, it could give the issue added momentum in the Senate.

However, Senate Finance ranking member Max Baucus (D-Mont.) said Republicans are just giving lip service about their intentions on Social Security at this point.

"It's all bluster," he said. "Private accounts have a close-to-zero chance of being enacted this year. ... I think Grassley's stock is also close to zero on this."

Though Reynolds and others fear the repercussions of voting on Social Security at the ballot box, the crisis management in Washington over the botched recovery from Katrina is providing Republican leaders with a handy excuse for sidelining Social Security for the rest of this Congress.

"Katrina is the perfect way for Republicans to bow out gracefully without making the president look bad," said an aide to a Finance Republican.

Many Republicans already have acknowledged that trying to bring up the subject during an election year would most certainly spell political death.

Of course, there are a few holdouts trying to give the issue fresh energy, notably, Senate Republican Conference Chairman Rick Santorum (Pa.). Santorum is pushing a bill that would guarantee that senior citizens 55 or older would continue to receive their promised Social Security benefits if private accounts were introduced for younger workers.

Santorum is reportedly hoping to move his bill alongside a measure by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) that would give workers born after 1950 the option of placing part of their Social Security taxes in private investment accounts. DeMint, like Santorum, has expressed a desire to move forward with the plan as well.

Santorum has said the bill will assure seniors that Democratic scare tactics on Social Security are just that, but the introduction of the bill also appears to be a tacit acknowledgement that those Democratic tactics are working.

And, of course, Bush has shown no signs of accepting or acknowledging defeat. He's meeting this week with the very people who recommended he push private accounts in the first place — his 2001 Commission to Strengthen Social Security.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

Kerry's complaint

Sen. John Kerry yesterday said Hurricane Katrina exposed "a broader pattern of incompetence and negligence" in the Bush administration and showed what a bad choice Americans made in re-electing the president last year.

DOJ_NMG_0006646

"The truth is, democracy is not a game. We are living precious time each day in a different America than the one we can inhabit if we make different choices," Mr. Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat and his party's 2004 presidential nominee, said in a speech at Brown University.

Mr. Kerry used the speech as a fundraising technique, sending an advance preview to his e-mail list of supporters along with a link to click if they wanted to contribute to his political activities.

In his remarks, he said the hurricane is a watershed moment for Americans to define themselves, but that the president has failed to lead.

"Yes, they can run a good campaign -- I can attest to that -- but America needs more than a campaign," he said. "If 12-year-old Boy Scouts can be prepared, Americans have a right to expect the same from their 59-year-old president of the United States."

"Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry," said Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt, who called his and other Democrats' recent remarks an "unsavory" attempt to politicize the hurricane.

For nonbelievers

Atheists finally have a lobbyist of their own.

She is Lori Lipman Brown, 47, a former Nevada state senator and lawyer with a background in constitutional law, who is going to work for the Secular Coalition for America, an umbrella group. She's interested in church-state separation issues and says she intends to "help us move toward the day when humanists and atheists are regarded with the same respect as the rest of society."

She began work yesterday at the D.C. headquarters of the American Humanist Association and also will be representing the concerns of the Atheist Alliance International, the Institute for Humanist Studies, the Secular Student Alliance and the Secular Web.

"For humanists, having a full-time lobbyist is a historic accomplishment," said Roy Speckhardt, AHA executive director. "It's a culmination of our efforts to establish a seat at the table for our views.

"Having a lobbyist focusing on a secular point of view is more essential now than ever before. With the three branches of government drenched in religiosity, we have to let America know that we are here, too."

Voinovich's plan

Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, said yesterday that Social Security personal-account proposals aren't going anywhere this year, but that Congress should pass legislation to lock away federal trust funds, including Social Security dollars, to ensure government can't spend them.

Mr. Voinovich introduced a bill that would require all specially designated government revenue, including Social Security, be saved for those purposes and not spent on other programs. The government, he said, has borrowed more than $3.5 trillion from various trust funds, including $1.9 trillion from Social Security and $695 billion from the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund, but that borrowing is not reported to the public as part of the overall deficit.

"What we've been doing every year is raiding those trust funds," he said, arguing that taking the money off the table will reveal the true size of the deficit and force Congress to limit spending, raise taxes or increase borrowing. "We've got to get real."

Mr. Voinovich said overall Social Security reform will not happen this year with other issues, such as hurricane-relief efforts, dominating the agenda. "The Social Security thing, in my opinion, isn't going anywhere," he said. "It may have been doomed from the beginning because it wasn't done on a bipartisan basis."

He added that since much has to be done to get the government's fiscal house in order, he hopes President Bush's tax cuts will not be made permanent, as some Republicans propose.

Flood of money

"There's an old adage that no one in Washington can tell the difference between $1 million and $1 billion. Seldom has that Beltway learning disability been more vividly demonstrated than in the weeks since Katrina," the Wall Street Journal's Stephen Moore writes.

DOJ_NMG_0006647

"When President Bush announced last Thursday that the feds would take a lead role in the reconstruction of New Orleans, he in effect established a new $200 billion federal line of credit. To put that $200 billion in perspective, we could give every one of the 500,000 families displaced by Katrina a check for $400,000, and they could each build a beachfront home virtually anywhere in America," Mr. Moore said.

"This flood of money comes on the heels of a massive domestic spending build-up in progress well before Katrina traveled its ruinous path. Federal spending, not counting the war in Iraq, was growing by 7 percent this year, which came atop the 30 percent hike over Mr. Bush's first term.

"Republicans were already being ridiculed as the Grand Old Spending Party by taxpayer groups. Their check-writing binge in response to the hurricane only confirmed, as conservative leader Paul Weyrich put it, that 'the GOP, once the party of small government, has lost its bearings and the Republican establishment doesn't seem to get the message that the grass roots of the party is enraged.' "

No run-off

Democrat Fernando Ferrer has enough votes to officially win the New York mayoral primary and will face Republican Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg on Nov. 8, officials said yesterday.

After a week of uncertainty, Mr. Ferrer edged just past the 40 percent mark as election workers finished counting thousands of absentee and other untallied votes cast in the Sept. 13 primary, Board of Elections officials said.

Officials had said a runoff would have been required by law with the second-place finisher, Rep. Anthony Weiner, if no one had reached 40 percent -- even though Mr. Weiner had conceded defeat.

A "painstaking recanvass" found Mr. Ferrer, the former Bronx borough president, received 192,243 votes of the more than 478,000 votes cast, Board of Elections Executive Director John Ravitz said yesterday. That put him about at 40.15 percent, or 720 votes over the 40 percent threshold, the Associated Press reports.

"There will not be a runoff between Fernando Ferrer and Anthony Weiner," Mr. Ravitz said.

Earlier, cheers rang out at Ferrer campaign headquarters as staff members heard the reports.

FDA Rethinks Women's Chief (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

One week ago, the Office of Women's Health of the Food and Drug Administration sent an e-mail notice to women's groups and others announcing the appointment of Norris Alderson as its new acting director.

An FDA veteran trained in animal husbandry who spent much of his career in the agency's Center for Veterinary Medicine, Alderson quickly became the subject of active and largely negative comment on the Internet and elsewhere.

The Office of Women's Health serves as a liaison with women's health groups and as an advocate on women's issues; critics said that a man with a primarily veterinary background could not properly fill the role.

The last director, Susan Wood, resigned last month to protest the agency's unwillingness to make a decision on whether to make emergency contraception more easily available.

Three days after the Alderson announcement, the FDA main press office sent out a very different announcement. It said that 20-year FDA veteran Theresa A. Toigo would be the new acting director of the women's health office, and that she would be a champion for women's health inside and outside the agency. Alderson -- and the statement announcing his appointment -- was never mentioned.

Asked yesterday who exactly was running the office, FDA spokeswoman Suzanne Trevino said that Alderson had never been appointed acting director. She said that Toigo would take over from the departed Wood, and that her office knew nothing about the statement regarding Alderson, who is the agency's associate commissioner for science.

"There was no official decision made until we announced Theresa Toigo's appointment on Friday," Trevino said.

The seeming mystery thickened when several women's groups said that not only did they receive e-mails announcing Alderson's appointment, but also that he was also listed on a Health and Human Services directory last week as the acting director of the office. In addition, people who have spoken with women's health office staff said that Alderson was introduced to the staff last week as the new acting director, and that he even had some one-on-one discussions with staff members about future plans.

DOJ_NMG_0006648

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), a longtime advocate for the FDA's women's health office, said she already had been concerned by Wood's resignation. "I was further concerned to learn last week that Dr. Norris E. Alderson, someone without women's health experience who has spent the majority of his career at the Center for Veterinary Medicine, was appointed acting director of this important office," she said in a statement yesterday.

Toigo has led the FDA's Office of Special Health Issues, which works with patient advocates on issues such as AIDS and cancer. The FDA announcement of her appointment also says that she has worked with the women's health office on agency initiatives related to the inclusion of women and minorities in clinical trials.

Former director Wood called Toigo a good choice. "She's a very capable and dedicated person who will do an excellent job," Wood said.

But many women's health groups remain unhappy with the FDA and what they consider to be the agency's questionable leadership.

"Once again, this episode shows the agency's complete tone-deafness," said Kirsten Moore, director of the Reproductive Health Technologies Project. "It underscores our concern about the degree of competence at the leadership level, and about political appointees who just don't know much" about the issues before the agency.

Is FDA's New Chief Counsel A Change In Name Only? (LEGTIMES)

By Lily Henning, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 20, 2005

Sheldon Bradshaw arrived at the Food and Drug Administration without the baggage lugged around by his predecessor.

The previous chief counsel at the FDA, Daniel Troy, was pilloried by critics who slammed his close ties to the drug industry. Troy made a name for himself suing the agency on behalf of drug and tobacco companies before moving to the government agency early in the Bush administration.

Bradshaw, who came to the FDA as chief counsel from the Justice Department in April, has escaped that kind of scrutiny, largely because he hasn't had those corporate relationships. But that doesn't necessarily mean a new day has dawned.

In fact, despite Troy's return to the private sector, his controversial legal policies remain in force at the agency. Like Troy, Bradshaw offers one-on-one meetings with the companies regulated by the agency, has kept low the number of warnings issued to companies violating regulations, and, perhaps most notably, has continued to intervene on behalf of drug companies in private civil lawsuits.

Last week, Bradshaw signed off on a brief agreeing with Pfizer Inc.'s claim that three years ago the FDA would not have allowed the drug company to warn consumers about a link between suicidal behavior and the use of its best-selling antidepressant, Zoloft, by adolescents, an argument Pfizer is using to ward off liability.

That approach and a lighter regulatory hand put the public at risk, consumer and public health advocates complain. And even some in the drug and medical-device industries find the regulatory regime under Troy, and now Bradshaw, discomforting, claiming that without strong FDA oversight, companies are being hauled into court more frequently by state attorneys general and private plaintiffs.

"One of our clients said to me a few months ago, 'I miss the FDA,'" says Arnold & Porter's Donald Beers, a food and drug attorney who served as associate chief counsel for drugs and for enforcement in the FDA's Office of Chief Counsel between 1975 and 1985. "An aggressive FDA that occupies the stage is sometimes better than having lots of different people sniping at you."

STAYING THE COURSE

Before joining the FDA in April, Bradshaw was principal deputy assistant attorney general in the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division.

Bradshaw's move to the FDA -- generally considered a less prestigious agency for government lawyers than the Justice Department -- surprised some of his former colleagues, who describe him as being part of an ideologically conservative group of young leaders in deputy positions at the DOJ.

DOJ_NMG_0006649

He also worked in the Office of Legal Counsel, made up of an elite group of lawyers at Justice who advise the executive branch. Among the office's alumni is Troy. Both he and Bradshaw were part of the Bush administration's advance legal teams in 2001.

Bradshaw says that his lack of experience in the food and drug regulatory arena could be, in the wake of what he says was unfair criticism of Troy, a good thing.

"I think it's helped me in my transition that I wasn't seen as already having made up my mind on certain issues," Bradshaw says. "There isn't a perception that I would have a preference in any given case."

But those looking for changes to policies initiated under Troy will be disappointed. Bradshaw says he has no intention of changing the way the FDA's legal department does business.

That continuity was evident last Thursday, when the government filed an amicus brief in Utah reiterating the argument championed by Troy that the FDA's jurisdiction over prescription-drug labeling prevents plaintiffs from suing Pfizer over Zoloft's lack of a warning label.

"Wherever I go, people ask me if I am going to continue Troy's policy in pre-emption cases," Bradshaw says, adding that the FDA does not take such action by itself and must have consent from the Department of Justice and the political leadership at the Department of Health and Human Services.

Troy was a pioneer of the government's intervention on behalf of Pfizer in cases related to Zoloft and suicide, contending the FDA would not have permitted Pfizer to warn about the suicide risk because there was not enough scientific support for the warning. The government's involvement began in September 2002, when Justice, joined by the FDA, filed a friend of the court brief in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals case Motus v. Pfizer. (The 9th Circuit, however, ultimately decided the case on different grounds, never reaching the pre-emption issue.)

The argument was based on the premise that since the FDA has sole jurisdiction over the labeling process of prescription drugs, drug companies like Pfizer should not be held liable for warnings on products if they follow FDA requirements.

The FDA's involvement in the Pfizer case sparked indignation among interest groups, which complained that Troy, who had represented Pfizer in private practice, was leaping to the defense of industry. Plaintiffs advocates complain that if the FDA's legal argument in the Zoloft case is applied broadly, then victims won't be able to sue if they are injured by any FDA-regulated product.

Pfizer has used the 2002 brief for the past three years to fend off lawsuits involving Zoloft-related suicides.

In June, Judge Paul Cassell of the U.S. District Court for the District of Utah asked the government to weigh in again, noting that the FDA's opinion was important because the agency had injected itself into the debate with the 2002 brief.

In that case -- the first in which the government has intervened since Bradshaw took over -- the family of 15-year-old Shyra Kallas sued Pfizer, claiming that Zoloft's label at the time their daughter committed suicide in 2002 did not disclose the risks of suicide and suicide-related side effects associated with the use of Zoloft in adolescents.

They also claim Pfizer failed to warn Kallas' doctor of that possibility.

Kallas, who was prescribed Zoloft by her primary-care doctor, shot and killed herself a month after starting on the drug.

Cassell asked the FDA to explain whether the 2002 brief would apply to the Kallas case, noting that the case involves a minor. The drug is not approved for treatment of depression in adolescents. And while Bradshaw calls the circumstances of the Kallas case "tragic," last week's filing didn't alter the position the government held under Troy.

Judges have had mixed responses to the FDA's position on the Zoloft cases, of which there are now more than a dozen nationwide. In a March 2005 decision in a federal court in Texas, in which Pfizer had filed the 2002 amicus brief, Judge William Steger wrote that Pfizer had relied heavily on the FDA to support its arguments. But the judge ruled that evidence before the agency did suggest that a warning about suicide risks was appropriate and that the FDA's regulations do indeed allow a manufacturer to add to or strengthen a warning without prior agency approval.

Karen Menzies, who represents plaintiffs in cases related to Zoloft, notes that Pfizer never asked the FDA if it could warn consumers about the suicide risk, adding that the FDA had information about the suicide risk associated with antidepressants like Zoloft since the early 1990s but did not analyze it.

The contention that the agency would have prevented Pfizer from issuing the warning is "pure speculation by the FDA's attorneys," says Menzies, a partner with Baum Hedlund in Los Angeles. "But the sheer weight of the FDA intervening is very persuasive."

Pfizer has consistently denied any link between suicidal behavior and the use of Zoloft by adolescents. Last fall, after a review of studies on risks of suicidal thoughts and behaviors in children taking antidepressants, the FDA directed manufacturers to add a "black box" warning -- the most severe kind of advisory -- to the medications' labels to emphasize the need for close monitoring of child patients taking those drugs.

THE OLD ORDER

Troy, 45, is, for many critics of the Bush administration's FDA, Exhibit A of the dangers of appointing a regulator who clashed with the very agency in which he would later play a pivotal role.

The first appointment to the FDA made by President George W. Bush, Troy says his was a necessarily high-profile role. As chief counsel, he gave nearly 80 speeches and met with dozens of industry groups.

Troy says the meetings sometimes helped to narrow the scope of litigation against the agency and, in some situations, to avoid it. "Sometimes when they heard our side, they said that's a good point -- or we're not going to beat you in court," Troy says. "Sometimes I ended up hearing their tale and decided that we were wrong."

Troy was slammed by a wide range of detractors, from newspaper editorial writers to Capitol Hill legislators, for what they said were brazen actions benefiting the industries he represented in private practice.

Before joining the FDA, Troy, as a partner at Wiley, Rein & Fielding, represented tobacco-maker Brown & Williamson in a successful effort to ward off FDA oversight of tobacco. He also played a key role in the 1990s campaign -- spearheaded by the Washington Legal Foundation, a conservative legal group -- that challenged advertising restrictions on prescription drugs. The lawsuits were successful, freeing drug companies to engage in "off-label" promotion of their prescription products.

As chief counsel, Troy was accused of stalling efforts to investigate complaints about the supplement ephedra and loosening the application of rules governing prescription-drug advertising.

"He in a lot of ways transformed the role of chief counsel," says James Czaban, a partner at Heller Ehrman in Washington. "He asserted himself very visibly in key decisions. Troy allowed interested companies much greater access to him and the legal staff to advocate a position or talk about issues."

In early 2004, Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., introduced, and Congress passed, an amendment to take $500,000 away from Troy's office and add it to the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation Research budget. Hinchey argued that by interceding in civil suits on behalf of drug-makers like Pfizer, Troy was ignoring conflicts of interest and putting drug consumers at risk.

James O'Reilly, a food and drug law expert and adjunct professor at the University of Cincinnati School of Law, says one of the considerations in choosing Bradshaw to replace Troy was to "avoid the Hinchey scenario."

"It may be a careful tactic to appoint Sheldon," says O'Reilly. "He comes without the baggage."

THE NEW BOSS

Bradshaw maintains that he can take a fresh look at the legal questions facing the agency. Perhaps fresher, he says, than "someone who has ties to the regulated industry."

This week he is speaking at the Generic Pharmaceutical Association's policy conference in Washington about legal issues facing the generic-drug industry.

He also continues an open-door policy to the chief counsel's office that Troy initiated, meeting with drug and medical-device companies in "courtesy visits."

Over the summer, Bradshaw's visitors included Pfizer General Counsel Jeffrey Kindler, lawyers from Covington & Burling, Alston & Bird and other firms.

Sounding much like his predecessor, Bradshaw says: "I'm happy to meet with anyone who wants to come in and talk, no matter what side -- industry or citizen groups. It benefits me to hear everyone out."

By winter, Troy could be making similar visits to Bradshaw.

Now a partner at Sidley Austin Brown & Wood, Troy works for a firm that he says "represents pretty much almost every company" in the brand-name drug industry.

DOJ_NMG_0006651

This year, among Sidley's lobbying clients are pharmaceutical companies Hoffman La-Roche Inc., Bayer Corp. and Schering Plough Corp. Troy also does work for Pfizer Inc., and did so while working for Bert Rein at Wiley Rein & Fielding.

Although Troy cannot lobby or appear before the FDA until the end of November because of a one-year "quiet period" after leaving the government, his clients can still benefit from the policies he helped put in place.

Since Bradshaw arrived in April, the number of warning letters, which caution companies about violations of food and drug regulations, sent out per month stayed consistent with the dramatic drop-off that occurred during Troy's tenure. Under Troy, the agency's legal department began to review the letters, which do not represent legal action and give the offenders an opportunity to fix the problem. If it isn't remedied, the agency can sue.

So far in 2005, 23 warning letters to advertisers and seven compliance letters regarding manufacturing or compliance problems have gone out. In 2002, 28 advertising letters and 15 compliance letters were sent. By contrast, during the Clinton administration in 1999, 110 letters warning about illegal advertising claims were sent. Bradshaw says that it is not his goal to reduce the number of warnings.

"I don't have any particular agenda about how many ought to be going out or to whom," Bradshaw says of the letters. "I don't view myself as a policy-maker. Someone else decides the policy. I'm here to make sure that they are legally accurate and defensible."

NASA Planning Return To Moon Within 13 Years (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - Combining an old concept, existing equipment and new ideas, NASA gave shape on Monday to President Bush's promise to send humans back to the Moon by the end of the next decade.

Michael D. Griffin, the agency's new administrator, detailed a $104 billion plan that he said would get astronauts to the Moon by 2018, serve as a steppingstone to Mars and beyond, and stay within NASA's existing budget.

The plan would use a new spacecraft similar to the Apollo command capsule of the original Moon program, and new rockets made up largely of components from the space shuttle program.

"It is very Apollo-like," Dr. Griffin said, "but bigger. Think of it as Apollo on steroids."

The plan drew a mixture of praise and criticism from lawmakers and space experts. [News analysis, Page A15.]

The chairman of the House Science Committee, Representative Sherwood Boehlert, Republican of New York, said it appeared to be "the safest, least expensive and most efficient way" of moving forward in space exploration, but added that current cost overruns in other NASA programs might make it hard to develop the new vehicle on schedule.

The outlines of the plan had been disclosed informally over the last two months by NASA officials and space experts. But Dr. Griffin's announcement laid out a timetable and a budget, putting flesh on the bones of a proposal that Mr. Bush announced in January 2004 but had never described in detail.

Dr. Griffin said that after adjusting for inflation, the program would cost just 55 percent of what it cost to put a dozen men on the lunar surface from 1969 to 1972.

The pay-as-you-go plan, approved by the White House last week, would stay within NASA's $16-billion-a-year budget through a combination of retiring the space shuttle, finishing the International Space Station and reallocating money from other NASA programs. And Dr. Griffin said the nation could well afford it, despite concern about tight budgets in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"We're talking about returning to the Moon in 2018," he said at a news conference here in Washington. "There will be a lot more hurricanes and a lot more other natural disasters to befall the United States and the world in that time, I hope none worse than Katrina.

"But the space program is a long-term investment in our future. We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in our future. When we have a hurricane, we don't cancel the Air Force. We don't cancel the Navy. And we're not going to cancel NASA."

DOJ_NMG_0006652

Dr. Griffin and other space advocates, including influential members of Congress, have said the United States needs a replacement for the aging shuttle fleet as a matter of national security. Russia and China are currently capable of human spaceflight, and other countries have expressed interest in following suit. Dr. Griffin said the nation must maintain an independent capability to send people into space after the shuttle retires in 2010.

The new craft, called the crew exploration vehicle, would perch the astronauts' capsule above the rockets that power it into space, rather than alongside them as with the shuttle. NASA officials said it would be 10 times as safe as the shuttle, with a projected failure rate of 1 in 2,000, as opposed to 1 in 220 for the shuttle. The increased safety, they said, will be due in part to escape rockets that will be able to jettison the capsule away from the booster rocket in the event of an accident.

Dr. Griffin said the vehicle would be able to take as many as six astronauts to the space station, or fewer astronauts and some cargo. Or it could fly robotically without a crew, he added, carrying up some 25 tons of cargo, about as much as a shuttle can carry. The wingless craft, weighing 50 percent more than the Apollo, could carry a crew of four to the Moon.

As envisioned, the craft would resemble a larger version of the Russian spacecraft Soyuz, including solar-power panels deployed after launching. It would be carried aloft on a modified version of one of the shuttle's solid-fueled rocket boosters and a new second stage using one of the shuttle's main liquid-fueled engines. For Moon voyages, the craft would rendezvous in Earth orbit with lunar components lifted on a big new cargo rocket.

This heavy-cargo rocket, which could put 125 tons into orbit, would comprise two extended shuttle solid-fuel boosters attached to a liquid hydrogen-oxygen first stage made of an extended shuttle external fuel tank with five shuttle main engines. Atop this would be a new second stage using one or more of the shuttle main engines.

The bigger rocket, capable of lifting the payload of the Saturn V, which sent men to the Moon decades ago, would put into Earth orbit another rocket that could carry a landing craft and the crew vehicle to the Moon.

The Moon mission would be accomplished in stages. First, a vehicle with a lunar lander and a Moon rocket would be launched into Earth orbit. The crew capsule would be launched as much as a month later and would meet the first vehicle in orbit.

The joined craft would then be propelled to lunar orbit. From there, the landing craft would fly to the surface, and its crew of four would spend up to a week exploring.

Afterward, the top part of the two-piece lander would take the crew back to lunar orbit to rendezvous with the crew vehicle, which would have been left there unmanned, for the trip back to Earth. The bottom part of the lander could be left behind with equipment that might be used by future crews that land nearby, the agency said.

Nearing Earth, the crew vehicle would jettison its equipment module before the crew capsule plunged into the atmosphere. Parachutes would slow the capsule before it landed in the water or on land, possibly at Edwards Air Force Base in California. The landing would be cushioned by air bags on the craft's bottom or small rockets that fire just before touchdown.

Some of the big military contractors that stand to win multibillion-dollar contracts to launch and maintain the new mission vehicles said they were pleased by Monday's announcement.

"This is a big deal for us," said Michael Coats, chief of space exploration for the nation's largest military contractor, the Lockheed Martin Corporation, one of two teams competing to build the crew exploration vehicle. "Today's announcement means that we will have a stable program for a while. It would be great for us to compete and win a piece of the business."

Lockheed is the leader of a consortium that currently has a $28 million contract to design the crew exploration vehicle. Another team, headed by the Boeing Company and Northrop Grumman, has an identical contract to design an alternative. NASA is expected to select the winning design next spring.

John E. Pike, a space policy expert with the consulting firm GlobalSecurity.org, said NASA needed to sell more people on the value of a Moon program if it is to preserve future budgets and continue space exploration. The Moon may be a source of the rare element helium-3, for instance, which could fuel fusion reactors to provide abundant electricity on Earth, he said.

"NASA," Mr. Pike said, "needs to have reasons like this to go back to the Moon so the program has more stakeholders who see its value and want to protect it."

NASA Aims For A Return To Moon By 2018 (Houston Chronicle)

DOJ_NMG_0006653

By Mark Carreau

Houston Chronicle, September 20, 2005

The United States can return to the moon with human explorers by 2018 at a cost of $104 billion by relying on crew capsules similar to those used in the Apollo program and rocketry inherited from the space shuttle, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said Monday.

"Think of this as Apollo on steroids," the space agency chief said.

NASA's Apollo program ended in December 1972, after a dozen American astronauts explored the lunar terrain during six missions as part of a Cold War rivalry with the former Soviet Union.

The strategy outlined by Griffin at a Washington news briefing is a response to a January 2004 directive from President Bush that tasked NASA with retiring its aging space shuttle fleet by 2010 in order to fund missions to the moon, Mars and eventually other deep-space destinations.

Houston's Johnson Space Center, where 15,000 people are employed, will lead the deep-space exploration planning and spacecraft-development efforts, if a debt-conscious Congress supports NASA's plan.

The exploration strategy relies on the development of upgraded versions of the three-man Apollo capsules capable of transporting four explorers to the moon and the continued production of space shuttle fuel tanks in Louisiana, solid rocket boosters in Utah and rocket engines in California.

Given a mandate Griffin took over the $16.1-billion-a-year space agency in mid-April with orders from the White House to quickly devise an exploration strategy carrying out Bush's directives with only modest budget increases.

On Monday, Griffin defended the plan's $104 billion price tag, which will cover expenses through the first mission, in the face of new budget pressures to pay the soaring costs of the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort and the escalating expense of the Iraq war.

"The space program is a long-term investment in our future," Griffin said. "We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in the future. When we have a hurricane, we don't cancel the Air Force, we don't cancel the Navy. We're not going to cancel NASA."

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, the Sugar Land Republican whose district includes Johnson Space Center, hailed the plan during a visit to Houston, declaring it would trigger new economic development in the region. NASA's vitality is critical to the economic leadership of the United States in science and technology, said U.S. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who chairs a NASA oversight panel.

But other key Republicans, expecting as much as a $1 billion increase in NASA spending next year to overcome the fuel tank debris problems that triggered the 2003 shuttle Columbia tragedy and that resurfaced during this summer's Discovery mission, were not as enthusiastic.

"The question Congress and the administration will still have to grapple with most is not the nature or desirability of the exploration (plan), but rather its timing," said U.S. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y., who chairs the House Science Committee. "Given the funding shortfalls in the space shuttle program, there is simply no way to accelerate the development of the Crew Exploration Vehicle unless the NASA budget increases more than anticipated."

The Crew Exploration Vehicle, which Johnson will develop to replace the winged shuttle orbiter, would lift off with a crew of astronauts as soon as 2012, two years earlier than Bush had proposed previously, according to the plan unveiled by Griffin.

The first lunar landing is planned for 2018. Initially, the space agency would launch two missions to the moon annually.

If funding permits, astronauts could begin to establish a base on the moon and develop the means to extract hydrogen and oxygen from the soil, as well as ice, to produce rocket fuel, water and breathable air.

The exploration vehicle would be launched atop a single, two-stage version of the shuttle's solid rocket booster.

The vehicle housing the astronauts would be equipped with an escape rocket and parachutes and could be ejected in a disaster. The escape system, which the Apollo spacecraft also relied upon, would lower the risk of astronaut fatalities to about one in 2,000 missions, NASA estimates.

A new "heavy-lift" rocket comprised of the shuttle fuel tank, boosters and rocket engines, would launch a larger lunar transport and lander assembly into orbit ahead of the astronauts.

DOJ_NMG_0006654

Parachute landing Once in Earth orbit, the astronauts would rendezvous and dock with the transport-lander craft and set out for the moon. After reaching lunar orbit, the astronauts would board the lunar lander and descend to the moon's surface.

When their work was finished, the astronauts would board the ascent portion of the lander and lift off to rejoin the crew exploration vehicle in lunar orbit. The exploration vehicle would bring the astronauts back to Earth.

The Apollo crews parachuted into the Pacific and Atlantic oceans.

But the new spacecraft would likely parachute to a landing at Edward Air Force Base, Calif., or another desert site in the United States.

NASA 'Vision' Sees Man On Moon, Mars (WT)

By Philip Chien

Washington Times, September 20, 2005

NASA has outlined its new "Vision for Space Exploration" plan that will culminate in the return of astronauts to the moon by 2020 and the infrastructure to send people to Mars.

The plan calls for the retirement of the space shuttle in 2010 and a new 14-person Crew Exploration Vehicle, which could fly as early as 2012 if additional funding becomes available or 2014 within NASA's current budget.

"This is the best mission statement NASA's had in 40 years," NASA administrator Michael Griffin said.

Externally, the new vehicle will look like the 1960s' Apollo spacecraft.

"Think of it as Apollo on steroids," Mr. Griffin said. "Very Apollo-like although upgraded technology."

The new vision for NASA came about primarily in response to the Columbia space shuttle accident more than two years ago. According to investigators, one of the root causes of the disaster was the lack of vision and goals. The Bush administration responded with an announcement in January 2004 to retire the shuttle and for NASA to go back to the moon and on to Mars.

To accomplish these goals, NASA will spend $104 billion over 13 years until the first new footprints are made on the moon.

"This architecture absolutely fits within the funding guidelines the administration has provided," Mr. Griffin said.

One key factor to reduce up-front costs is to reuse space shuttle components. While the space shuttle orbiter is being retired, new versions of its solid rocket boosters, external tank, and shuttle main engines will be used.

But this cost-saving measure is not without its challenges. NASA has had to find new manufacturers when existing subcontractors can no longer manufacture certain parts. Regulations change and older materials may not be easily available, often with unexpected problems and potential safety hazards. For example, an environmentally friendly putty spread between solid rocket motor segments in 1996 nearly led to the burn-through of the rocket's case.

Relying on older designs where many of the components are aging or can become obsolete has also raised the concerns of engineers.

"As NASA continues to use the solid boosters and external tank there will be more aging problems -- there's no way to avoid it," NASA engineer Robert Stevens said.

The plan promises to be a windfall for three existing aerospace contractors. Lockheed-Martin manufactures the external tanks, ATK Thiokol manufactures the solid rocket boosters and Boeing's Rocketdyne division builds the shuttle main engines. Still to be determined are the contractors who will build the Crew Exploration Vehicle.

Back To Moon Via 'Apollo On Steroids' (Los Angeles Times)

By Peter Pae

Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

NASA unveiled a 13-year, $104-billion blueprint Monday for sending humans back to the moon as early as 2018, using a modified space shuttle rocket to propel an Apollo-like capsule into space.

Analysts said the design was decidedly retro, harking back more than three decades to the Cold War's moon race.

But they said the new design was safer and more realistic than the current space shuttle, which is scheduled to be retired in 2010 after nearly 25 years of service and two disastrous shuttle losses.

"Think Apollo on steroids," NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin said during a news conference at the agency headquarters in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0006655

The blueprint unveiled Monday is part of a broader initiative launched by President Bush 18 months ago, in which he called for returning humans to the moon as a steppingstone to a manned mission to Mars, perhaps as early as 2020.

The new capsule, known as the crew exploration vehicle, would be significantly larger than the cramped Apollo capsule, with seating for up to six astronauts instead of three.

Due to launch in 2012, it would initially be used to resupply and transfer International Space Station crews after the shuttle is retired, NASA officials said.

Unlike the winged shuttle that is mounted on the side of a fuel tank attached to two rockets, the capsule would sit atop a rocket, away from falling debris and potential rocket explosions that doomed the shuttles Columbia in 2003 and Challenger in 1986.

NASA officials estimated that the new craft would be 10 times safer than the space shuttle. The agency estimated that a space shuttle would be lost about every 220 missions. The new vehicle will be designed to be used in more than 2,000 missions without a serious calamity.

In 2018, NASA would launch the first back-to-the-moon mission with a new lunar lander and other components that would allow for up to four astronauts to stay on the surface for up to seven days.

The Apollo missions, which cost $150 billion, focused primarily on landing astronauts on the moon for a day or two and then returning them to Earth.

Elliot G. Pulham, president of the nonprofit Space Foundation, a space exploration advocacy group, called the blueprint a "challenging yet realistic plan" that doesn't "break the bank."

But questions about how NASA would sustain public interest and win funding from Congress for more than a decade dogged the unveiling Monday.

Some observers worried that huge federal spending on such items as rebuilding New Orleans, which could cost up to $200 billion, could undermine funding for any major space initiatives.

"If you're not going to have a lunar landing until 2018, how are you going to keep people and Congress interested?" said John Pike, a space policy analyst for GlobalSecurity.org.

But Griffin said the nation could afford the price tag because he would not seek any new money for the agency's annual $16-billion budget.

Instead, spending within NASA's human spaceflight program would be redirected to pay for the endeavor, he said. About $4 billion to $5 billion a year is now allocated for manned spaceflight.

Measured in constant dollars, the $104-billion price tag, spread over 13 years, represents 55% of what the eight-year Apollo program cost, Griffin said. The objective, he said, was to "pay as you go and what you can afford."

"There will be a lot more hurricanes and a lot more other natural disasters to befall the United States," Griffin said. "We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in our future."

NASA's announcement created a buzz among enthusiasts at the International Lunar Conference in Toronto on Monday.

"We've got to go" back to the moon, said Buzz Aldrin, a former Apollo astronaut who made the first manned moon landing with Neil Armstrong in 1969. "But we don't want to stay too long....The ultimate goal is Mars."

Although the design for the new crew exploration vehicle would resemble the Apollo capsule, the spacecraft would be three times as big, NASA officials said.

On its return to Earth, it would be able to make a soft terrestrial landing by parachute, perhaps at Edwards Air Force Base in the Mojave Desert, instead of splashing down at sea. It would be reused several times.

"Much of it looks the same," Griffin said, but added, "It's a significant advancement over Apollo."

The return mission to the moon would also differ from the Apollo missions in several ways.

Unlike the Apollo program, which relied on the massive Saturn V rocket to loft both the capsule and the lunar lander, NASA plans to send up two rockets, one carrying the crew capsule and the second the lunar lander and other components.

The crew capsule rocket would be a modified solid rocket booster used on the space shuttle, while the cargo rocket carrying the lunar lander would be consist of a modified shuttle engine, external fuel tank and solid rocket boosters.

DOJ_NMG_0006656

Once in orbit, the two spacecraft would rendezvous before making the journey to the moon. The new lunar lander, to be developed later, would be able to carry four astronauts to the moon's surface, compared with two on Apollo. The capsule would stay in orbit unmanned.

For a Mars mission, the capsule would carry six people.

NASA officials said using Apollo concepts and shuttle technology with the latest materials, propulsion systems and avionics would allow the agency to meet the president's goals more efficiently and cheaply.

NASA said about 85% of the shuttle facilities were likely to be retained for work on the craft.

"We believe this venture safer and more affordable than any other spaceflight ventures that the U.S. has had," Griffin said.

The moon missions as outlined could rejuvenate Southern California's declining aerospace industry, which during the 1960s led the development of the Apollo program.

Lockheed Martin Corp. and a team from Northrop Grumman Corp. and Boeing Co. are competing to build the crew exploration vehicle. Northrop, with its headquarters in Century City, said about 200 engineers in El Segundo have been working on the design of the new craft.

Times staff writer John Johnson Jr. contributed to this report.

A Retro Look To Next US Spacecraft (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

It's back to the future for the US manned spaceflight program.

After 25 years of spectacular successes and tragic failures using the winged space shuttles, NASA is opting for the tried and true: Just put a capsule on top of a rocket, put people or cargo into it, and launch it.

NASA's plan for replacing the shuttle, unveiled Monday, calls for launching future space vehicles in the same way that was used during the successful Apollo program of the 1960 and '70s, but borrows the shuttle's concept of a reusable craft.

That new craft would be the cosmic equivalent of the suburban minivan - a "crew-exploration vehicle" capable of carrying six people to the International Space Station, or four people to the moon, or roughly 3-1/2 tons of cargo. It's designed to ride a parachute system back to land, but must also survive an Apollo-like splashdown. Over the long term, the CEV must also be capable of handling a trip to Mars.

If all goes well, its first flight to the space station would launch in 2011. In keeping with President Bush's vision for space exploration, the first mission to the moon is slated for 2018.

The CEV's configuration - a command module, service module, and lander - has an Apollo-era look, and it's not by accident, says Michael Griffin, NASA's administrator. After NASA looked at a range of configurations, he says, it's amazing to see "how much of it all the Apollo guys got right."

If the plan has a quaint, haven't-we-done-this-before quality to some, other space enthusiasts say the blueprint represents a welcome change for human space exploration. "For the first time in 3-1/2 decades, the federal government plans to leave low-Earth orbit. That's a major shift," says George Whitesides of the National Space Society.

The effort marks a technological turning point, adds Ray Williamson, research professor at The George Washington University's Space Policy Institute in Washington. "Basically, we've recognized that it's better to get the job done than to try doing it with flashy technology," he says. "You don't need a Ferrari to take your groceries home."

That's not to say the program faces smooth sailing technologically. Though the rockets have a familiar-looking shell, they'll use state-of-the-art technologies inside, and engineers won't lack for design challenges, analysts say. Low cost, safety, and reliability are vital - features the shuttle, despite being a marvel of aerospace engineering, has not delivered.

Still, NASA seems to be taking a minimalist approach, says Keith Cowing of NASAWatch, a website that tracks the agency's developments. "This is pretty conservative. There are no plans for a big moon base. It's almost like we're trying to prove we can still do it."

The biggest risk with the new plan is financial, analysts say. Hurricane Katrina and continued problems with the debris falling from the shuttle's external fuel tank during launch have saddled NASA with unanticipated costs. The debris problem has forced NASA to delay shuttle launches until next year. This could postpone the orbiters' retirement and the savings the agency had hoped to gain from mothballing the fleet.

DOJ_NMG_0006657

The program's overall cost is $104 billion through the first lunar mission - roughly 55 percent of what Apollo cost, Mr. Griffin says. The program is designed on a go-as-you-pay basis, he adds.

Help may come from a new generation of entrepreneurs who are sinking personal fortunes and venture capital into rockets designed to be more reliable and cheaper to build and operate than the launchers used for unmanned missions in the US today. NASA appears ready to give those fledgling companies an opportunity to show what they can do, says Mr. Whitesides, and possibly contract with them for space station missions.

NASA's track record for giving lawmakers accurate costs estimates or for controlling overruns hasn't been stellar. "I am anxious to get more information on the program's expected costs," says Rep. Bart Gordon of Tennessee, the House Science Committee's ranking Democrat.

Space Vision: The Experts Split Again (NYT)

By William J. Broad

New York Times, September 20, 2005

The nation eagerly accepted President John F. Kennedy's challenge in 1961 to put men on the Moon. But President Bush's plan to return humans there and then voyage onward to Mars is dividing space experts and generating skepticism about its feasibility.

Mr. Bush announced his initiative on Jan. 14, 2004, as he was campaigning for re-election. On Monday, 20 months later, NASA filled in some of the blanks by announcing a glossy plan to replace the aging shuttles with a new generation of space vehicles meant to rekindle the nation's exploratory fires.

Michael D. Griffin, the NASA administrator, set a tentative goal of 2018 for a return to the Moon, saying it would cost slightly more than $100 billion. He set no date for Mars.

"The pace of implementation will change to suit the funding that is made available," Dr. Griffin said at a Washington news conference. "All our goals will have to be funding driven."

Experts clash on the practicality of a space vision with a $100 billion price tag, especially given the huge costs of fighting the Iraq war and rebuilding the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina.

Advocates of the plan praise the recent choice of Dr. Griffin as head of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, saying he has the knowledge, drive and experience to make big things happen. A physicist and an engineer with wide experience in academia, industry and the federal government (as well as six advanced college degrees), he joined the agency in April with a mandate to re-energize exploration plans.

"He's outstanding," said Louis D. Friedman, executive director of the Planetary Society, a group in Pasadena, Calif., that advocates space exploration. "He's got a serious intent to do it and do it right."

Backers also say Dr. Griffin is seeking to achieve the exploration goal within a level space agency budget, at least initially. His goal is to squeeze the shuttle to pay for developing new rockets and exploration vehicles. That, the supporters say, helps make the overall aim achievable, at least in theory, despite tightening budgets.

"From my own experience, the administration is very serious," said Douglas O. Stanley, an aerospace expert at the Georgia Institute of Technology who led the NASA exploration study. But Mr. Stanley added a significant caution, noting that the plan still faced votes in Congress.

Skeptics see a huge spending gap. Even if Congress blesses the effort, they say, no real bill will come due until Mr. Bush is long out of office.

"Stick the next administration with an impossibly expensive and pointless program and let them take the blame for ending human space exploration," said Robert L. Park, a physicist at the University of Maryland and an official at the American Physical Society, which has opposed many piloted space programs as scientifically unproductive. "This is a poison pill."

Dr. Park noted that in 1961 Kennedy promised a Moon landing "before this decade is out" and that the nation did so in eight years. By contrast, he said, Mr. Bush's goal is to redo the same accomplishment in 14 years, nearly twice as long.

DOJ_NMG_0006658

"We went to Moon because of the cold war and won hands down," he said. "Now there's no political reason to do it."

Dr. Park noted that the first President Bush in 1989 proposed a space program with the same exploratory goals but failed to make any progress. Some political analysts say Mr. Bush consciously or unconsciously seeks to avoid his father's mistakes on Iraq, taxes, conservatism and other issues.

Alex Roland, a former NASA historian who teaches history at Duke University, said the new plan "might sell politically, even though it's retro" in echoing the ends and means of the Apollo Moon program.

"I don't think the public cares" about using simple rockets for advanced exploration, Professor Roland said, "as long as it gets the job done."

The main problem, he added, is that the space agency has a long history of underestimating costs and technical difficulty and that the new plan would probably fail to withstand close Congressional scrutiny.

"It's possible but very unlikely," Professor Roland added. "I doubt this plan will put any man or woman on the Moon in our lifetime."

All the initiative might produce, he said, is a low-tech successor for the space shuttle to travel to the International Space Station.

Dr. Friedman, of the Planetary Society, while praising Dr. Griffin, faulted the plan as making little room for international partners, a factor that he called critical for strong public support. He also said the plan lacked vision.

"If you don't keep the Mars mission out front, people are going to ask, 'Why are we returning to the Moon?' It's got to be because we're extending ourselves into the solar system."

NASA Details Plan For Craft That Will Fly To The Moon (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — The United States plans to send astronauts back to the moon as soon as 2018 on a mission that would be cheaper and more ambitious than man's first trip to the lunar surface nearly 40 years ago, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said Monday.

NASA wants to send a crew of four to the moon in a spaceship that resembles the capsule developed for the Apollo program in the 1960s. But this capsule would be able to land on either solid ground or water. The Apollo capsule only splashed down at sea.

It would also be safer than its forerunner. And it would be roomier, taking a crew of four to the moon rather than Apollo's three.

“Think of it as Apollo on steroids,” Griffin said of the new ship.

Griffin said the cost of the moon program would be $104 billion. Adjusted for inflation, that's roughly 55% of the cost of the first moon landing in 1969. He said NASA's budget would not need to grow to pay for the new effort and vowed not to raid other programs for funds. Savings would come from retiring the space shuttle in 2010.

“This is not about new money,” Griffin said. “This is about a budget which keeps NASA … approximately where it is today.”

The plan fleshes out a proposal President Bush made in 2004 to return astronauts to the moon — last visited by humans on the Apollo 17 mission in 1972 — and later to send Americans to Mars, where no human has set foot.

NASA did not set a target date for the first human mission to Mars, a much more expensive and difficult trip than a moon shot.

NASA hopes to launch the new ship, the crew exploration vehicle, in 2012. At first, it would only ferry crews and cargo to the International Space Station orbiting the Earth. Later, the ship would carry astronauts to lunar orbit and wait there while another vehicle carried the crew to the moon's surface.

The timeline leaves a two-year gap in the United States' ability to send people into space. The only other ship able to drop off humans at the space station is Russia's space capsule, the Soyuz.

NASA's blueprint does not indicate whether it would build a base on the moon. The answer, Griffin said, would depend partly on whether other countries are interested in such a project.

DOJ_NMG_0006659

The spacecraft unveiled Monday could make two trips to the moon per year, but NASA has not worked out a schedule for the number or length of moon trips.

Some members of Congress, including Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y., praised the plan as cost-effective. But others questioned the worth of a new moon program.

"It is a terrible allocation of scarce resources," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. "The time has come to de-emphasize the manned space program."

NASA's record on holding to its original budget estimates is spotty, says space analyst Marco Caceres of the Teal Group, an aerospace and defense consulting firm.

"Whatever NASA says it will cost will be a low-balled figure so they won't scare too many people away," he said. "Their main goal is to get that (project) through."

He also noted that NASA won't save much money on the shuttle program until the vehicle is put in mothballs in 2010. But to meet its 2012 goal of launching the space capsule, NASA will need to start research and development now.

NASA aims to save money and time by recycling parts of the shuttle for use in its two new rockets:

•The crew launch vehicle would carry the capsule to orbit. It would be powered by a shuttle engine and by a stronger version of the shuttle's rocket booster.

•The heavy-lift vehicle would carry the unoccupied lunar lander into space. It would dock with the crew capsule and then power the whole package to the moon. It would rely on two shuttle boosters, each upgraded to provide extra lift, and five shuttle engines.

However, the designs also incorporate technology that could prove troublesome to develop. The engine that would lift the crew's lander off the lunar surface would burn liquid oxygen and methane, an untried combination. New engines require significant testing.

The risk of losing a crew with the new system is expected to be a third of what it was on an Apollo-era moon landing, said NASA's John Connolly, who helped lead the development effort.

For the trip to Earth orbit and back, he said, the capsule and its rocket would be 20 times safer than the shuttle, in part because the capsule would have an emergency rocket to lift the crew to safety during an aborted launch.

NASA Unveils $104 Billion Plan To Return To The Moon By 2018 (Washington Post)

By Guy Gugliotta

Washington Post, September 20, 2005

NASA yesterday released its master plan for returning humans to the moon by 2018 and eventually sending them to Mars, choosing rocketry from the space shuttle era and drawing inspiration from the Apollo program that first put humans on the lunar surface 36 years ago.

NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin said the plan would cost $104 billion over the next 13 years, with increases for inflation, but would not require extra money beyond NASA's normal budgets. The pace of the project, he said, "will fit the funding that's available."

The plan envisions development of two new rockets, one of them almost as tall and even heavier than the Saturn V that launched the Apollo astronauts, and a new spacecraft to put four people on the moon for up to six months before bringing them back to Earth in a parachute landing.

And while the rocket technology is "shuttle-derived," the new plan abandons the concept of a winged, reusable spacecraft that can fly back to Earth and land at an airport. Griffin said the new "crew exploration vehicle" can be reused perhaps 10 times, but most of the new program's apparatus, like Apollo's before it, will be jettisoned in space or burned up in Earth's atmosphere.

Griffin also acknowledged that there will be a two-year period between the last space shuttle flight in 2010 and the first flight of the exploration vehicle, anticipated in 2012, during which the United States will have no ability to put humans in space.

This gap has been a space policy sticking point for more than a year between the Bush administration and Congress. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.), chairman of the science and space subcommittee and an outspoken advocate of closing the gap, issued an enigmatic statement saying, "I will do everything possible to keep the shuttle and crew exploration vehicle programs on course."

DOJ_NMG_0006660

Still, in response to several reporters' questions, Griffin sought to assure employees at NASA's shuttle program centers in the Gulf Coast states that the new program "can use 85 percent of the space shuttle work force."

"It's been pretty well coordinated among the centers," said John Logsdon, director of George Washington University's Space Policy Institute. "It appears to provide for a smooth transition."

The use of "crew" and "service" modules to orbit the moon while astronauts travel to and from the surface in a "lunar lander" called to mind the Apollo missions that put 12 men on the moon between 1969 and 1972.

"We did not set out to make it like Apollo," Griffin said at a NASA headquarters news conference to release the agency's "Exploration Systems Architecture Study." "We looked at every vehicle, but people began to realize that the Apollo guys got it right."

Still, the new plan is "a significant advance over Apollo," he added, describing it as "Apollo on steroids." Among other differences, the new lander is larger, can put twice as many people on the moon, leave them there potentially for months instead of days, land them anywhere on the lunar surface instead of just at the equatorial region and leave the orbiting spacecraft without a crew onboard.

The new spacecraft will also use different, more efficient propellants than Apollo, and substitute lighter composite structures where Apollo used metal. Most important, while Apollo was born during the waning days of vacuum tubes, the new program will benefit from 45 years of advancements in computer science.

Griffin said the choice of targets for moon landings "will be driven by science," but unlike Apollo, the program is also designed so astronauts can linger and establish permanent bases on the lunar surface to develop technologies and test techniques for a more ambitious, subsequent Mars mission.

The new propellants, for instance, will use both oxygen, which can be mined from Martian rocks, or methane, which can be extracted from components of the Martian atmosphere. "One reason to go back to the moon is to learn to live off the land to enable longer-duration space missions," said Georgia Institute of Technology research engineer Douglas Stanley, who led the "Exploration" study for NASA.

Logsdon described the project as "a good plan -- but not an elegant one" because it does not make much use of advanced technology. "It's a doable approach to getting people into space safely," he added.

But space policy and engineering consultant Charles Lurio, an advocate of innovative private-sector approaches to space travel, criticized the new proposal for being too "massive" and "unaffordable now and unsustainable later."

The moon mission will begin by putting into space a new 358-foot "cargo launch vehicle" weighing 6.4 million pounds. It lifts the moon rocket and the lunar lander into low Earth orbit to await the arrival of the crew exploration vehicle, the combined service module-crew module.

Both the heavy lifter and the "crew launch vehicle" that carries the spaceship use solid rocket boosters, like the shuttle, and fuel tanks derived from the external tanks whose foam shedding caused the loss of the shuttle Columbia in 2003. Loose foam will not be a problem for the new spacecraft, which are perched in traditional fashion atop the tanks, out of harm's way.

The exploration vehicle will mate in Earth's orbit with the lunar lander, then the moon rocket will ignite, carrying vehicle and lander on the three-day trip to lunar orbit. From then on, the mission will unreel in Apollo-like fashion, with the astronauts riding to the moon's surface aboard the lander, while the exploration vehicle orbits overhead.

Besides human space travel, the exploration vehicle can fly robotically, perhaps as a cargo carrier for a moon colony. It also could ferry crew and cargo to the international space station and dock autonomously there if necessary.

"The principal concern has always been the lunar mission," said Doug Young, program manager for the Northrop Grumman/Boeing team that is competing with Lockheed for the right to build the exploration vehicle. "But we've always known that we will ultimately have to meet the requirements" of the space station.

NASA's Back-to-the-Future Plans (NYT)

New York Times, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006661

NASA has finally unveiled its plans for carrying out the ambitious space exploration program that was announced by President Bush in January 2004 but left vague and undefined ever since. The proposed new space vehicles look like a sensible way to put astronauts and cargo into space after the shuttle fleet is retired and will be built to facilitate landings on both the Moon and Mars. Michael Griffin, the new administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, deserves credit for putting real flesh on what had been little more than an aspiration. Unfortunately, the new plan lacks the pizzazz to inspire public support and will be operating under budget constraints that make delays or overruns likely.

The new crew exploration vehicle will be built around well-known space technologies, with booster rockets and engines derived from the shuttle program and a crew capsule like the one used in the lunar program, only bigger. That has the great advantage of letting NASA use much of its current shuttle work force on the new program and the great disadvantage of making the technology look retrograde. This approach will not excite those looking for cutting-edge hardware, but it seems reasonable at a time when reliability is the main goal.

The configuration largely eliminates the two hazards that destroyed the Columbia and the Challenger. NASA calculates that the new vehicle should be 10 times safer than the shuttle, with perhaps a 1 in 2,000 chance of a catastrophe.

The plan pays only the barest lip service to international cooperation; Europe, Japan, China and India all have lunar programs of one kind or another under way. Mr. Griffin said NASA hoped to send Americans back to the Moon by 2018 under its own program but was open to partnerships on what to do or build on the lunar surface. Given that most experts say international collaboration will be imperative on a high-cost mission to Mars, it seems desirable to enlist international partners very early.

It is hard to see how NASA can complete all the tasks on its agenda while operating on a constrained budget, which is scheduled to grow at only the rate of inflation. The agency needs to repair the damage to its facilities from Katrina, fly the shuttle safely until 2010, complete the space station by that date, fly the new crew exploration vehicle by 2012 and return to the Moon by 2018 or 2020, all the while carrying out its science, aeronautics and robotics programs. The safety valve is that NASA will carry out the exploration program on a "go as you can afford to pay" basis, without raiding money from other space programs. That means that cost overruns may stretch out the completion dates, and leave the exploration vision a more distant prospect.

Bush And The Mad Scientists (LAT)

By Chris Mooney

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

THE LAMENTATION in the forthcoming New England Journal of Medicine is typical of a growing genre: complaints about the misuse of science by the Bush administration. It is merely the latest jeremiad, from a group of distinguished experts, about the loss of reason by our leaders. This particular editorial, titled "A Sad Day for Science at the FDA," concerned so-called Plan B emergency contraception (the "morning after" pill), but it just as well could have been about the science of global warming or mercury pollution. Yawn. We've heard it all before.

There's an inherent difficulty when it comes to sustaining outrage over how science gets continually misused in the Bush administration. The complexity of scientific disputation, paired with the intricacies of bureaucratic decision-making, make for a truly soporific combination. It's tough to get past the latest scandal and see the big picture — even when, as in this case, three distinguished doctors are writing that the Food and Drug Administration has made "a mockery of the process of evaluating scientific evidence, disillusioned scientists both inside and outside the agency, squandered the public trust and tarnished the agency's image."

Still, let's try to muster whatever's left of our outrage, because the Plan B episode truly demands it. It may represent a historic low for science-based professionalism at the FDA. And it presents an instructive case study in how the political abuse of science plays out in practice.

By any stretch, this decision should have been a no-brainer. The "morning after" pill, which blocks or delays ovulation, had already been approved for prescription use; the latest move merely concerned its availability over the counter. (Six states, including California, have made it available over the counter, but women must request it from the pharmacist.)

DOJ_NMG_0006662

Given that the pill's effectiveness in preventing a pregnancy depends on how quickly it is used after unprotected sex — and that it meets the safety and ease-of-administration tests for over-the-counter products — it makes obvious sense that simplifying access would help prevent unwanted pregnancies (and thus, presumably, abortions).

Two scientific advisory committees held a joint hearing to consider the issue. Committee members voted overwhelmingly (23 to 4) in favor of approval. The FDA expert staff was of a similar mind.

And yet in an extraordinary move in May 2004, the agency second-guessed its experts and its advisors and cooked up a dubious rationale for delaying approval of over-the-counter availability. More data were needed, the FDA claimed, on the pill's safety for women under 16. Or course, no evidence existed suggesting a unique problem for this age group, and such age-based data have not been required to switch other drugs to over-the-counter availability.

The FDA suggested that the maker of Plan B could reapply for over-the-counter status with the proviso that girls 16 and younger would have to get a prescription. But when the company did that, the FDA delayed again. Early this month it said it now had to check the legality of the age rule.

As it happens, the "morning after" pill has been strongly opposed by many religiously conservative interest groups. In fact, there's some evidence in the transcript of the hearings to suggest that the rationale cooked up by the FDA may have originally sprung from a controversial advisory committee member — "As Jesus Cared for Women" author W. David Hager — who provided one of the four votes against Plan B's approval. When the agency didn't like the overwhelming opinion of the advisory committees, it seems to have gone shopping for a more convenient scientific-sounding argument: "We need more data."

In the end, the scientific data indicate that Plan B contraception is one of the safest drugs ever considered for over-the-counter sale. FDA decisions about drug approvals are supposed to be based on just such scientific data. If you want to derail such a decision, you have to undermine the science. That standard has not been met.

The abuses in the Plan B case have fundamentally called the FDA's integrity into question.

"People who've been in the agency for decades say they've never seen anything like it," Susan F. Wood, the former assistant FDA commissioner for women's health who resigned over the Plan B decision, told me. The scientists writing in the New England Journal of Medicine agree. Although the FDA may previously have been accused of having too much bureaucracy or too close a rapport with the drug industry, they argue, it had at least "resisted political pressure to reflect a particular social policy or ideology."

But not any more — and that's the really nasty thing about the current war on science. If you can get past the complicated details, you'll see that it is undermining our government's most central mission: to serve and protect us. This mandate cannot be fulfilled without an abiding respect for professionalism, expertise and the integrity of scientific analysis.

Chris Mooney is Washington correspondent for Seed Magazine and author of "The Republican War On Science" (Basic Books), which was published Sept. 9.

OTHER NEWS:

Wind Or Flood? Fights With Insurers Loom (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 20, 2005

Hurricane Katrina is likely to be the costliest U.S. natural disaster. It also may be the most contentious.

The Mississippi attorney general is suing insurance companies to get them to pay for hurricane-caused storm damage typically not covered under homeowners policies. Richard Scruggs, the tough-as-nails lawyer who took on the tobacco and asbestos industries, is now taking aim at the insurance industry. Even the vice president has weighed in on the issue.

Unhappy homeowners are calling a hotline with complaints. And officials are asking insurers to give policyholders the benefit of the doubt when it's unclear whether damage was caused by wind, rain or flood so people can rebuild their homes and lives again.

For hurricane survivors who fled their homes and are relying on relatives, friends or charity to get by, haggling over insurance is the last thing they want to do. “These people are exhausted,” says Joanne Doroshow, executive director of the

DOJ_NMG_0006663

Center for Justice & Democracy, a public-interest group. “The notion of having to fight insurance companies on these claims is almost too much to bear.”

At issue is whether insurers, the federal government or individuals should bear the brunt of billions of dollars in damage to homes and businesses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. One estimate, by Risk Management Solutions, says total economic losses from Katrina likely will exceed $125 billion, with insurance companies paying $40 billion to $60 billion.

What makes the aftermath of Katrina so ripe for dispute is a polarizing, hard-to-determine issue: Is the damage caused by wind-driven rain or flooding? And what if the hurricane causes a storm surge or flood?

Flooding is usually covered by government-backed insurance, while wind and rain damage are covered by private insurance policies. But Katrina was a complicated storm in which up to 140-mile-per-hour winds leveled homes and businesses before flooding swept them away.

The insurance industry says it will do what it has to do. “You absolutely have to be sympathetic to these people, but on the same token, federal flood insurance has been available for nearly 40 years,” says Jeanne Salvatore, senior vice president at the Insurance Information Institute, an industry trade group. Private “insurance policies are quite clear that flood is excluded. We did not take in premiums for flood losses.”

Not everybody who has homeowners insurance has flood insurance. And flood insurance often isn't as generous as homeowners insurance. Flood insurance covers up to $250,000 in property damage, while a homeowners policy typically covers the value of rebuilding the home, whether that's $100,000 or $1 million. So for many hurricane victims, having damage considered caused by Katrina's winds rather than unrelated flooding is crucial.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) estimates 34% of households and 23% of businesses in the affected areas have federal flood insurance.

How much financial responsibility the industry ends up bearing will depend on how insurers handle the claims of people such as James Bud Ray, who is temporarily living in a motor home in Long Beach, Miss. Ray is lucky. He and his wife got out safely. But lucky is a relative term, because his Long Beach home has been reduced to rubble and his five car-wash facilities in the region were significantly damaged.

He says that after several phone calls to the insurance company, an adjuster called him back and asked: Did he think the damage was due to wind or flood? “I said to him, ‘Hold on, sir. You're not going to paint me in that corner.’ ” Ray says if he's not satisfied with the insurance payout, he may hire a lawyer to fight the decision.

Complex Katrina-related insurance claims may take longer to settle than in previous hurricanes, says Ernest Csiszar, president of the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America, although it's likely that 90% to 95% will be completed within six months of filing. Insurers will pay for what's covered under the policies but no more, he says.

Insurance payments can't come quickly enough for Portia Andrew of Hammond, La. The storm ripped the siding off her mobile home and poked a hole in the roof. It also downed trees and knocked a power line on top of her incense-and-herbal-goods shop, 100 yards from the house.

Andrew is worried about what damage is covered by insurance. But she can't find a copy of her homeowners policy and hasn't been able to reach her New Orleans insurance agent since the storm knocked out phone systems. In the meantime, she's struggling to make ends meet. For almost a week, she and her six family members lived off peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches and water. “I'm trying to be patient and just learning to get in line,” Andrew says. “You never know if (insurance) will come through.”

Disputes over wind vs. flood damage occur after every hurricane. But “if it's any indication by the calls we've gotten so far, then we think there are going to be many more lawsuits” this time, says Doroshow of the Center for Justice & Democracy.

The center, along with other consumer groups, has a hotline to document insurance complaints related to Katrina. Since it started Sept. 12, the hotline has received 85 calls, officials said Monday.

While touring Mississippi earlier this month, Vice President Cheney said the question of whether a hurricane-driven storm surge should be considered flooding or hurricane damage has to be addressed. Scruggs, whose house in Pascagoula, Miss., was wiped out by Katrina, says he'll sue insurance companies to get them to pay up.

DOJ_NMG_0006664

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood filed a lawsuit last week to invalidate a common clause in home and business policies that allows insurers to deny hurricane-caused storm-surge damage.

James Lucas, 37, says he didn't pay attention to the fine print in his homeowners policy because his Allstate agent told him that he was covered for any damage incurred during a hurricane, including storm surge. The Gautier, Miss., resident — who is living in the top floor of his house because of storm damage downstairs — says he asked about storm-caused water damage four years ago because he was concerned the canal behind his house would overflow.

After Katrina, he was surprised to hear an adjuster say that the company was covering wind but not water damage. "I'm not trying to get rich or anything; I'm just trying to get my appliances back," Lucas says.

Allstate spokesman Mike Trevino says it's hard to imagine that an agent didn't explain to a policyholder that "flood is a longstanding exclusion in the policy, which includes flooding related to a hurricane. All Allstate agents know the Allstate homeowners policy very well."

The effort to get insurers to pay for flood claims "ignores the fact that they have obligations to people in 47 other states," says Randy Maniloff, an attorney who represents insurers in coverage disputes. "If they start paying claims based on risk they weren't prepared to take on, then they're putting themselves in the situation where they may not be ready for other claims."

That's also the concern of George Dale, Mississippi insurance commissioner. Dale says that while he respects Hood's decision to file the lawsuit, he is worried about the financial hit the industry will take if it has to pay for damage not covered by policies.

Still, Dale has told insurance companies that "where there is any doubt, that doubt will be resolved in favor of finding coverage on behalf of the insured."

Insurers say that where houses and businesses are still standing, they likely will be able to tell what type of damage occurred. If water entered from the bottom of the structure, homeowners insurance may not cover it, says Elizabeth Stelzer, a spokeswoman for Nationwide. But if wind-driven rain entered through a storm-damaged roof, that may be covered.

But when a structure has drifted away or been leveled, the cause is more difficult to assess. Csiszar expects to see more of these situations than in previous storms.

"If you're going in a court of law, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff," or the policyholder, to show how the damage was caused, he says. "But if you are the defendant, you better have a darn good reason to deny the claim."

Anticipating legal disputes, policyholders are getting this piece of advice: "I've heard that when you call your insurance company, say that the water came from wind-driven rain," says Debbie Barraf, who has a house in St. Bernard Parish, La., that she believes is flooded.

The magnitude of Katrina's damage — homes and businesses along the Louisiana and Mississippi coast are still partially under water or unlivable and may be so for months if not years — means that many people also will be looking to insurers for help with living expenses.

Homeowners policies may cover food and temporary housing costs if state or local officials order an evacuation. Business policies could take care of temporary office relocation and employee pay.

But again, the hurricane vs. flood question is causing disputes. Ellie Rand, a 39-year-old New Orleans resident, fled to Wilson, N.C., where her in-laws live and has racked up $4,000 to $6,000 in expenses along the way that insurance won't pay. "They told me, 'Sorry, the official call for the evacuation was flooding,' " Rand says. "They felt that my homeowners (insurance) wasn't responsible for paying living expenses."

Vienna Abramowitz, who owns three properties in Louisiana's hard-hit Jefferson and St. Tammany parishes, has received a $2,500 check from State Farm for living expenses. The insurer initially told her it's an advance against her government-issued flood coverage. But a day after she said she had talked to USA TODAY, the company told her it will take the money out of her homeowners coverage.

State Farm says it's giving all affected policyholders the $2,500 payment. If people have coverage for wind and flood, the company will advance the money from the flood policy first and then reverse it later if living expenses are covered by homeowners insurance, spokesman Dick Luedke says. State Farm evaluates each individual circumstance and may have discovered in Abramowitz's case that living expenses are covered by the homeowners policy, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0006665

Still, “This one thing really triggered me to be worried,” Abramowitz says. “If they have this issue with $2,500, what about when it's $75,000 or more?”

Mississippi Governor Calls Special Session (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2005

Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said Monday that he is calling the state Legislature back into session Sept. 27 to help the state recover quickly from Hurricane Katrina.

One item on Barbour's agenda is a proposed change in gambling laws to allow casinos to build on land rather than only over water. Another session item, Barbour said, will be a proposal to allow small businesses hurt by Katrina to apply for $25 million in local loans.

Barbour said he is waiting on a recommendation from the Mississippi Gaming Commission before offering a proposal on changing gambling laws.

The state legalized dockside casinos in 1990, limiting them to tourist areas on the Mississippi River or the Mississippi Sound. All 13 coastal casinos were heavily damaged.

First lady dishes up food and comfort

HOUSTON — First lady Laura Bush served smothered chicken to Hurricane Katrina evacuees at Houston's convention center shelter, home to about 300 people displaced by the disaster.

“It will be a long road for us,” she told religious leaders and volunteers at the George R. Brown Convention Center. “We have to stay with (evacuees) every step as they rebuild their lives, and it is not going to be easy.”

Bush also talked with families at a center for homeless mothers and children. She joined the children in molding Play-Doh and left behind M&Ms and notepads for them.

A 10-year-old boy told Bush he couldn't believe she was the first lady. “I'm married to the president,” Bush said. She then took the hands of two children and walked through the shelter with them.

“I think it is nice because she doesn't have to come,” said evacuee Kizzy Mickens. “Just coming to see us, to see how we are doing, is like a blessing because she never knew we existed but we knew about her.”

Rural home loans to be expanded

BILOXI, Miss. — In an unprecedented move, some Gulf Coast residents will be eligible for single-family home loans backed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture Rural Development program.

The loans usually are available only to residents in rural communities of 20,000 people or fewer. But now, coastal communities of up to 75,000 residents will be eligible, said Nick Walters, state director of USDA Rural Development in Mississippi.

“I didn't want to leave people out because of some regulation in Washington,” Walters said.

Witness Says Researchers Warned Merck On Vioxx (WSJ)

By Greg Groeller

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. -- Merck & Co. should have known that Vioxx could lead to heart attacks, a drug expert told a jury in a high-profile trial yesterday.

In his second day on the stand, Dr. Benedict Lucchesi said several researchers had warned Merck about Vioxx's potential to cause cardiac problems, particularly in people with histories of heart trouble, before the painkiller went on sale in 1999. "According to the slogan, 'Merck puts people first,' I think they should have known," he said.

Dr. Lucchesi, a pharmacology professor, is a witness for the plaintiff in the first trial since a Texas jury awarded $253.4 million last month to the family of a man who died after taking Vioxx. State caps in Texas are expected to reduce the amount of the verdict to about $26 million.

In the Atlantic City case, which began last week in a New Jersey state court and may run until mid-October, Frederick "Mike" Humeston, of Boise, Idaho, alleges that Vioxx caused his heart attack in 2001 after he had used the drug for two months.

DOJ_NMG_0006666

Merck maintains that Mr. Humeston's poor health and lifestyle, not Vioxx, led to his heart attack. In any case, Mr. Humeston didn't take the drug for long enough to cause heart problems, Merck lawyers have said. The drug company pulled Vioxx off the market last year after a company-funded study found the painkiller had increased the incidence of heart attacks and strokes after 18 months of usage.

Dr. Lucchesi -- questioned by Christopher Seeger, Mr. Humeston's lawyer -- testified yesterday that he believed the drug could cause a heart attack after just a single dose in certain circumstances. For a second day, Mr. Seeger, showed jurors internal Merck emails and memos that Dr. Lucchesi said appeared to show that the Whitehouse Station, N.J., company knew about Vioxx's dangers.

Later in the day, Dr. Lucchesi and a Merck lawyer, Stephen Raber, had several heated exchanges as Mr. Raber sought to show that Merck had investigated questions about dangers posed by Vioxx. Mr. Raber asked whether Dr. Lucchesi was aware of studies that Merck had performed to test the effects of Vioxx in animals, including the African green monkey.

"Sir, admit it, you don't know what Merck did" in response to warnings that Vioxx could lead to blood clots and, ultimately, heart attacks and strokes, Mr. Raber said. Dr. Lucchesi shot back that Merck never responded to his requests for data on their internal studies.

Dr. Lucchesi also testified in the Texas trial and is expected to be a witness for plaintiffs in future cases.

At Vioxx Trial, Witness Says Short-Term Use Posed A Risk (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 19, 2005

By Bloomberg News

Merck & Company's painkiller Vioxx may cause heart attacks with just one dose, a University of Michigan researcher said at the second product liability trial over the drug, challenging the company's assertion that only long-term users are at risk.

The researcher, Dr. Benedict R. Lucchesi, testified on behalf of Frederick Humeston, who took Vioxx intermittently for two months before his heart attack in September 2001. Merck withdrew drug last September after saying it doubled the risk of heart attacks and strokes after 18 months of daily use.

"There's every reason to believe" that a single dose "can lead to an adverse response," Dr. Lucchesi, a pharmacology professor, told jurors in Atlantic City. "I definitely think that Vioxx can cause a heart attack in the right person."

Mr. Humeston, a 60-year-old postal worker and former marine from Boise, Idaho, asserted in his lawsuit that Merck knew of Vioxx's health risks for years before withdrawing it from the market.

Merck faces about 5,000 Vioxx suits and billions of dollars in potential liability, analysts say.

Merck contends that Mr. Humeston had a heart attack because of his weight, blood pressure and work-related stress. The company says it had no scientific proof of Vioxx's dangers before last September.

Dr. Lucchesi also disputed Merck's explanation of why Vioxx caused five times as many heart attacks as a rival drug, naproxen, in a clinical trial in March 2000. Merck asserted that naproxen, used in the painkiller Aleve, protected the heart. Dr. Lucchesi said the results of the trial, known as the Vigor study, instead showed that Vioxx posed a greater risk.

"When I saw the explanation for the Vigor results, my immediate response was this is nonsense," Dr. Lucchesi said. "There is no evidence that I know of to show that" naproxen protects the heart.

Merck, the No. 3 drug maker in the nation, emphasized the Vigor finding that Vioxx caused less stomach distress than naproxen, a point that was not in dispute, Dr. Lucchesi said. Merck introduced Vioxx, which inhibits the cox-2 enzyme, in May 1999 as an alternative to pain relievers that cause stomach bleeding.

Vioxx accounted for $2.5 billion in annual sales before it was withdrawn.

Dr. Lucchesi testified for a second day that Merck ignored indications dating to 1997 that drugs like Vioxx block one of the body's natural defenses against blood clots. The company, based in Whitehouse Station, N.J., was "forewarned on multiple occasions" by researchers that Vioxx would increase clotting, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0006667

A Merck lawyer, Stephen Raber, tried to show during cross-examination that Dr. Lucchesi had disregarded studies that contradicted his conclusions about Vioxx. Dr. Lucchesi said he repeatedly asked Merck's lawyers for such data, and they did not produce it.

Oil Prices Rise As Gulf Storm Looms (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree and Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Oil prices surged as a new storm, Rita, headed toward the Gulf of Mexico, and OPEC ministers meeting in Vienna all but admitted they have no real means to cool red-hot petroleum markets.

The looming new threat to Gulf oil facilities eclipsed efforts by ministers of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to craft a reassuring message reiterating they would produce more oil if needed. It also underscored the U.S.'s dependence on the Gulf region, home to about a quarter of the nation's oil and natural-gas production and a large number of refineries.

The price of U.S. benchmark crude-oil futures for October delivery shot up $4.39 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange -- the highest one-day rise in nominal terms since it began trading oil futures in 1983 -- settling at $67.39. Gasoline and heating-oil futures also rose sharply.

Although still far from the Gulf Coast energy-producing region, Tropical Storm Rita is shaping up to be a worrisome storm for energy markets. Production platforms, pipelines and refineries spared the worst of last month's Hurricane Katrina could be in Rita's path. "This could be a huge punch in the gut for the market," said Agbeli Ameko, a partner with Enercast.com, a Denver-based energy forecasting firm.

Landfall on the Gulf Coast is expected by this weekend. Some oil companies are preparing to shut down facilities and evacuate workers. Analysts believe the storm could cause markets to gyrate all week.

The storm's approach is slowing efforts to fix infrastructure damaged by Katrina. The U.S. Mineral Management Service reported yesterday that 44% of the daily output of oil and natural gas was still off-line, three weeks after Katrina came ashore near the Louisiana-Mississippi border. So far, the damage has prevented the output of the oil and natural-gas equivalent of about 56 million barrels, just shy of 5% of the region's annual total.

Amid the storm concerns, energy markets brushed off the comments of Saudi Arabian Oil Minister Ali Naimi, who repeated his pledge to produce as much as 1.5 million barrels a day of extra oil if needed. Along with other oil ministers, Mr. Naimi sought new ways to dress up the cartel's year-old message that OPEC is willing to produce more oil if buyers could be found.

One of the options being discussed was for the cartel to state that it has two million barrels a day of spare petroleum-pumping capacity, citing projects that OPEC officials say will come on line later this year in the United Arab Emirates and Libya. The statement would say that the oil would be available on demand, regardless of the cartel's formal output ceiling of 28 million barrels a day. "The crude is available," Mr. Naimi told reporters. "If you want it, there it is."

Another option involves raising the cartel's formal output ceiling by 500,000 barrels a day or more to address concerns by major importing countries, whose economies are being hit by high oil prices. Industry analysts said oil markets would find nothing new in this sort of message from OPEC because it won't yield any actual extra crude.

"Definitely, it's a political message" from OPEC aimed at foreign governments, said Roger Diwan, an analyst at Washington consulting firm PFC Energy. "It's not intended to manage the market" because traders know that OPEC's moves here won't affect supplies, Mr. Diwan said.

OPEC is expected to formally announce its decision on output levels today. But none of the options being considered would necessarily lead to greater supplies of fuel. That is because buyers -- oil refiners who turn crude into gasoline and other fuels -- are running at full capacity and have no need currently for more oil, especially for the high-sulfur grades that Saudi Arabia can produce.

Industry analysts also said OPEC was exaggerating its spare production capacity, which was probably no more than 1.5 million barrels a day in a world market that is expected to consume more than 85 million barrels a day in the final quarter of this year. The International Energy Agency this month put OPEC's spare capacity at 1.39 million barrels a day, not counting war-scarred Iraq. Almost all of this extra capacity is in Saudi Arabia, the world's largest oil exporter, which is currently producing about 9.5 million barrels a day.

DOJ_NMG_0006668

New US Hurricane Threat Sends Energy Prices Soaring (FT)

By Carola Hoyos, Kevin Morrison And Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

The threat of a new hurricane heading towards the Gulf of Mexico repeating the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina sent oil, petrol and gas prices soaring on Monday and overshadowed the ministerial meeting of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Predictions that tropical storm Rita, gathering strength and expected to turn into a hurricane, might reach the Texas coast within the next week sent oil traders into panic mode: US and European benchmark crude oil prices rose by more than $3, and US natural gas prices hit new record highs.

"Rita has pushed Opec into the background, because there is great fear that we could be facing another severe supply disruption in the US," said Rob Laughlin, an oil trader with Man Financial in London.

Opec ministers said they were likely to finalise a decision to offer the market more oil when it needed it.

Kuwait's oil minister and Opec president Sheikh Ahmad Al-Sabah, insisted the group had 2m barrels a day of extra oil that it would immediately supply to the market if needed.

But traders, who see the extra volume at closer to 1.4m b/d that could take some time to get to the market, said this would do little to lower prices because Opec did not have the light, sweet oil that the market needed to make petrol.

Nevertheless, Opec hopes that its decision will reduce some of the criticism it faces from industrialised countries, which blame the current high oil price on the cartel.

In fact, the biggest impact Opec could hope to make is in the long term.

The International Monetary Fund this week will blame Opec and oil companies for not investing in new oil capacity quickly enough. Both have already begun to invest more thanks to high oil prices, but those efforts will only yield results in a few years when the projects come to fruition and can do little to reduce the current relatively high prices.

The US benchmark, WTI gained $3.30 to $66.30 a barrel in late morning New York trade. In London, IPE November Brent climbed more than $3 to $64.86. Indeed Opec has had little impact on the prices, since its spare oil capacity has shrunk as demand from the US and China outpaced the world's ability to keep up by exploring for and producing new oil.

The Centre for Global Energy Studies, the London-based consulting group, said in a report released yesterday: "Although oil demand growth slowed dramatically since the second quarter of 2004, it continues to outstrip the pace of non-Opec supply growth and Opec's capacity additions, as well as global increases in refining capacity, particularly to turn heavy, sour crudes into light sweet products that are most sought after."

The International Energy Agency, the industrialised countries' watchdog agency, estimates that oil demand growth fell from 5.3 per cent in the second quarter of 2004 to 1.2 per cent in the third quarter of this year.

The oil and gas industry, which has yet to recover from damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, scrambled for cover. Chevron, BP and Shell all pulled staff from the Gulf.

The Port of Houston Authority, the 6th largest in the world, began gathering information with its partners about the pending storm, reviewing all plans and procedures for the hurricane.

Felicia Griffin, spokeswoman, said the port, which is ranked 1st in the US in foreign tonnage and second overall, after the port of southern Louisiana, was checking inventory to ensure it had basic equipment on hand, including flashlights and batteries. If the hurricane stays on track, and is definitely targeting Houston, she said the port would tie down all cargo and equipment - ``anything that could be airborne'' - to prevent damage in the area and make shutdown decisions.

Houstonians, which saw first-hand the devastation wrecked upon their neighbors just weeks ago, raced to supermarkets to stock up on water and other necessities.

Oil Prices Spike As Storm Nears (WP)

By Justin Blum

DOJ_NMG_0006669

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Oil prices soared yesterday in the largest one-day gain ever as fears mounted that a developing tropical storm could damage oil operations in the Gulf of Mexico and Texas.

U.S. benchmark crude for October delivery gained $4.39 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange to close at $67.39. That was the largest one-day dollar gain since oil started trading on the exchange in 1983, according to the Energy Department. The oil price closed at a record $69.81 on Aug. 30.

Futures prices for gasoline, natural gas and heating oil also rose yesterday.

The spike came as gasoline prices, which surged after Katrina, continued to fall. The national average was $2.786 a gallon for regular, down 16.9 cents from a week earlier, according to the Energy Department. The average price in the Washington area dropped under $3 for a gallon of regular, according to a AAA-sponsored survey.

The increases in futures prices of oil and gasoline reflected concerns that Tropical Storm Rita, which was strengthening off the Bahamas yesterday afternoon, could disrupt offshore oil and natural gas production and impair operations at Texas refineries that produce gasoline. Supplies already are tight because of damage from Hurricane Katrina to offshore production and Gulf Coast refineries.

The new storm "could be coming in right exactly where Katrina didn't go," said Michael Guido, director of commodity strategy in New York for French bank Societe Generale. "It could be a bad situation for all the platforms that didn't get hit before."

The price spike came as ministers from the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries were considering whether to offer additional oil to the market. Traders said a move by OPEC would have little impact on the market because refineries don't have the spare capacity to process the varieties of oil that could become available.

Oil companies yesterday were evacuating hundreds of employees from platforms in the Gulf of Mexico by helicopter and boat, a standard precaution in advance of tropical storms and hurricanes. BP, for instance, said it was in the process of evacuating half of the 1,500 workers it has on platforms in the gulf.

Analysts said that pump prices should continue to fall but that yesterday's increases on Nymex mean they would not fall as much as they would have otherwise. Wholesale prices have dropped more quickly than retail prices, which have been catching up, they said.

"You may see local street prices drift lower," said Tom Kloza, chief analyst for the Oil Price Information Service of Lakewood, N.J. "That's how far behind pump prices were in catching up to the wholesale price."

Four major Gulf Coast refineries remain idle because of Katrina, according to the Energy Department. Even before that storm, analysts had said refining capacity worldwide was struggling to meet demand.

Now analysts say they are concerned that the developing tropical storm could hit Texas, home to about 27 percent of U.S. refining capacity, according to the Energy Department.

D. Mark Routt, an analyst with Energy Security Analysis Inc. of Wakefield, Mass., said Houston is an "extremely important hub" for pipelines and other oil industry operations, adding to concern about storm damage.

Analysts said that they were concerned about damage to oil production in the gulf but that those concerns were secondary to refining.

Nearly 56 percent of daily oil production in the Gulf of Mexico remained off line yesterday because of Katrina, amounting to almost 838,000 barrels a day, according to the Minerals Management Service.

The Energy Department said yesterday that it would lend more oil from the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The department said it is releasing 600,000 barrels to Total Petrochemicals USA Inc., bringing to 13.2 million barrels the amount loaned from the reserve since Katrina.

The department previously agreed to sell 11 million barrels of crude from the reserve.

Storm Makes Oil Cleanup Crews Uneasy (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006670

NEW ORLEANS — In the remote marshlands of southern Louisiana, emergency cleanup crews responding to 15 oil spills unleashed by Hurricane Katrina now have another worry: Tropical Storm Rita.

About 700 private contractors who are deployed each day by riverboat and helicopter are working to contain 6.7 million gallons of spilled oil at remote production sites operated by Bass Enterprises, Chevron, Dynegy, Murphy Oil, Shell and others, says Coast Guard Chief Petty Officer Keith Alholm.

It is the largest oil cleanup effort in state history, more than 10 times greater than the remediation of 550,000 gallons of oil spilled by the ship Westchester in the Mississippi River in November 2000. The biggest spill in U.S. history was 11 million gallons by the ship Exxon Valdez off Alaska in 1989.

Except Bass, where no one could be reached for comment, the other companies said spills had been contained with little or no environmental damage.

Roland Guidry, the Louisiana governor's oil spill coordinator, said Monday that authorities are concerned Tropical Storm Rita could move from the Florida Keys to the Louisiana coast, threatening the safety of crews working in rugged drilling areas that the hurricane rendered largely inaccessible.

"We have to have an exit strategy for all the people out there working, and possibly bring in the equipment we have out there," Guidry said. He said a decision will be made "in the next couple of days."

To date, cleanup efforts have been hindered by a lack of access and accommodations for the emergency cleanup crews, Guidry says: "It took us 31/2 hours by boat to get to some of those places, with no place to stay, no roads to get there. It's been like that since Day 1, and it hasn't improved much."

Guidry, speaking from Baton Rouge, said, "The reason we don't have 1,000 or 2,000 (workers) out there is because we don't have any way to get them out there and keep them out there safely."

To provide temporary lodging on the river for several hundred emergency workers, the federal Maritime Administration, a unit of the Department of Transportation, has deployed five ships to Louisiana, the last of which arrived over the weekend. Two of those ships are anchored in oil field cleanup areas. The government is considering deploying two more ships with several hundred additional berths.

The Coast Guard, which continues to airlift water and ice to some workers on the ground, says a lack of electric power in the area also slows the cleanup. Says Alholm: "It's been a lot more difficult than a normal oil spill cleanup would be because of the (damaged) infrastructure. It's going to take us longer."

Last week, the Coast Guard reported spills at these oil company installations:

•Bass Enterprises: 3.8 million gallons spilled due to damage to two storage tanks at a remote site in southern Louisiana identified on Mississippi River navigational charts as Mile Marker 35.

•Chevron: 991,788 gallons due to a ruptured tank or transfer line at Buras, La. An additional 53,592 gallons spilled at Chevron's Port Fourchon pipeline. At a third Chevron site known as Wagon Wheel, 8,400 gallons spilled. Several birds were among the reported wildlife casualties.

•Dynegy: 70,000 gallons spilled due to two tank failures near Venice, La.

•Murphy Oil: 819,000 gallons spilled at Meraux, La., due to a ruptured tank. As a result, Murphy said, two class-action lawsuits were filed against it by local residents seeking unspecified damages.

•Shell Oil: 933,870 barrels spilled due to a tank or pipeline breach in southern Louisiana identified on Mississippi River charts as Mile Marker 3. An additional 10,500 gallons spilled at Port Sulphur.

Gas Prices Fall, But Storm Worries Push Oil Higher (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, September 20, 2005

Gasoline prices dropped Monday to their lowest since Hurricane Katrina shut refining and shipping in the energy-rich Gulf of Mexico nearly three weeks ago.

But worries about another hurricane striking later this week sent prices of crude oil and wholesale gasoline zooming as energy traders bet on another shortage.

"If it hits the Houston area and damages a whole new set of refineries and shipping and infrastructure, we'd probably see a return to $3 gasoline," AAA spokesman Geoff Sundstrom says. "We were looking forward to gasoline going back to $2.50, $2.60 a gallon, but this new storm will put a stop to that."

That's Tropical Storm Rita off the Florida Keys, expected to become a hurricane, according to the National Weather Service.

AAA's daily survey showed a nationwide average of $2.805 Monday for a gallon of unleaded, down 8.2 cents over the weekend and lowest since $2.68 Sept. 1. The government's weekly price survey showed a nationwide average of $2.786 Monday, down 16.9 cents in a week.

Those numbers could turn fast. Frenzied traders bid up the price of oil $4.39 a barrel, to $67.39 at the close of New York trading. Wholesale gasoline for delivery next month zoomed nearly 25 cents to about $2.03 a gallon.

Oil prices and, more immediately, wholesale gas prices determine what you pay at the pump.

Highs at the pump were hit Sept. 5 when AAA reported a nationwide average of $3.057 and the U.S. Energy Information Administration reported $3.069. The inflation-adjusted record is $3.118, according to EIA.

"The good news is, we have a week to get ready. The bad news is that the market has all week to react," Peter Beutel, president of energy consultant Cameron Hanover, says of Rita.

He says it's possible Rita jitters might halt a further drop in retail gas prices rather than sending them zooming again.

Natural gas, a key gulf energy product and the fuel that heats most U.S. homes, rocketed to a record $12.70 per million Btu during Monday trading, and closed at $12.663, a one-day jump of 13.6%.

Energy companies are evacuating facilities in anticipation of Rita. The U.S. Minerals Management Service said Monday that six oil rigs had been evacuated. Katrina's damage and the new evacuations mean Gulf oil production is 44% of normal, MMS said. The Gulf supplies 29% of oil used in the USA, 21% of the natural gas.

OPEC Set To Open Oil Taps Full Blast (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

VIENNA, Sept. 19 - OPEC delegates said Monday that the group planned to allow its members to provide up to two million barrels a day of additional crude oil if the market needs it. But oil traders brushed aside the move and instead sent oil prices higher on worries of another possible hurricane.

Royal Dutch Shell, Chevron and other oil companies said they were evacuating some employees from offshore oil platforms in anticipation of Tropical Storm Rita. The National Hurricane Center said Monday that the storm was making its way toward the Gulf of Mexico from the Bahamas and could become a hurricane overnight.

The latest hurricane warnings helped push oil prices up on the New York Mercantile Exchange, and they closed Monday at $67.39 a barrel, up $4.39. Natural gas futures hit a record on Monday, closing at $12.663 per thousand cubic feet, up $1.519.

Forecasters issued a hurricane warning for parts of Southern Florida and said that by early Saturday, Rita, the 17th named storm of the Atlantic season, could make landfall near Houston, an area that is a major port and home to many refineries and petrochemical plants.

The mayor of Galveston, Tex., Lyda Ann Thomas, called for a voluntary evacuation. Galveston is an island city and tourist destination about 50 miles southeast of Houston.

OPEC's highly unusual decision to put on call an extra 7 percent of its production is expected to be formally announced Tuesday at the end of the group's two-day meeting in Vienna. Some oil ministers said the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries wanted to show it was doing all it could to lower oil prices even as they blamed refining shortages for the current situation.

Under the proposal, which members have been discussing in meetings since Sunday, OPEC producers would provide as much oil as refiners and other buyers asked for, without regard to previous production limits or quotas. The production ceiling, now set at 28 million barrels a day and shared by all 11 members except Iraq, would theoretically remain unchanged.

DOJ_NMG_0006672

"The crude is available," Ali al-Naimi, Saudi Arabia's oil minister and OPEC's most influential voice, told reporters in Vienna. "If you want it, here it is."

OPEC's plan, proposed by Sheik Ahmad Fahad al-Ahmad al-Sabah, the group's president and the oil minister from Kuwait, has the backing of Saudi Arabia, OPEC's largest producer, which would provide 75 percent of the additional oil.

President Bush said he welcomed a release of more oil by OPEC members, particularly if it helped cut retail gas prices by increasing supply.

"I have been concerned about the price at the pump that our folks are paying," Mr. Bush said. "Part of that was caused by the disruptions of Hurricane Katrina. We dealt with that by suspending rules and regulations that enable us to import more gasoline. But part of the cost of gasoline is a result of high crude oil prices, and one way to affect those prices is to conserve and the other way is to encourage an increased supply."

OPEC's proposal is largely shaped around an earlier pledge by Saudi Arabia to fully open its taps to consumers who asked for more oil.

Saudi Arabia's commitment to increase its output to its full capacity of 11 million barrels a day, from 9.5 million barrels now, was repeated after Hurricane Katrina interrupted oil production from the Gulf of Mexico three weeks ago, sending the price of crude oil above $70 a barrel.

But the divergence between the oil market's focus and OPEC's plans illustrates the group's dilemma.

"OPEC's move today is largely for show," said Lawrence J. Goldstein, president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation. "They want to appear to be responsible, but the tools that they have in the bag render them largely impotent for the moment."

Many delegates here have asserted repeatedly that the shortfall in energy markets was not one of crude oil but of refining capacity - the current inability of refiners to turn oil into sufficient gasoline and other products like diesel or jet fuel.

"There is no issue with crude oil supplies," said Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, the minister from Qatar. "The real shortfall is in refineries, especially in the United States. We can do everything we can, except we can't interfere with the nature of the problem."

Still, he said OPEC hoped to send a message to oil traders, who have been bidding up oil prices over the last two years, largely on the belief that the growth in demand was outstripping the ability of suppliers to bring more oil into the market. That has contributed to a doubling in oil prices over the last two years.

OPEC has been facing mounting criticism from consuming nations, especially in Europe, which has been asking OPEC to act more forcefully, regardless of the refining constraints. Many of those nations are beginning to worry that high oil prices may slow growth and hurt the global economy.

According to OPEC's most recent statistics, the group pumps 28.2 million barrels of oil a day, about a third of global production and 40 percent of global exports.

Since 2003, OPEC producers have increased their output 10 percent to make up for a 5 percent rise in global oil demand. That increase leaves only one OPEC member, Saudi Arabia, with large amounts of untapped oil. Sheik Ahmad, the OPEC president, said that Nigeria, the United Arab Emirates and Libya could provide an extra 400,000 barrels a day by December.

At their meeting on Monday, OPEC's ministers also discussed their long-term strategy and the idea of making their future investment plans clearer. The group appears to have dropped a suggestion to raise the production ceiling by 500,000 barrels a day, an idea that was floated by some OPEC officials in the days leading to the meeting.

"We will collectively make a pledge to have the spare capacity available if needed, but I don't believe it is needed," Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's oil minister, told reporters.

To illustrate the availability of oil on the market, many here pointed out that the United States Energy Department had recently found buyers for only 11 million barrels of crude oil from the nation's strategic reserves, just a third of the amount it had put on sale.

"It proves there is no need for oil," Mr. Attiyah of Qatar said. "There is a need for products."

Hurricane Katrina crippled the United States' main oil and gas production region, sending energy markets into a tailspin. But perhaps of greater concern for energy markets, it caused the shutdown of four major refineries along the Gulf of Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0006673

These refineries, which can process nearly 900,000 barrels a day, or 5 percent of American capacity, are likely to be out of commission for months.

Chevron said Monday that a large refinery damaged by Hurricane Katrina in Pascagoula, Miss., would not be fully operational until mid-November. Under normal operations, the plant, which accounts for about 2 percent of the nation's capacity, processes 325,000 barrels of crude oil a day, the largest amount from the four refineries that are still recovering from Katrina damage.

The refining crunch in the United States caused gasoline supplies to dip, led to spot shortages in some parts of the country and, for a brief period, pushed gasoline prices above $3 a gallon nationwide for the first time.

As a response to that shock, consuming nations dipped into their oil reserves to make up for the production shortfall from the Gulf of Mexico. The crisis prompted the Bush administration to tap into the nation's strategic stocks, something it had been reluctant to do.

The International Energy Agency, which usually provides advice on energy policies to 26 industrialized nations, also activated its emergency oil plan, releasing oil for only the second time in its 29-year history.

Fears Of New Storm Send Oil Soaring (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 20, 2005

With another storm bearing down on the Florida coast and threatening oil production there, oil prices jumped Monday and dragged stocks down.

Worried any higher uptick in oil prices would tax the economy, investors sent the Dow Jones industrial average down 84.31 points to 10,557.63. The Dow is down 2.1% this year.

Tech stocks didn't do much better, either, with the Nasdaq composite index falling 15.09 points to 2145.26. The Nasdaq is down 1.4% this year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 6.89 points to 1231.02. The educational services, computer electronic retail and auto parts industries were the S&P's worst performers on Monday.

Still, the S&P 500 is alone among the three major stock market indexes in being up for the year at 1.6%.

Investors also were concerned about today's Federal Reserve Board statement on the economy and decision on short-term interest rates. But stocks were under pressure mainly because of the approach of Tropical Storm Rita, just weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast. The price of a barrel of oil jumped $4.39 to $67.39 as investors fretted about the supply of the commodity.

The day's selling was “more than anything the news of Rita coming toward the Gulf Coast,” says Andy Brooks, trader at T. Rowe Price. And that left investors to wonder what kind of disruption could be caused by the storm.

“It was a raucous session,” says A.C. Moore, strategist at Dunvegan Associates. Moore says the demand for oil continues to outstrip supply, which is a problem that only economics, not politicians, can resolve. “Commodity prices can do anything when they're out of balance. That's the problem,” he says.

Spinnaker Exploration, an oil-exploration company, soared $15.40 to $64.15 after rival Norsk Hydro offered $65.50 a share, or $2.5 billion, for the company.

•Carnival added $1.75 to $50.78 after the cruise-ship operator reported 12% higher fiscal third-quarter results because of higher ticket prices and greater passenger capacity.

•Russell, a maker of athletic apparel, fell $2.87 to $15.12. The company said it expects to earn 50 cents to 60 cents a share in the third quarter, well below the 66 cents expected by analysts, due in part to shipping problems caused by Katrina. It said 40 containers of goods were lost or damaged because of the storm.

•TBC, a marketer of tires, rose $8.24 to $34.36 after saying it is being bought by rival Sumitomo for $820 million, or $35 a share.

Shares Tumble On Worries Over New Storm And Rates (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0006674

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

Shares plummeted yesterday as heightened fears of another hurricane hitting some part of the Gulf Coast sent oil prices racing past $67 a barrel and investors grew concerned about the Federal Reserve's meeting today on interest rates.

Wall Street saw some bright spots in merger activity and strong earnings from Nike and Carnival, but the market became increasingly uneasy as surging energy prices threatened consumer spending. Investors also awaited the Fed's decision on whether to raise rates or to halt its string of increases to mitigate any economic slide after Hurricane Katrina.

With an intensifying Tropical Storm Rita nearing Florida's tip and poised to enter the Gulf of Mexico just weeks after Hurricane Katrina's devastation, the market retreated late in the day.

"Front and center would be concerns of the storm approaching tomorrow, of which you're seeing crude oil trading up $4," said Steven Goldman, chief market strategist at Weeden & Company.

Crude oil made its biggest one-day gain ever, even as the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries neared a consensus on allowing sales of two million additional barrels a day to offset a potential supply shortage from recent refinery shutdowns.

On the New York Mercantile Exchange, a barrel of light crude jumped $4.39, to $67.39.

By the close of trading, the Dow Jones industrial average had dropped 84.31 points, or 0.79 percent, to 10,557.63. The Dow lost as much as 120.69 points during the session. Broader stock indicators also declined. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 6.89 points, or 0.56 percent, to 1,231.02, and the Nasdaq composite index sank 15.09, or 0.7 percent, to 2,145.26.

The 10-year Treasury note rose by 8/32 to a price of 1001/32, with the yield sliding to 4.25 percent from 4.27 percent on Friday.

Although Wall Street is uncertain what the Fed's decision is likely to be, many analysts are predicting that the central bank will continue lifting rates to stem inflation and will keep that as its main priority despite the widespread economic ripple left by the hurricane.

In corporate news, Nike, the world's biggest shoemaker, said higher sales across the board helped lift its first-quarter profit 32 percent to easily beat Wall Street expectations. Worldwide future orders for products scheduled for delivery through January 2006 grew 11 percent to $4.9 billion, the company added. Nike surged $4.99, to $83.45.

The cruise ship operator Carnival posted a 12 percent gain in third-quarter profit, as revenue swelled from increased ship capacity and ticket prices. The company also said that while the hurricane depressed results in the latest quarter, recent bookings remained strong and average prices were above those of the year before. Carnival added $1.75, to $50.78.

Sirius Satellite Radio raised its projected full-year revenue by $5 million, to $230 million, but the expanded forecast still fell short of analyst targets for $234.5 million. The company maintained estimates for three million subscribers by year-end, up from about 2.1 million as of last week. Sirius fell 35 cents, to $6.70.

Rita Fears Drag On Stocks (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Weather charts showing Tropical Storm Rita potentially slicing into the Gulf of Mexico sent a chill through the stock market three weeks after Hurricane Katrina tore through the Gulf Coast. Petroleum-futures prices surged, causing stocks to sink, though a last-minute kept the market from its lows for the day.

Uncertainty about the Federal Reserve's decision on interest rates Tuesday added to investors' anxiety. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 84.31 points to 10557.63. General Motors slid 3.6%. Exxon Mobil gained 1.5% amid the jump in energy prices. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 6.89 to 1231.02 and the Nasdaq Composite Index declined by 15.09 points to 2145.26.

Worries that Rita could disrupt the post-Katrina recovery pushed light, sweet crude up by $4.39, or 7%, to settle at $67.39 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. It was the biggest dollar jump in crude since trading began on the Nymex. The previous record was on Aug. 6, 1990, a few days after Iraq invaded Kuwait, when crude gained $3.56 a barrel. The biggest decline came several months later, as crude plunged $10.56 on Jan. 17, 1991, soon after the U.S. launched the first Gulf War to evict Iraq from Kuwait.

DOJ_NMG_0006675

Gasoline and natural-gas prices surged 14% apiece, adding to worries that consumers could be unnerved by sticker shock at the pump and when home-heating bills arrive in the mail as the weather begins to cool.

Gold for December delivery also moved sharply higher, jumping $7.10, or 1.5%, to $470.40 a troy ounce on the Comex division of the Nymex, the highest level since December 1987. Gold has risen more than $10 an ounce in a week amid concerns about inflation in the wake of surging energy prices and government spending plans to rebuild in the Gulf Coast.

Rita is forecast to skirt across the southern tip of Florida and move into the middle of the Gulf by Thursday. That could deal a "potentially devastating blow to our refining capacity again," said Raymond Carbonne, an oil trader at Paramount Options in New York. Fears were heightened by the fact that "we still haven't found out the severity of the damage that Katrina caused," he said.

Selling accelerated in the stock market after Chevron and Royal Dutch Shell said they are evacuating offshore oil and gas rigs in the Gulf. The National Weather Service said Rita will likely grow into a major hurricane as it moves over the warm waters of the Gulf, with landfall likely in Texas or Louisiana.

If energy prices weren't enough, investors also were unnerved ahead of Tuesday's meeting by the Fed. Expectations for a pause in rate increases by the Fed have gone from a 50%-50% chance the week after Katrina hit the Gulf to a less than 10% chance in the days leading up to the policy meeting, according to trading in federal-funds futures. An increase Tuesday would mark the 11th since June 2004, bringing the Fed's target for overnight loans between banks to 3.75%.

Analysts said the surge in gold and oil prices raised the specter of inflation, and virtually confirmed the Fed would raise rates a quarter-point Tuesday. "You've got gold and energy sending out a message: inflation is an issue, and that's what central bankers are paid to keep their eyes on," said Michael Panzner, head of sales trading at Rabo Securities.

In major market action:

Stocks fell. On the Big Board, where 1.5 billion shares traded, 1,052 stocks rose and 2,258 fell Friday. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 1,021 stocks advanced and 2,003 declined.

Bonds gained. The benchmark 10-year Treasury rose 5/32, or $1.56 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.250% early Monday. The 30-year bond added 4/32 to yield 4.550%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced. It was at 111.51 yen, up from 111.36 yen late Friday, while the euro slipped to $1.2137 from $1.2234.

Stock Trackers Become Master Storm Trackers (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK — Tracking violent storms is quickly emerging as a new job requirement on Wall Street.

After the massive financial fallout caused by Hurricane Katrina, a growing number of traders, analysts and portfolio managers now view the weather as a major risk factor. The damage to the Gulf Coast's energy infrastructure exposed a vulnerability in the nation's oil and gas supply chain, sparking a sharp rise in the price of gasoline and heating oil and natural gas used to keep homes warm in winter.

With Tropical Storm Rita barreling down on the Florida Keys and likely to gain strength and become a hurricane, it's no surprise that investors are just as interested in where the next hurricane will hit as they are the direction of interest rates. In fact, investors with billions of dollars riding on stocks now spend a good portion of their day tuning into the Weather Channel and monitoring weather-related websites.

“Bottom line is investors are becoming more cognizant of the impact the weather has on stocks,” says hedge fund manager Mort Cohen of Clarion Group. “You have to factor the weather in when picking stocks.”

Adds Peter Cardillo, chief analyst at S.W. Bach: “What happens if we have another Katrina?”

Tracking “strike probabilities” and “wind swaths” is now common practice, given the potential of natural disasters to damage the economy, spark an energy crisis and crimp profits at affected companies.

DOJ_NMG_0006676

•Traders at money management firm T. Rowe Price now tune in to the Weather Channel, says head trader Andy Brooks. “Rita is now on the radar screen,” he says. “Trading desks have got to know what is being broadcast and reported on as it happens.”

•Money manager Gary Kaltbaum of Kaltbaum & Associates checks updates every three hours on the National Hurricane Center's website and is constantly looking at satellite pictures of brewing storms. “If the oil rigs and refineries go down, the price of oil will shoot back up,” he says. A barrel of crude soared more than $4 a barrel Monday amid fears Rita would inflict more damage in the Gulf.

•Analysts at Clarion Group regularly track updates from the National Weather Service. The motivation: “We have a lot of money in energy stocks and are thinking of putting more money in shares of manufactured housing stocks,” Cohen says.

Another sign of the intense demand for weather-related insights: Ken Reeves, senior meteorologist at AccuWeather.com, says “weathermen” from his firm made more than 10 appearances Monday on the business cable channel CNBC. Says Cardillo: “You have to keep an eye on the eye of the storm.”

Bond Market Signals Little Faith In Fed To Slow March Of Inflation (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

The bond market has a message for Federal Reserve officials trying to gauge Hurricane Katrina's economic impact: Inflation probably will accelerate no matter what you do.

Today, the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee decides whether to keep raising short-term interest rates to fight inflation or pause for more data on how the economy has fared since Katrina. Most economists expect the Fed to raise its interest-rate target for the 11th time in 15 months -- by a quarter percentage point to 3.75% -- but will read the accompanying statement closely for signs of future moves.

In the bond market, though, investors already are demanding higher returns on longer-term securities -- a sign they expect inflation to heat up as the government, companies and individuals spend billions of dollars to rebuild in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast. "We're about to rebuild a major U.S. metropolitan area," says David Glocke, a Treasury-bond portfolio manager at The Vanguard Group, an asset-management firm in Valley Forge, Penn. "...That's definitely inflationary."

Before Katrina hit, short-term and long-term rates had been converging, a sign that investors expected the Fed's campaign of rate increases to slow the economy or even tip it into recession, which would in turn force the central bank to bring rates back down in the future. But now that convergence -- known as a flattening yield curve -- has reversed: In afternoon trading yesterday, 10-year Treasury notes yielded 0.32 percentage point more than two-year Treasurys, compared with a difference of 0.12 percentage point on Aug. 29.

The "steepening" trend suggests that while investors' expectations for economic growth haven't necessarily changed, they are more concerned about the level of inflation associated with that growth. "If we get through this without a major hit to economic activity, then I think you'd have to be more worried about inflation than before," says Jan Hatzius, senior U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs in New York.

Since Katrina, for example, more investors have come to believe that the Fed will pause in its interest-rate increases this year. In a survey of 22 big Wall Street banks published yesterday, most expected the FOMC to pause at least once at its three remaining meetings this year. Early yesterday, the futures market was assigning a probability of more than 90% to a rate increase today, but closer to 60% for an increase at the next meeting Nov. 1, and much less to a third raise at the Dec. 13 meeting.

The hurricane -- along with Tropical Storm Rita -- has added uncertainty. Katrina's short-term effect on fuel and construction-materials prices will skew inflation data through at least October, making it difficult for the Fed and investors to understand what is happening in the economy.

But even investors who expect the Fed to keep raising its short-term interest-rate target this year believe that the risk of accelerated inflation has increased. "There's a risk that somewhere along the line inflation gets ahead" of the Fed, says Dave MacEwen, chief investment officer for fixed income at American Century Investments, an asset manager based in Mountain View, Calif.

DOJ_NMG_0006677

To mitigate the perceived inflation risk, Mr. MacEwen and other money managers have been reducing bets that would benefit from a flatter yield curve and putting on bets that would benefit from a steepening curve.

Treasury Bonds

Prices of Treasury securities firmed modestly yesterday, buoyed by soaring energy prices, though gains were limited ahead of the Fed's policy meeting.

At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note was up 5/32 point, or $1.5625 per $1,000 face value, at 100. Its yield fell to 4.25% from 4.267% Friday. The 30-year bond was up 4/32 point at 112 11/32 to yield 4.550% from 4.557%.

Asset-Backed Securities

Issuers poured more than $10 billion in new supply into the asset-backed market, making up for time lost to last week's annual industry conference in Florida. Securities backed by home-equity debt accounted for about $7 billion of the new deals.

Greenspan And Katrina (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Along the way in his long career, Alan Greenspan has been known to follow the price of gold. Not as a gold bug who thinks it is the lodestar of monetary policy, but as one who finds it a useful indicator of inflationary expectations. We hope he's following the barbaric metal that way now, because yesterday it pushed through $467 an ounce at the close in London, to a 17-year high.

This gold surge is probably a response to the speculation that the Federal Reserve might actually make the mistake at its meeting today of pausing in its monetary tightening in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. Yields on the 10-year note have also climbed back up from their Katrina lows, and even stripping out the Katrina energy spike, prices on steel, lumber, cement and other goods have been rising.

Which means easing up now would be exactly the wrong policy. Those urging such an action include carry-traders who fear getting caught playing the yield curve, investors long on housing, and all kinds of well-intentioned folks who simply don't want to see the expansion end. We know how they feel. This market psychology always takes hold amid a Fed-tightening cycle -- and this time it is being exaggerated by the fallout from Katrina.

But the Fed cannot fine-tune economic growth. It has only one job -- maintaining price stability. We've been writing for two years that the Fed has been providing too much liquidity, with negative real interest rates, and even its 250-basis point rise over the past 15 months has not brought rates back to neutrality. Stopping the rate increases now would run the risk of even greater increases later, as price pressures continue to build.

Our guess is that this is not the kind of policy dilemma Mr. Greenspan wants to leave his successor in 2006 and 2007. We also doubt he wants to depart in January having abandoned some of the hard-earned progress against inflation that he and his predecessor Paul Volcker earned since the last time we had an oil shock, in the 1970s. The Fed printed dollars to offset the economic damage from rising oil prices, only to create more inflation and still higher oil prices. The inflationary cycle didn't end until Ronald Reagan backed Mr. Volcker's slam on the brakes.

Katrina's blow will reduce economic output in the third quarter and maybe the fourth, but probably without inducing recession. The economy entered the eye of the hurricane with momentum built up over two years of 4% average GDP growth since the tax cuts of 2003. The rebuilding of the Gulf Coast will again lift GDP as it gains momentum later this year and into next. A rate hike now could actually have the beneficial effect of calming inflation fears and keeping long-term interest rates lower. If the Fed keeps prices stable, the animal spirits of the private sector will do the rest.

Yes, Parallel Tracks To North, But Parallel Tracks Don't Meet (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - After four years of bitter arguments over whether to negotiate with North Korea or try to engineer its collapse, the accord President Bush grudgingly approved Sunday evening provided the bare minimum - an agreement in principle that the North would end a five-decade pursuit of nuclear weapons, the only card the erratic nation has to play to get the world to pay attention to its demands.

DOJ_NMG_0006678

But even to get that, Mr. Bush had to blink slightly, acknowledging that at some point in the future, the United States would discuss with the North building new nuclear facilities - something Washington has said it could never trust the North with.

And the preliminary agreement, as Mr. Bush himself acknowledged, says nothing about when or under what conditions the North would give up all of its nuclear programs, re-enter the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and allow inspections. "We've got to verify whether or not that happens," Mr. Bush said.

For five years now, many of his most conservative advisers have warned that deceit, distrust and broken agreements make an accord like this a hopeless task.

They blocked negotiations for the first few years of his presidency, but in the end, both Mr. Bush and his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, were persuaded that if a confrontation ever occurred with North Korea, they had to be prepared to show that they had made every effort to reach a diplomatic solution.

"The lesson of Iraq," said one senior American official, who is deeply skeptical about the deal, "is that we can never again confront a country about its weapons unless we show that we have tried every available alternative to disarm it."

It is too early to know if the North has made what Ms. Rice often calls a "strategic choice" to give up all its weapons. Some officials say they suspect that the North entered the talks ready to give up its plutonium program, which it "froze" under an agreement with the Clinton administration in 1994, because those facilities are out in the open, impossible to protect if a conflict with the United States erupted.

Under that theory, the North is more interested in protecting a clandestine uranium enrichment program that, the administration says, the North secretly started to evade the provisions of the 1994 agreement. After initially appearing to acknowledge the program when confronted in 2002, the North now denies it exists. It is never explicitly mentioned in the statement signed Monday, though the administration says it is covered by the commitment to "abandoning all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs."

To experts on North Korea, that raises a critical problem. "It's a huge hole in the agreement," said Art Brown, for years the chief Central Intelligence Agency officer in charge of watching North Korea. "If they don't acknowledge they have it - and if they have buried it in some cave - we'll say it's included in the deal and they'll say there is nothing there to give up."

Moreover, the preliminary agreement says nothing about verification. Mr. Bush's aides have insisted that the United States and other nations will conduct their own inspections, rather than rely entirely on international inspectors.

On Monday, officials at the State Department and the intelligence agencies were dusting off a detailed plan to inspect virtually every suspect site. But it is not clear that the North has agreed to this.

"We will need to travel throughout the country, and be given unhindered access," said one senior Bush administration official, who said he approved of the agreement but insisted on speaking anonymously in part because he was raising doubts about what the negotiators had accomplished. "Can you imagine the North Koreans letting us do that?"

International inspectors, who were thrown out by North Korea in 2002, never had free access beyond a few facilities at one plant, at Yongbyon.

Part of the reason Mr. Bush signed the agreement, American and foreign officials said, is that he had to close the breach among his negotiating partners: China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

China drafted the language signed on Monday. Along with South Korea, it has been eager to do anything to forestall a crisis on the Korean peninsula. That is why China insisted that the draft include references to building a nuclear reactor, at an unspecified time, in the agreement. "They said it was the only way the North Koreans would get on board," said one senior official involved in the talks.

The accord is also unlikely to settle the behind-the-scenes administration battles about how hard to squeeze North Korea. From the moment Mr. Bush's team arrived at the White House in 2001, North Korea has been a subject of tremendous internal strife. It was the issue that first separated former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell from Ms. Rice and administration hard-liners who believed the time was ripe to choke off North Korea.

When Ms. Rice succeeded Mr. Powell, she put together her own negotiating team, led by Christopher R. Hill. Because of Ms. Rice's closeness to the president, he was empowered to discuss things his predecessor never could, including new ways to provide energy to North Korea. But the key has been the timing: Ms. Rice and others had complained that Mr. Clinton erred by agreeing to aid North Korea before it disarmed, and that never again would the United States "reward bad behavior."

DOJ_NMG_0006679

On Monday Ms. Rice argued that the wording of the agreement implies that North Korea will disarm first."At an appropriate time we are prepared to discuss - discuss" the idea of building a nuclear reactor, she said. She said several times that the discussion would not even begin until North Korea dismantled its weapons program.

So it was a measure of the disagreements that may be on the way that just hours after she spoke North Korea issued a statement saying it demanded the reactors first.

N. Korea, U.S. Both Bend A Bit For A Deal (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 20, 2005

The United States made key concessions to reach a preliminary nuclear agreement with North Korea on Monday, and hard negotiations lie ahead before that country gives up its nuclear weapons programs.

Under the agreement reached in Beijing among six nations, North Korea pledged to abandon "all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs" and return to an international treaty on nuclear non-proliferation and arms inspections. In return, it would get security assurances and economic aid.

The deal, signed by the United States, North Korea, China, South Korea, Japan and Russia, doesn't mention certain U.S. positions, such as its opposition to North Korean efforts to enrich uranium. Those efforts led to the collapse of a U.S.-North Korea agreement in 2002. It refers instead to a 1992 agreement between North and South Korea that barred such activity. North Korea softened a demand for a nuclear reactor for electricity production.

"Both of them blinked," said Jack Pritchard, a former U.S. negotiator with North Korea.

President Bush called the agreement "a wonderful step forward. But now we've got to verify" it.

Representatives from the six nations will meet again in November to work out the details.

A year ago, U.S. negotiators said energy assistance from North Korea's neighbors would come if it accounted for nuclear programs within three months and began to dismantle them. Such language is missing from the new deal, which says the United States will join other nations to provide energy. The agreement also says:

•The United States has no intention of attacking North Korea, and the two countries can "exist peacefully together." Chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill previously rejected such language, which North Korea interprets as a sign the United States will not try to overturn its repressive government.

•The parties agreed to "discuss at an appropriate time" a light-water reactor to produce electricity. Two such reactors were promised under a 1994 agreement intended to halt nuclear weapons work by the North. Work stopped in 2002, and the United States has opposed reviving the project.

Monday's agreement could lead to something like the 1994 deal, said Scott Snyder, a Korea expert at the Washington office of the Asia Foundation, a research group. The Bush administration had long criticized that deal. "This is a very pragmatic approach which was completely absent for the last four years," Snyder said.

Michael Horowitz, a lobbyist for human rights in North Korea, warned of congressional opposition without progress on rights.

Donald Gregg, a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea, praised Hill and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice for making "sensible concessions." U.S. negotiators had less leeway in the first Bush term because then-secretary of State Colin Powell had less influence in the White House, Gregg said.

Though North Korea has agreed to give up nuclear weapons, it's not clear how or when it would do that or how other nations would verify that it had done so, said David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington think tank. The first priority, Albright said, is removing the weapons-grade plutonium North Korea has amassed. His institute estimates that it is enough for five to 13 nuclear weapons.

"There may be less (to the deal) than meets the eye," said Albright, adding that the North Koreans signed the agreement to stave off pressure from China, its chief source of economic aid and trade.

DOJ_NMG_0006680

Bush Hails North Korea Nuclear Accord (FT)

By Anna Fifield And Andrew Yeh

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

President George W. Bush on Monday welcomed North Korea's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons programmes and rejoin the non-proliferation treaty but expressed reservations over whether all parties would keep to their commitments.

Mr Bush said the Korean deal was “a step forward in making this world a more secure place” but insisted “we've got to verify whether or not that happens”.

Under the deal, North Korea will receive energy aid and security guarantees in return for abandoning its weapons programmes and allowing United Nations inspectors back into the country. The US and Japan, meanwhile, will start to normalise relations with the communist stronghold.

The wide-ranging, though vague, agreement is the first breakthrough in more than two years of tortuous six-party negotiations and came just as the differences between Pyongyang and Washington seemed intractable.

The deal could breathe new life into the {nuclear non-proliferation treaty and underlines Iran's isolation as it pushes ahead with its nuclear programme.

It also served to prove that Washington and Beijing, which hosted the talks, can co-operate on issues of mutual security interest.

After 20 days of talks in the fourth round of negotiations, China's fifth draft joint statement finally won approval from Japan, Russia, the US and the two Koreas. “The process that led us to this final agreement was all six parties overcoming one mountain after another, one wall after another,” said Wu Dawei, Beijing's chief envoy.

Mr Bush said he wanted to the thank the other partners in the six-party dialogue for working together. But he added: “The question is, over time, will all parties adhere to the agreement?”

Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, made clear that the first step under the agreement was for North Korea to end its nuclear programmes.

Analysts said there were likely to be many difficulties in implementing the pact, particularly as few of the fundamental differences between Pyongyang and Washington appeared to have been bridged. Securing an agreement, given the fractious relations between the two protagonists and North Korea's defiant declaration in February that it had become a nuclear state, represents {a big diplomatic milestone.

Christopher Hill, the US's chief negotiator, said the effectiveness of the agreement, and the exact details of how North Korea would abandon its nuclear programmes, would become clear over the next few weeks.

Under the pact, North Korea vowed to abandon all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programmes, return “at an early date” to the NPT and comply with International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards. North Korea withdrew from the NPT and ordered out IAEA inspectors in 2002 after the US accused it of developing nuclear weapons, breaching the 1994 deal forged with the Clinton administration. A fifth round of talks to iron out the details including providing oil, energy aid and security guarantees to North Korea is set to be held in Beijing in early November.

N. Korea, U.S. Gave Ground To Make Deal (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Edward Cody

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The unexpected agreement by North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program, announced yesterday in Beijing, followed decisions by both the Pyongyang government and the Bush administration to compromise on positions they had clung to during nearly three years of crisis over North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

The document signed by North Korea, the United States and the other participants in the six-party nuclear disarmament talks opened the way for what all sides say will be lengthy negotiations on the actual dismantling of North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

The breakthrough accord followed a compromise proposed by China aimed at persuading both countries to sign a document of principles. The Bush administration dropped its opposition to North Korea receiving a light-water nuclear reactor in the future, a softening of its position that the demise of the North's nuclear ambitions must be "irreversible." North Korea said it would give up its nuclear weapons and all of its existing nuclear programs, would rejoin the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and would allow inspections again by the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0006681

President Bush cautiously welcomed the agreement as "a step forward in making this world a more secure place" but warned that "we expect a verifiable process."

In an immediate demonstration of the difficulty ahead, the official North Korean news agency early today quoted an unnamed Foreign Ministry spokesman as asserting that Pyongyang would not give up its weapons program until it received nuclear reactors from the United States. A State Department official shrugged off the statement, saying the focus would remain on the Beijing declaration.

The declaration came nearly three years after the Bush administration confronted the Pyongyang government with accusations of a secret uranium enrichment program, which U.S. officials said nullified a Clinton-era agreement to freeze its nuclear activities. Since then, in a separate program, North Korea is estimated by U.S. officials to have harvested enough plutonium for at least nine nuclear weapons. The North has declared it possesses nuclear arms, but no weapons tests have been detected.

Several key issues were deferred or avoided through diplomatic sleight of hand, such as the Bush administration's demand that North Korea admit the existence of the uranium project. The agreement contained no clear timeline for when the North would give up its nuclear programs, or how.

But by finally signing an agreement, North Korea took a major step toward securing international acceptance. The move, analysts said, will allow the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il, to hang on to power for the foreseeable future and will gradually open the nation to foreign investment and avoid a sudden collapse of one of the world's most isolated nations.

For the Bush administration, analysts said, the agreement was welcome at a time when the war in Iraq has lost support at home and negotiations with Iran over its nuclear programs have sputtered. In addition, the president's approval ratings are low in the wake of his administration's response to Hurricane Katrina.

"It's an all-front crisis for the Bush administration," said Kongdan Oh, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program at the Institute for Defense Analyses in Alexandria. "I think they thought, hey, North Korea is a small country and maybe we can handle it if we put it to the side for a while." But she said she did not believe North Korea would ever give up nuclear weapons, "its platinum trump card."

Surprisingly, diplomats said, the main sticking point in this round of negotiations was not persuading North Korea to make the paramount commitment to give up nuclear weapons and research. Rather, they explained, it was North Korea's side demand for a light-water reactor to produce electricity in return for giving up the other programs.

The United States adamantly opposed the demand, saying the North could not be trusted because it already had converted the Yongbyon reactor into a source of weapons-grade plutonium. The only possible outcome, U.S. negotiators said, was agreement to complete, verified abandonment of all nuclear programs.

China sought to bridge the gap, playing its leadership role as sponsor of the talks. Chinese diplomats proposed language according North Korea the right to a reactor for electricity production but implying that it could invoke that right only after dismantling its weapons program and rejoining the international nuclear inspection regime.

For two days, U.S. diplomats refused to embrace the Chinese suggestion. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, told reporters several times he was insisting that all ambiguity be removed, refusing to open the way for problems in interpretation.

During the standoff, Hill was in frequent telephone contact with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and Rice in turn discussed what to do with other senior officials in the U.S. government, said a senior U.S. diplomat involved in the negotiations, joking that their involvement could be seen as "adult supervision." As China became increasingly firm that the compromise on the table was the best bargain possible, he said, the administration finally relented on Sunday.

"We didn't want to lose the agreement over this," he explained. The decision to make a final concession was approved at the highest level of U.S. government, he added, referring to President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0006682

U.S. officials stressed that significant obstacles remained in securing the ultimate end of North Korea's programs, and they insisted that any concessions were relatively minor. The Bush administration's Korea policy has long been troubled by conflicts between officials skeptical that a diplomatic solution could be found and those eager to strike a deal. Those conflicts could reemerge in talks over implementation.

The administration envisions what one senior official described yesterday as a "very intrusive verification regime that will go well beyond what is required" by the IAEA. "It's going to be tough getting there," he said. "This is an important step, but I don't think anyone is overselling this" agreement as a major diplomatic achievement.

Bush administration officials are wary of any comparisons between this week's agreement and a failed pact reached with North Korea by the Clinton administration in 1994. That agreement called for the building of two light-water reactors.

Before expelling international inspectors in late 2002, the secretive North was reluctant to allow access for U.N. inspection teams assigned to monitor its nuclear programs under the 1994 accord. Kim's government has even restricted World Food Program officials from monitoring distribution of food aid.

The statement was signed by North Korea, the United States and the four other participants in the talks -- China, Russia, Japan and South Korea. The six-nation talks have been sponsored by China since August 2003. But they made little progress until Rice became secretary of state this year and assigned Hill, who played a key role in negotiating the Dayton accords that ended the Bosnia war.

Diplomats from the six nations recessed immediately after their signing session, promising to return to Beijing in early November to start talks in which Hill said verification procedures would be the priority. He indicated the next step would be determining how the United States and other nations can confirm that North Korea is shutting down its Yongbyon research reactor and dismantling its weapons program.

Hill, in a telephone interview as he was changing planes in Chicago, said, "Verification is a big deal that has yet to be worked out." He said the importance of the agreement was that "we got them on the record in an international deal. . . . I am not prepared to be cynical about it."

Specialists pointed out that North Korean diplomats were likely to seek immediate economic and energy aid in return for each step toward verification.

"At the moment, we still can't be sure of Kim's intentions," said Hajime Izumi, a professor at Japan's University of Shizuoka. "They have bought some time to consider seriously whether they will give up all their weapons and programs . . . but there are so many points along the road in which this process could again reach a stalemate that it's simply too early to celebrate."

U.S. officials say North Korea in an October 2002 meeting acknowledged the existence of a secret uranium enrichment program designed to become another source of weapons material. North Korea has since denied that.

Although that issue was not mentioned in the document, U.S. officials said it is covered by the pledge to dismantle "all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs" and by a separate reference to a 1992 agreement with South Korea, which prohibited uranium enrichment.

A good first step, Hill suggested, would be shutting down the Yongbyon reactor, which produces plutonium. Under the accord signed yesterday, it must be taken apart, he said, so it makes little sense to keep it running. "The time to turn it off is about now," he added.

One long-term incentive in the joint agreement was the call for the United States and Japan to "take steps to normalize relations with North Korea" if the Pyongyang government gives up its weapons program. Such a historic rapprochement could mean billions of dollars worth of economic assistance from Japan alone in belated World War II-era reparations.

U.S.-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 19 - After a tense weekend of heated debate within the Bush administration, the lead American negotiator with North Korea made one last call to Washington at noon on Monday, Beijing time, and then signed a statement of principles that committed North Korea, in black and white, to give up "all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs."

DOJ_NMG_0006683

But the negotiator, Christopher Hill, had misgivings because the vaguely worded agreement left unaddressed the date disarmament would happen, and hinted at a concession to North Korea that President Bush and his aides had long said they would never agree to: discussing at an appropriate time providing North Korea with a civilian nuclear power plant, senior administration officials said.

The plant, a light-water reactor, cannot produce fuel for nuclear bombs as efficiently as North Korea's existing nuclear plants, but would keep the country in the nuclear business.

All day Monday, Washington time, the Bush administration said the only appropriate time would be well after North Korea dismantled all its nuclear facilities and allowed highly intrusive inspections of the country. On Monday evening, less than 24 hours after the deal was signed, North Korea declared that the United States "should not even dream" that it would dismantle its nuclear weapons before it receives a new nuclear plant.

As described by senior Bush administration officials and Asian participants in the talks, Mr. Bush agreed to eventual discussions on providing a nuclear plant only after China turned over a draft of an agreement and told the Americans they had hours to decide whether to take it or leave it.

The North Koreans, dependent on China for food and oil, were unhappy but ready to sign. "They said, 'Here's the text, and we're not going to change it, and we suggest you don't walk away,' " said one senior American official at the center of the debate.

Several officials, who would not allow their names to be used because they did not want to publicly discuss Mr. Bush's political challenges, noted that Mr. Bush is tied down in Iraq, consumed by Hurricane Katrina, and headed into another standoff over Iran's nuclear program. The agreement, they said, provides him with a way to forestall, at least for now, a confrontation with another member of what he once famously termed "the axis of evil."

So after two days of debates that reached from Mr. Bush's cabin in Camp David to Condoleezza Rice's suite at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York to Tokyo, Moscow and Seoul, Mr. Bush gave the go-ahead on Sunday evening, once he had returned to the White House, to signing a preliminary accord with Kim Jong Il, a leader he has said he detests.

Had he decided to let the deal fall through, participants in the talks from several countries said, China was prepared to blame the United States for missing a chance to bring a diplomatic end to the confrontation.

The debate over signing the agreement reflected the fact that the North Koreans drove a tough bargain. The agreement has the potential to generate good will for North Korea, increase the aid it receives and possibly reduce its incentive to dismantle its nuclear programs anytime soon.

"The risk of this agreement is exactly what many hawks in Washington had warned about," said Peter Beck of the International Crisis Group in Seoul. "You reduce the sense of urgency and let people grow comfortable with the status quo."

Proponents of the deal say such fears are misplaced. They argue that the six-nation talks, involving China, Russia, South Korea and Japan as well as North Korea and the United States, exerted heavy pressure on the North to adhere to international norms.

All the benefits North Korea was promised in the agreement, including economic aid, security commitments, a possible normalization of relations with the United States, and a large infusion of electricity from South Korea, will not flow until it rejoins the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and readmits international nuclear inspectors.

In the end, participants in the discussions said, Mr. Bush decided he had little choice but to sign. He concluded several years ago that there were no acceptable military options for taking out the North's two separate nuclear programs.

Mr. Bush sounded cautious about it on Monday after a meeting in the Cabinet Room. "Now there is a way forward," he said. "They have said, in principle, that they will abandon their weapons programs. And what we have said is great, that's a wonderful step forward, but now we've got to verify whether or not that happens."

His caution may reflect the fact that the accord, the culmination of two years of difficult negotiation, still left the administration short of its goal, requiring two major concessions that will take months, maybe years, to fully resolve.

The accord makes no mention of the Bush administration's contention that North Korea has a secret, underground program to use enriched uranium to produce nuclear bomb fuel. North Korea has denied trying to produce nuclear fuel through enriched uranium, though it has acknowledged using plutonium from its nuclear reactor at Yongbyon for that purpose.

DOJ_NMG_0006684

A nuclear program that depends on enriched uranium, like the one that made Pakistan a nuclear power, is much harder to monitor than a plutonium program.

Intelligence assessments, partly based on information from Seoul, that North Korea was building a secret uranium program were the basis of the administration's declaration in 2002 that North Korea had violated the terms of a 1994 agreement with the Clinton administration to end its nuclear efforts. That began the standoff that prompted North Korea to withdraw from the nonproliferation treaty, expel international inspectors, restart its reactor at Yongbyon, and claim that it had expanded its arsenal of atomic bombs. Intelligence agencies say North Korea may now have fuel for six or eight weapons, but that is an educated guess, they concede.

Despite that history, the new agreement does not explicitly address the existence of a uranium program. North Korea still denies having one, despite growing evidence that it at least tried to develop bomb fuel that way with Pakistan's help.

A senior administration official said the uranium program was covered by the agreement because it required North Korea to dismantle all of its existing nuclear facilities, not specific plants or labs. But the accord did not require North Korea to own up to what the administration had described as its biggest deception, meaning that unless the North admits to the program in a declaration of all its nuclear facilities, inspectors would have to work to uncover the uranium program in an adversarial way down the road.

The second concession involved the North Korean demand that it receive a light-water nuclear reactor as a down payment for scrapping its weapons program.

Allowing North Korea to have a light-water reactor raises what for the Bush administration are unwelcome parallels with the 1994 Clinton administration agreement, which several administration officials, including Ms. Rice, had described as deeply flawed. The 1994 accord promised North Korea two light-water reactors in exchange for freezing its nuclear program. Construction on a site for the reactors began in the 1990's, but the reactors were never delivered. The United States said Monday that the consortium that provided those reactors would go out of business at the end of the year, meaning any new deal would have to begin from scratch.

Mr. Hill, in an interview, said that the administration "didn't want to see any mention" of providing North Korea with a light-water reactor in the statement of principles. But the Chinese included it. The United States also balked at the use of the vague term "appropriate" to describe the timing. South Korea, Russia and China were happy to accept that language, because it left open the question of when the North would receive the nuclear reactor, officials of several countries said.

To break the impasse, Ms. Rice came up with a compromise during meetings on Saturday afternoon with her South Korean and Japanese counterparts. Each country, she suggested, would issue separate statements describing their understanding of the deal, with a specificity that is not in the agreement itself. The South Koreans and Japanese went along with the idea, though South Korea, one official said, complained that it would "sour the atmosphere." Russia and China issued vaguer statements that left unclear the sequence of events.

As this unfolded over the weekend, the Chinese increased pressure on the United States to sign - or take responsibility for a breakdown in the talks.

"At one point they told us that we were totally isolated on this and that they would go to the press," and explain that the United States sank the accord, the senior administration official said.

In the end, it was not necessary. The American delegation surprised some of the other parties on Monday morning with word that it could accept the agreement, sealing a deal.

North Korea Pledges To Exchange Nukes For Other Benefits (KRT)

By Tim Johnson

Knight Ridder, September 20, 2005

BEIJING - In a turnabout that came suddenly after years of failed talks, North Korea on Monday pledged to scrap its nuclear weapons in exchange for energy, trade and security benefits and steps toward diplomatic relations with the United States and Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0006685

North Korea also said it would rejoin a global nonproliferation treaty, and let international inspectors ensure compliance. Around the region, leaders hailed the surprise agreement. South Korea's leader called it "epoch-making." A senior Chinese diplomat applauded envoys from six nations for "overcoming one mountain after another, one wall after another."

"We had a great day today," said the chief U.S. negotiator, Christopher Hill. "As you all know, it wasn't easy. But important things often don't come easily."

The pledge by North Korea, once condemned by the Bush administration as part of an "axis of evil," along with Iran and pre-war Iraq, marked an apparent turning point for the Korean Peninsula, which remains divided, heavily militarized and technically in a state of war half a century after it was engulfed in conflict.

In return for dismantling its nuclear programs, energy-starved North Korea won commitments of huge amounts of electricity from South Korea, economic cooperation from other nations and promises from Washington to "exist peacefully" with Pyongyang.

U.S. intelligence officials say North Korea harbors between six and nine nuclear weapons. As recently as last week, the North said it would build more nuclear weapons if other nations did not concede to its demand for a light-water nuclear reactor, worth $2 to $3 billion, to generate electricity. The Bush administration fears Pyongyang might sell one of its nuclear bombs to a terrorist group.

As recently as over the weekend, the talks appeared on the cusp of failure. As the clock ticked by, Hill announced that he would leave for Washington Monday afternoon. Negotiators then reached a breakthrough.

A 17-paragraph "agreement of principles" said that China, Russia, the United States, Japan and South Korea would "discuss at an appropriate time the subject of the provision of light-water reactor" to North Korea, also known as the DPRK.

"What is an appropriate time?" Hill said in a news briefing. "The appropriate time comes when the DPRK gets rid of its nuclear weapons, gets rid of its nuclear programs, comes back into the (Non-proliferation Treaty) and comes back with full (International Atomic Energy Agency) safeguards."

The breakthrough marked a major success for China, which has hosted the six-party talks since 2003, in a region that has seen growing tensions and rivalries.

Why North Korea agreed to dismantle its nuclear programs, after four failed rounds of six-party talks over two years, was not immediately clear.

A throng of journalists and cameramen waited outside the imposing North Korean Embassy in Beijing late Monday, waiting for a news conference that never materialized.

The agreement marked the first time North Korea has signed a document pledging "the verifiable denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula" since 2002, when it admitted to the United States it had broken a 1994 accord to cease development of nuclear weapons.

Acknowledging a secret weapons program, North Korea expelled International Atomic Energy Agency monitors and pulled out of a global nonproliferation regime.

In February, Pyongyang confirmed that it had developed nuclear weapons.

Envoys from China, Russia, Japan, the United States and South Korea, all parties to six-nation talks that began in 2003, signed Monday's agreement.

In exchange for North Korea agreeing to destroy its nuclear weapons and halt all nuclear programs, the other five nations promised cooperation "in the fields of energy, trade and investment." The agreement said the United States affirms it "has no nuclear weapons on the Korean Peninsula" and "has no intention to attack or invade" North Korea.

Both the United States and Japan agreed to "take steps to normalize their relations" with North Korea, but no timetable for diplomatic normalization was announced.

The six countries agreed also to discuss setting up a new multilateral security forum for Northeast Asia, separate from the six-nation talks.

Diplomats said the next round of talks, set for early November, would establish a sequence of phased actions, designed to ensure thorough action by North Korea while rewarding the nation with incentives.

DOJ_NMG_0006686

South Korean Unification Minister Chung Dong-young cited his nation's offer of two million kilowatts of electric power to the North, first made in July, along with Washington's pledge to normalize relations with Pyongyang as key to the outcome.

Washington's flexibility in moving "to normalize North Korea-U.S. relations can be viewed as an achievement of the Bush administration," Chung said in Seoul, according to the state Yonhap news agency.

In Hill's closing statement to the talks, he reaffirmed Washington's willingness to establish relations with Pyongyang but also said the United States has "serious concerns" about human rights abuses, biological and chemical weapons development, terrorism, and illicit activities by North Korea's Stalinist regime.

The U.S. signing of the agreement "should in no way be interpreted as meaning we accept all aspects of the DPRK's system, human rights situation or treatment of its people. We intend to sit down and make sure that our concerns in these areas are addressed," Hill said. Since North Korea is entering the agreement voluntarily, Hill said the United States would not push for forceful weapons inspections across the nation.

"We do not plan to go out on the landscape of the DPRK and start hunting for nuclear facilities. We expect those to be shown to us, and we expect to move quickly," Hill said. "This is absolutely in the DPRK's interest, the sooner the better, and I think they know that."

North Korea's Agreement To Scrap Its Nukes (CSM)

By Donald Kirk And Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA; AND WASHINGTON - The most protracted talks over the standoff on the Korean peninsula since the Korean War ended in 1953 concluded Monday with a facesaving "statement of principles."

North Korea agreed to give up its "existing nuclear weapons" and return to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The United States joined others at the six-party talks in expressing "respect" for North Korea's claim to "the right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy," and offering energy assistance and economic cooperation.

The agreement skirts key issues, such as the timing of concessions, that will be addressed when talks resume in November. But the deal is seen as a major victory for international diplomacy, with a pariah country opting for cooperation and assistance - and ultimately survival - over confrontation. The development, some say, could lead to steady change on the Korean peninsula.

"This is a Libya-style deal," says Joseph Cirincione, of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, referring to Libya's 2003 pledge to give up weapons of mass destruction. "North Korea realized it has more to gain economically, politically, and diplomatically by giving up its nuclear weapons program than by keeping them."

The deal is seen by some analysts as a clear victory for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's diplomatic approach over administration forces favoring a more confrontational approach.

Mohammed ElBaradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, cited the agreement as proof that "dialogue can work" - an example he indicated might apply to Iran.

The White House welcomed the accord but said Pyongyang must live up to its obligations and dismantle its nuclear programs.

President Bush, who three years ago questioned whether it was possible to verify any deal with North Korea's leader Kim Jong Il, called the North Korean commitment a "step forward" but said North Korea needed to realize "We're serious about this and that we expect there to be a verifiable process." The question, he said, is "over time, will all parties adhere to the agreement?"

Chief US negotiator Christopher Hill called on the North to shut down its main reactor complex as a sign of good faith.

The six-party agreement - coupled with a promise to discuss a suspended light-water nuclear energy project - came just a week after Mr. Hill declared that North Korea's insistence on the right to nuclear energy for peacetime purposes was "a nonstarter."

DOJ_NMG_0006687

Hill, who led the US delegation throughout the fourth round of the talks that began in Beijing in July, joined others in signing off on the statement after intense pressure from South Korea and talks with top US officials. The final statement was drafted by China, which hosted the talks beginning in February 2003.

South Korean leaders, avidly pursuing reconciliation with North Korea, were ecstatic about the statement, even as they acknowledged the need for more talks - and action - to bring about a final agreement.

The agreement comes after an extended period of softening rhetoric. Mr. Bush, in his State of the Union address in 2002, famously included North Korea in an "axis of evil," along with Iraq and Iran, and Ms. Rice in January, before she became secretary of state, identified North Korea as an "outpost of tyranny."

No such comments, however, have emanated from US officials in Washington since then, with the US making pointed statements that it respected the North's sovereignty and had no intention of attacking the country.

But contentious issues remain. In Beijing Monday, Hill expressed "serious concerns" about human rights and other issues he said must be addressed for the two countries to move beyond decades of enmity.

"The US acceptance of the joint statement should in no way be interpreted as meaning we accept all aspects of [North Korea's] system, human rights situation or treatment of its people," Hill said in a closing statement.

Still, analysts in Seoul say that Hill essentially yielded to North - and South - Korean demands in a deal that will enable North Korea to keep pressing for light water nuclear energy reactors as promised by the 1994 Geneva framework agreement under which the North gave up its program for producing nuclear warheads with plutonium.

That deal fell apart after a senior North Korean diplomat appeared to have acknowledged to Hill's predecessor, James Kelly, in 2002 the existence of a secret uranium enrichment program.

The North is expected to demand fast action on a statement of "willingness" on the part of all the parties - China, Japan, and Russia as well as South Korea and the US - to provide energy assistance.

The statement also contained another significant nod to the North - that the US and North Korea "take steps to normalize relations."

A central point of later negotiation will be the question of who does what first in terms of dismantlement or economic assistance.

Darryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association in Washington, says that while the statement does not put the issue to rest, it hints at how it will be addressed by saying "coordinated steps [will be taken] in line with commitment for commitment, action for action."

But the agreement, he adds, is only the beginning of a difficult road ahead. The accord "fails to do what the 1994 agreement framework also failed to do - and that is to really settle the issue of North Korea's insistence on light-water nuclear energy capabilities."

It essentially "kicks the issue down the road," he says. He adds that "this may be the wise way to deal with it" for now. "But it's still something - a big thing - they will need to tackle."

Diplomacy At Work (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

For years now, foreign policy insiders have pointed to North Korea as the ultimate nightmare, the ongoing worst-case scenario for an international crisis: a closed, hostile and paranoid dictatorship with an aggressive nuclear weapons program. Very few people could envision a successful outcome. And yet North Korea agreed in principle this week to dismantle its nuclear weapons program, return to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, abide by the treaty's safeguards and admit international inspectors.

Diplomacy, it seems, does work after all.

The agreement signed yesterday, if all the details can be satisfactorily filled in and then carried out, is a huge win for the United States as well as a fair deal for North Korea. Its achievement became possible when Washington abandoned the confrontational tactics and name-calling associated with its former top antiproliferation official, John Bolton, and gave serious negotiation a chance. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice deserves most of the credit for that switch, which was made with exceptional skill by America's top negotiator at the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0006688

The agreement appears to vindicate those who argued all along that North Korea wanted to end its costly diplomatic isolation and ensure the survival of its current regime, and that it was using its nuclear weapons programs as a bargaining chip. Now North Korea must follow through on its commitments. If it does, it should be accepted as a sovereign member of the international community, although no one is obliged to keep silent about its horrific human rights violations.

The biggest winner of all from yesterday's agreement may well be the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty itself. If North Korea returns to the treaty, it will bind every country in the world save India, Pakistan and Israel. The Bush administration, which has spent more than four years discounting the importance of international agreements, has rediscovered the safeguards and rewards of peaceful international diplomacy in general and this vital treaty in particular.

North Korea Agrees To Give Up Nuclear Arms (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough and Carla Anne Robbins

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

After three years of threats and stalemate, North Korea pledged to give up its atomic weapons and abandon its existing nuclear programs in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees from the U.S. and its Asian neighbors.

A final deal ending Pyongyang's atomic ambitions is a long way off. Progress will require sweeping concessions from Pyongyang, including intrusive inspections to ensure the dismantling of its facilities. It will also require important concessions from the Bush administration. As part of yesterday's preliminary agreement, the U.S. said it would forswear hostile actions against the North, eventually move toward normalizing relations and "discuss at an appropriate time" Pyongyang's demand for a light-water nuclear reactor.

On Tuesday morning in Asia, North Korea's foreign ministry issued a statement casting doubt on the country's willingness to act soon. A ministry spokesman said the U.S. "should not even dream" Pyongyang will give up its nuclear deterrent before America provides a reactor.

Washington has said before that the only appropriate time to discuss the issue is after the North has dismantled its nuclear programs and rejoined international arms-control agreements. Even then, officials say, there is no guarantee the U.S. would fund a reactor project.

The U.S. commitment to talk about light-water reactors, brokered by the Chinese, salvaged the negotiations. Until now, Washington had argued that the North might try to divert even limited technology to weapons use.

All sides' sincerity will be severely tested. A round of talks scheduled for early November will grapple with contentious questions, including getting Pyongyang to declare the extent of its atomic activities and striking a verification deal.

Notably, yesterday's declaration made no specific mention of the North's alleged uranium-enrichment efforts. Pyongyang insists that its weapons program is solely plutonium-based. The U.S. insists it also has a secret program to manufacture weapons-grade uranium -- and that, too, will have to be dismantled.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, left, shakes hands with North Korean chief negotiator Kim Kye Gwan yesterday, as South Korean Deputy Foreign Minister Song Min Soon, center, looks on.

Diplomats will also have to grapple with the timing of the North's steps versus the rewards it will reap and the intrusiveness of outside verification. A deal could founder on any of those questions.

Even a preliminary agreement is a remarkable turnaround for North Korea, which declared itself a nuclear-armed state earlier this year. A few months ago, U.S. officials were warning the North might test a weapon -- a move they feared could set off proliferation across Asia.

It also marked a shift for the Bush administration, which before the summer rejected nearly all concessions as appeasement. The change can be attributed in good part to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who embraced the diplomatic effort and empowered negotiator Christopher Hill to consider compromises.

DOJ_NMG_0006689

The deal also is an implicit acknowledgment that the U.S. has no real military options -- especially in the midst of the war in Iraq -- and little chance of persuading China and South Korea, the North's main patrons, to impose economic sanctions. The six-party talks also include Japan and Russia.

By demonstrating Washington's diplomatic bona fides, yesterday's agreement could strengthen the U.S.-European push to refer Iran's nuclear program to the United Nations Security Council for possible punishment. Still, Washington hard-liners are likely to remain skeptical. Mr. Bush responded cautiously, telling reporters, "part of the way forward is for the North Koreans to understand we're serious about this and that we expect there to be a verifiable process."

In the joint statement, the North Koreans "committed to abandoning all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs" and to return "at an early date" to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. That would mean a return of U.N. nuclear monitors. But a senior U.S. official said that Washington would insist on a far more intrusive inspection regime.

In return, the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea said they are willing to provide energy assistance and promote economic cooperation with the North. The U.S. also committed to existing "peacefully" with the North and to "take steps to normalize" relations.

The White House has been extremely critical of the Clinton administration's deal to provide Pyongyang with light-water reactors in exchange for freezing and then dismantling its plutonium-weapons program. U.S. officials were quick to point out the differences in this deal. Ms. Rice insisted even a theoretical discussion would have to await a verified dismantling of the North's entire nuclear program.

In a closing statement, however, the North's top negotiator, Kim Kye Gwan, said light-water reactors were the key to any future dialogue and that Pyongyang shouldn't have to wait.

N. Korea's Reactor Demand Could Be A Deal-Breaker (LAT)

By Barbara Demick, Mark Magnier And Sonni Efron

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

SEOUL — Less than 24 hours after diplomats announced a breakthrough pact to eliminate nuclear arms in North Korea, the isolated communist state threw cold water on the deal today, saying it would not abandon its weapons program until the United States gives it a light-water nuclear reactor.

North Korea's demand could be a deal breaker. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator at the six-nation nuclear talks, made it clear at the opening of negotiations in Beijing last week that the idea of providing North Korea with a reactor before disarmament would be a "nonstarter."

After four rounds of discussions spanning several years, the U.S., North and South Korea, Japan, Russia and China said Monday that they had agreed on a vaguely worded plan under which North Korea promised to dismantle its nuclear weapons in return for energy assistance, eventual U.S. and Japanese diplomatic recognition and a pledge by Washington that it would not attack the country.

The agreement also said the U.S. and other nations would discuss giving North Korea a light-water reactor for generating electricity, though it skirted the question of when. It said only that the possibility would be considered "at an appropriate time."

But the North Koreans made it clear today that they are in no mood to defer their reward.

In a blunt statement, North Korea's official KCNA news service warned that "the U.S. should not even dream of the issue of [North Korea's] dismantlement of its nuclear deterrent before providing" a light-water reactor, which it called "a physical guarantee for confidence-building."

Should the United States insist on the dismantling of North Korea's atomic weapons before the provision of light-water reactors, the statement said, "there will be no change in the nuclear issue."

Even though difficulties were expected to arise in the coming months as diplomats sought to iron out the details of Monday's pact, the speed with which the Pyongyang regime punctured the celebratory mood was surprising.

Late Monday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack made a terse statement about the North Korean demand, telling reporters in New York, "This is not the agreement that they signed, and we'll give them some time to reflect."

Japanese Foreign Minister Nobutaka Machimura called North Korea's demand "unacceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0006690

In Washington, experts said that although North Korea's statement did not completely annul what was achieved in Beijing, it would not help the next round of talks, scheduled for November.

"I don't think it blows up the deal. What it does is underline how difficult the process remains," said Robert J. Einhorn, who was a top player in North Korean negotiations with the Clinton administration.

Einhorn pointed out that the document signed in Beijing was only the vaguest statement of shared principles. "This wasn't a big substantive reconciliation. This was an agreement to set aside a disagreement and move ahead with the talks."

Gordon L. Flake, a North Korean specialist at the Mansfield Foundation, dismissed the KCNA statement as "normal North Korean negotiating behavior." He noted that past statements carried by the official news service proved unreliable as indicators of what North Korean leader Kim Jong Il really intended.

North Korea Hedges On Nuclear Deal (WT/AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

SEOUL -- North Korea said today that it would not dismantle its nuclear-weapons program until the United States first provides an atomic energy reactor, casting doubt on its commitment to a breakthrough agreement reached at international arms talks.

The North's Foreign Ministry made the surprise demand a day after it had agreed at six-nation talks in Beijing to give up its arms efforts.

The North insisted during arms talks that began last week in Beijing that it be given a light-water reactor, a type less easily diverted for weapons use, in exchange for abandoning nuclear weapons. The agreement reached at the talks' end yesterday in Beijing -- the first since the negotiations began in August 2003 -- said the six countries in the negotiations will discuss the reactor issue "at an appropriate time."

Both the United States and Japan, members of the six-nation disarmament talks, rejected the North's latest demand.

"This is not the agreement that they signed, and we'll give them some time to reflect," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Japanese Foreign Minister Nobutaka Machimura called the reactor demand "unacceptable."

The Beijing agreement had called for the North to abandon its arms efforts and accept inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in exchange for energy, economic and security aid.

But the North's statement today indicated that it was again raising the light-water reactor (LWR) demand as a prerequisite for disarming, rejoining the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and signing safeguards agreement with the IAEA.

"The U.S. should not even dream of the issue of [North Korea's] dismantlement of its nuclear deterrent before providing LWRs," the North's Foreign Ministry said in a statement carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

U.S. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli had emphasized earlier in Washington that the "appropriate time" for discussing the reactor meant only after the North came into compliance with the other conditions.

During the years of debate over its weapons program, the communist nation has sometimes given confusing or dramatic statements as it publicly maneuvers for negotiating leverage.

The North's latest position is likely to be a major sticking point in talks slated to begin in early November on implementing yesterday's agreement.

The North had demanded during the six-nation talks in Beijing -- involving China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas -- that it be allowed to keep a civilian nuclear program for power generation after it disarms.

But the United States strongly opposed the demand, and yesterday's agreement only acknowledged that the North had "stated" its claim to that right.

The administration of President Bush has opposed anything resembling a 1994 U.S.-North Korea agreement, which promised the North two light-water reactors for power. That project stalled amid the current crisis that broke out in late 2002 over the North's resumed nuclear-weapons program.

DOJ_NMG_0006691

The deal reached in Beijing yesterday won both praise and words of caution from Mr. Bush, who questioned whether the communist state would keep its word.

Pyongyang had said it would abandon its nuclear programs and readmit international inspectors in exchange for economic aid, energy subsidies and a promise from Washington that it was not planning to attack the North.

However, the statement of "principles" -- the product of two years of intense negotiating -- had skirted the central issue of North Korea's demand for a civil nuclear program, which Washington opposes.

In Washington, a restrained Mr. Bush called the three-page accord "a formula that we all hope works."

"They have said -- in principle -- that they will abandon their weapons programs," Mr. Bush told reporters after a meeting of his Homeland Security Council. "And what we have said is, 'Great. That's a wonderful step forward.' But now we've got to verify whether that happens."

At the United Nations, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "We will have to tackle, I'm sure, quite difficult issues of verification of the dismantlement of the North Korean nuclear-weapons programs and other nuclear programs."

U.S. intelligence agencies still know very little about North Korea's covert uranium-enrichment program. It was the disclosure of the uranium program in October 2002 that triggered the most recent crisis on the Korean Peninsula.

But the Beijing deal was hailed by China and South Korea, both of whom viewed a clash between the United States and North Korea with deep unease.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun had called the deal "epoch-making" and "a critical opportunity to resolve the North's nuclear issue."

Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia Christopher Hill, the lead U.S. negotiator at the talks, told reporters in Beijing that any talk of a new North Korean civilian nuclear-energy program would have to wait until IAEA inspectors certified that the old programs were gone.

Until then, he said, talk of a "peaceful" North nuclear program "is really to talk theory rather than facts."

In return, the statement said that the North would be given energy aid and that a "permanent peace regime" for the Korean Peninsula would be discussed "at a separate forum."

L. Gordon Flake, executive director of the Washington-based Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs, said that although verification would be critical, that the North had promised to abandon even "existing nuclear programs," was a far more sweeping concession than expected.

Diplomacy And Double Talk (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

North Korea has always been one of the sternest tests of the Bush administration's diplomacy, and in the space of 24 hours on Monday it showed why. In the morning the communist state agreed to give up its nuclear program, which the president hailed as "a wonderful first step." But by nightfall Pyongyang seemed to have changed its mind, leaving the administration with a sadly familiar lament: That's not what they told us.

The confusion was not entirely unexpected, given North Korea's history of erratic behavior. And though the Bush administration's handling of North Korea has hardly been a model of diplomacy, the president can claim some vindication for insisting on multilateral talks, instead of agreeing to one-on-one negotiations.

The administration and Pyongyang have been engaged in talks for nearly three years, and the latest round of negotiations, like the rest, included four other nations with an interest in peace and stability in the region: China, South Korea, Japan and Russia. Under a pact agreed to on Monday morning, North Korea basically agreed to end its nuclear weapons programs in exchange for economic and energy assistance. Then, on Monday night, Pyongyang said "there would be no change in the nuclear issue" — meaning it would not dismantle its programs — unless the U.S. provided it with a light-water reactor. The U.S. and Japan have rightly opposed that demand, saying that North Korea cannot be trusted to use nuclear material for peaceful purposes. The morning agreement avoided the question by saying it would be discussed "at an appropriate time."

DOJ_NMG_0006692

Both the U.S. and North Korea have had their moments of intransigence in this process, but Pyongyang has been more reliably unreasonable. That is why the Bush administration wanted to involve other nations in the talks; not only would they expose Pyongyang's paranoia to a wider audience, they would make it harder for North Korea to deny any agreement it did make.

Reaction to North Korea's pronouncement proved the value of the arrangement. Japan and South Korea both said North Korea should honor its morning commitments, as did U.S. diplomats. The evening's developments put more pressure on China to keep North Korea in line. It was the Chinese who kept both the U.S. and Pyongyang involved in the negotiations when they faltered.

Even its most ardent supporters freely acknowledged that Monday morning's agreement was more a statement of principles than a set of goals; the difficult work of applying those principles would begin at the talks in November. Those talks just got harder. But the value of the agreement is that at least the principles are now clear.

'Wonderful Step' In Korea? (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2005

North Korea's dictator, Kim Jong Il, well deserves his caricature image as an erratic crackpot bent on developing nuclear weapons. So when, on Monday, North Korea agreed to abandon its nuclear weapons and programs, and to let inspectors from the United Nation's nuclear agency return, skepticism was in order.

Has Kim changed?

Unlikely. This first tangible progress in over two years of six-party talks was thanks to the more flexible diplomacy of President Bush's second term. That diplomacy marks a departure from the confrontational stance of the first term, when Bush branded North Korea — along with Iran and Iraq — as part of an axis of evil.

Not knowing what is going on inside North Korea, at a time when one of the world's biggest challenges is to prevent terrorists from obtaining weapons of mass destruction, is dangerous. A pre-emptive military attack on North Korea is unwise and unrealistic.

That leaves diplomacy. The risk of the latest agreement, of course, is that it will send a message to North Korea — and to Iran — that bad behavior is, eventually, rewarded. But there is ample reason to take that risk.

The agreement is an example of classic diplomacy that gets matters started by putting off the most difficult issues and producing concessions on both sides. Kim agreed to scrap his nuclear programs for guarantees the United States and its allies will not attack it, and for energy supplies. But the details aren't nailed down.

The real test is whether the administration can now parlay this promise into the real deal, beginning at November talks. Bush called Monday's agreement "a wonderful step forward," but one that must be verified.

History isn't encouraging. In 1994, Pyongyang agreed to give up nuclear weapons and let in inspectors in return for energy help. But in 2002, Washington accused it of cheating. Matters spiraled downward. North Korea expelled inspectors and declared it had built nuclear weapons for self-defense.

The trick is to avoid past pitfalls. The United States has partners because of its two-year insistence on including neighbors South Korea, China, Japan and Russia in the talks.

The 1994 agreement was hailed with great optimism. Caution is more in order this time around. But the new agreement, and diplomacy, are better than none.

Progress In Beijing (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

President Bush responded cautiously to North Korea's promise yesterday to give up nuclear weapons. "That's a wonderful step forward," he said, "But now we've got to verify whether or not that happens."

That's for sure. But if it does happen, it will be a triumph for U.S. policy, removing a nasty threat to the security of the U.S. and its allies. And this time there is one important reason to believe it could work, past deceptions notwithstanding: China's vital interest in a denuclearized Korean peninsula and continued good relations with the U.S. and Japan.

China has said frequently it opposes Pyongyang's nuclear program, but it has taken its time in responding to U.S. entreaties that it apply muscle to Kim Jong Il, the North Korean dictator. Although China did not feature prominently in yesterday's communiqué from the six-party talks in Beijing, there is reason to believe it played the major role in forcing North Korea to foreswear nukes. That would vindicate Mr. Bush's insistence on six-party talks as opposed to bilateral negotiations with the North.

DOJ_NMG_0006693

In yesterday's agreement, Pyongyang "commits" to giving up its nuclear weapons program, and the U.S. expresses "respect" for Pyongyang's desire to pursue peaceful nuclear energy. The agreement leaves many important details to be worked out later. But it suggests that the signatories have more effective methods in mind for verifying compliance than relying on the International Atomic Energy Agency, which North Korea has duped in the past. China could demonstrate its sincerity by taking a major role in verification.

Yesterday's breakthrough came just a week after Mr. Bush met Chinese President Hu Jintao in New York. The U.S. has also been telling China that it could no longer tolerate the status quo and would have to start squeezing Pyongyang harder. Last week the U.S. moved against a Macau bank, Banco Delta Asia Ltd., for laundering money for North Korea, causing a bank run. We'd also note that North Korea's promise to cooperate came one week after the re-election of Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who has promised a more assertive foreign policy.

China does not want Japan to become a nuclear power, which would certainly happen if North Korea kept its nukes. Beijing's leaders also have a powerful strategic interest in continued good economic relations with the U.S. and Japan, whose investment and trade have helped fuel China's rapid economic growth. While Beijing didn't want to be seen throwing an ally over the side -- and thus didn't want to sign on to an agenda of regime change in Pyongyang -- it also doesn't want a break with the U.S.

Beijing's involvement was a key component missing from the Agreed Framework that the Clinton Administration struck with Kim Jong Il in 1994. North Korea's word by itself is worthless; it has made promises hand on heart in the past and has broken nearly every one, most recently when it kicked out U.N. inspectors and withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. China is either taking on the implicit role of inspector here or this agreement will also be impossible to verify. But if China is doing so, however quietly, it will be a major victory in the battle against WMD proliferation.

The six-party negotiators will take up the many items still to be resolved later in November. One key issue is North Korea's insistence that it has "the right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy," as yesterday's statement put it. The five other parties "expressed their respect and agreed to discuss at an appropriate time the subject of the provision of light-water reactor to the DPRK." But it looks as if that help will come only at the end of process, after the North has given up its program and (we assume) its plutonium.

The chief U.S. negotiator at the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, yesterday urged North Korea to close its main nuclear facility at Yongbyon, where it has boasted of producing warheads with plutonium. "What is the purpose of operating it at this point?" he said. "The time to shut it off would be about now." The North never did shut down Yongbyon as part of the 1994 Agreed Framework. Japan's chief envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, added that Pyongyang would have to fulfill all its pledges before the light-water issue was discussed.

No doubt some will describe this agreement as a triumph of diplomacy alone. But it would never have happened if Mr. Bush hadn't been willing to resist those -- John Kerry, Colin Powell -- who urged that the U.S. deal with the North one-on-one. And it wouldn't have happened without the U.S. willingness to squeeze the North out of its smuggling and proliferation money.

As a former U.S. President liked to say, "trust but verify." In this case, we are trusting that China will help verify that North Korea is fulfilling its pledges. If that's what plays out in coming months, Pyongyang could join Iraq, Pakistan's A.Q. Khan network and Libya on the list of anti-proliferation successes.

Accord With North Korea (WP)

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

On its face, the multinational agreement on North Korea's weapons program announced yesterday is a surprising piece of good news. For the first time, Pyongyang's brutal communist dictatorship formally agreed to "abandoning all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs," and said it would return "at an early date" to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and its accompanying international safeguards. In return, the United States agreed to take steps to normalize relations with the North and, together with South Korea, Japan, Russia and China, provide it with aid -- including at some "appropriate time" a new lightwater reactor for generating electricity. Fulfillment by the North of its commitment would mean an extraordinary breakthrough after more than a decade of failed efforts by the United States to contain one of the world's most serious proliferation threats.

DOJ_NMG_0006694

The risk, however, is also considerable: If North Korea's new promise is not a serious one, the agreement will only forestall more concerted outside pressure on the odious regime of Kim Jong Il, while sustaining and enhancing the lifeline of food and energy it receives from its neighbors. History suggests that it is that outcome, rather than genuine nuclear disarmament, that the North is betting on. In 1994, after reaching a similar deal with the Clinton administration, it froze activity at one nuclear complex but secretly launched a program to develop a bomb by other means. It was eight years before the Bush administration discovered the deceit and suspended the "agreed framework."

To comply with its latest pledge, the Kim regime would have to reveal and disassemble the unknown number of nuclear weapons that, by its own account, it possesses. It would have to dismantle both the Yongbyon reactor, which produces plutonium, and hidden uranium-enrichment facilities. But it hasn't yet admitted the existence of the uranium plants, and it's hard to conceive of an inspections process that could fully verify the disarmament of a totalitarian state that holds untold thousands of its citizens in concentration camps, earns much of its foreign income from counterfeiting and drug trafficking, and prohibits foreigners from visiting many parts of the country.

North Korea's agreement to yesterday's statement excuses it from the potential displeasure of China, which brokered the talks and supplies Pyongyang with food and energy. It allows for the continuation of rapidly improving relations with South Korea, including provision by the South of large new supplies of electricity. In accepting Mr. Kim's pledge, the Bush administration avoids looking like the obstacle to progress and keeps the diplomatic focus on the North's disarmament. For the first time in 4 1/2 years, the administration appears to be pursuing a coherent strategy, instead of veering between confrontation and negotiation amid endless internal debates. Those diplomats and opposition Democrats who have argued strenuously that a workable deal can be struck with Pyongyang will see their theory tested. We hope that it works, but also that Mr. Kim is not given much time to deliver. If he is sincere, a concrete disarmament plan could be agreed on relatively quickly. If he is not, talks that have already lasted more than two years will drag on, to the disadvantage of U.S. and global security.

Arrest Ties Pyongyang To Counterfeit $100 Bills (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

North Korea's government is producing high-quality counterfeit $100 bills and is working with criminal groups in China to sell the fake U.S. money internationally, U.S. officials say.

Some details of the production of what federal officials call "supernotes" were disclosed after arrests last month in several U.S. cities of people linked to a major Asian crime ring trafficking in fake money, arms, drugs and cigarettes.

A senior Bush administration official said one of the 10 indictments in the case contains the first disclosure of the North Korean government's role in the counterfeiting.

The indictment identifies Chao Tung Wu, a Taiwanese national in custody on charges of dealing in counterfeit bills.

He told an FBI undercover agent that "the government of a foreign country," identified only as "Country 2," is "making counterfeit U.S. currency which Wu could sell to the" agent.

Mr. Wu has pleaded not guilty to the charges, said his attorney, Debra Opri, who confirmed that federal investigators have determined that the counterfeit currency came from North Korea.

Miss Opri said Mr. Wu has denied the charges and that he was entrapped in an FBI sting. A trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 18.

A spokesman for the U.S. Secret Service, which investigates counterfeit currency violations, declined to comment on the North Korean government's link to the case. He said investigations are proceeding.

Balbina Hwang, a researcher at the Heritage Foundation, says the North Korean government has been making and circulating forged $100 bills for more than a decade.

"They produce some of the best quality supernotes," she says, adding that the North Koreans make $250 million a year from the bills.

DOJ_NMG_0006695

The British Broadcasting Corp. reported last year that North Korea is producing supernotes with a high-quality printing press known as Intaglio, similar to presses used by the United States to print its currency. The BBC said it learned of the North Korean role from a defector from Pyongyang.

The counterfeiting profits support the North Korean government's drug trafficking, money laundering and gambling, Miss Hwang says. On a strategic level, the North Koreans think that circulating supernotes will help destabilize Western economies, she says, noting that the U.S. Treasury redesigned the $100 bill in part because of North Korean counterfeiting.

China is linked to the counterfeiting by North Korean use of Chinese territory and criminal gangs, she says. The Beijing government is probably aware of the official role in North Korean counterfeiting and is not doing enough to stop it.

According to the indictment, Mr. Wu told an undercover FBI agent posing as a buyer of fake bills that he could provide $1 million in high-quality counterfeit $100 bills and arranged for the agent to telegraph a payment of $25,000 to another man, who has been charged in the case in a third country.

Mr. Wu provided the undercover agent with samples of the forged currency that he said were sent through "Country 1." A senior U.S. official identified "Country 1" as China. Fifteen sample supernotes were dispatched by Federal Express courier, along with a computer chip containing a photograph of the supernotes waiting to be sent from China. On May 5, 6,998 of the supernotes were sent in a shipping container to Long Beach, Calif., and then to the FBI agent in Pomona, Calif.

The indictment states that Mr. Wu told the agent that he gave $30,000 in supernotes to a client who took them to South America. Mr. Wu then told the agent that he was returning to China to get additional forged currency.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration last week designated the Banco Delta Asia SARL in Macau, a Chinese territory, as a "primary money-laundering concern" for its role in helping North Koreans distribute counterfeit currency and engage in illegal activities. The Treasury Department ordered the bank to be cut off from all U.S. financial transactions as a result.

A U.S. electronic intercept from late May 1997 revealed that Sean Garland, president of the Dublin-based Workers' Party, a communist political party, met Cao Xiaobing, a senior member of the International Liaison Department, Beijing's official office for supporting foreign communist parties.

The intelligence report, marked "top secret," stated that Mr. Garland was the managing director of GKG Comms International Ltd., a Dublin company, and noted that Miss Cao and the Irish communist functionary discussed "unidentified business opportunities." The report said, "Garland is suspected of being involved with counterfeiting U.S. currency, specifically, the supernote, a high-quality counterfeit $100 bill."

U.N. Nuclear Inspector Calls For Talks On Iran (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2005

The United Nations' chief nuclear inspector, Mohamed ElBaradei, said Monday that talks should replace international confrontation over Iran's nuclear activities. Negotiations proved their worth in getting North Korea to renounce its nuclear arms program, ElBaradei said.

U.S. and European diplomats resumed efforts to have Iran brought before the U.N. Security Council for sanctions, even as Russia called for a delay. The diplomats are drawing up a draft resolution to be voted on this week by the 35 nations on the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency. European Union diplomats and a U.S. official — who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitive nature of the negotiations — said China also remained opposed to referral. They said the West would probably force a vote. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she expects the Security Council to take up the matter “at some point in time.”

Tehran says its nuclear program is for production of electricity, not nuclear weapons. ElBaradei criticized both Tehran's intransigence and U.S.-European calls for Security Council involvement as examples of “confrontations and political brinkmanship.”

Al-Qaeda claims responsibility for attacks

Al-Qaeda deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri said his network carried out the London bombings July 7. The televised statement was the group's first direct claim of responsibility for the attacks that killed 56 people, including the four bombers.

DOJ_NMG_0006696

"The blessed London attack was one which al-Qaeda was honored to launch against the British Crusaders' arrogance and against the American Crusader aggression on the Islamic nation for 100 years," Zawahiri, who is in hiding, said in a videotape aired on the Arabic satellite network Al-Jazeera.

Trial opens in Jordan for accused militants

Seven suspected militants accused of recruiting jihadists to fight U.S. forces in Iraq pleaded not guilty at the opening of their trial in Amman, Jordan.

The defendants, mostly Jordanians of Palestinian origin ages 23 to 33, were detained in March and May and have been charged with plotting to undermine relations with Iraq by enlisting and dispatching at least six militants there. It was unclear whether the defendants had links to Abu-Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, which is responsible for scores of bombings, beheadings and kidnappings.

Flight attendants to stage strike in Italy

As many as 600 Alitalia flight attendants could join a one-day strike today in Italy. A 24-hour nationwide mass-transit strike set for Wednesday was called off after agreement was reached on sick pay for bus, tram and subway drivers. Alitalia said no flights to or from Milan, Rome or Naples would be canceled.

Taiwan Slammed On Lax Defense (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

A senior Pentagon official yesterday sharply criticized Taiwan's government for not moving ahead with an arms buildup to counter a mounting threat from China.

Edward Ross, a senior Pentagon security cooperation official, also suggested in a speech that the United States might not defend Taiwan in a conflict with China unless Taipei does more to boost its defenses and national will.

"As the lone superpower, our interests are plentiful and our attention short," Mr. Ross said. "We cannot help defend you if you cannot defend yourself."

With U.S. troops fighting and dying in Iraq and Afghanistan, "an increasing number of Americans are asking hard questions about how much we are willing to sacrifice -- for the security and democracy of others," Mr. Ross said.

The blunt speech, a copy of which was obtained by The Washington Times, was given at the annual U.S.-Taiwan Business Council-Defense Industry meeting in San Diego. Attendees included Huo Shou-yeh, Taiwan's vice defense minister, and other officials from the island, which is also known as the Republic of China.

Defense officials said the speech was aimed at pressing Taiwan's government to pass a proposed $15 billion special defense budget, which is stalled in the legislature by political differences.

The Bush administration in 2001 approved the sale to Taiwan of eight diesel electric submarines, 12 P-3C anti-submarine aircraft, along with 54 torpedoes, 44 Harpoon submarine-launched anti-ship missiles and additional arms.

The administration also wants Taiwan to purchase Patriot anti-missile systems to counter the more than 750 short-range Chinese missiles deployed within range of the island.

Mr. Ross said China has calculated that U.S. forces will assist Taiwan in any conflict and, as a result, is purchasing more submarines and anti-ship missiles.

The Pentagon is watching both China's military buildup and Taiwan's political stalemate over the defense budget and is making its own calculations, he said.

"We do not live in a world of absolutes," he said. "And the time of reckoning is upon us. In the end, the U.S. ability to contribute to Taiwan's defense in a crisis is going to be measured against Taiwan's ability to resist, defend and survive based on it own capabilities."

He called on Taiwan to unite and invest in a defense-modernization program that will protect its democracy and deter Chinese "aggression" across the Taiwan Strait.

DOJ_NMG_0006697

"It is time that the people of Taiwan and their elected officials understand that when it comes to defense, they, and not the United States nor any third party, are in the first instance accountable," said Mr. Ross, a director in the Pentagon's Defense Security Cooperation Agency.

Defense officials said differences within the Bush administration over Taiwan have added to the Taiwan defense problem.

Pro-China officials in the Bush administration have sent mixed signals to Taiwan's government about the need to boost defenses. As a result, Taiwan's government has been confused about the U.S. position.

China Terse About Action On Abuses Of One-Child Policy (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 19 -- China said Monday that it has dismissed and detained officials in the eastern city of Linyi for abuses committed while enforcing the country's one-child policy. But the government provided no details and said nothing about the arrest this month of an activist who had campaigned against the use of forced abortion and sterilization there.

The cabinet-level ministry responsible for managing population growth in China said in a statement that a preliminary investigation confirmed allegations that "some persons in a few counties and townships of Linyi" violated the law and the rights of local residents "while conducting family planning work.

"Currently, the responsible persons have been removed from their posts," the statement said. "Some of them are being investigated for liabilities and some have been detained."

The statement did not identify the officials or their crimes. Authorities in Linyi declined to answer questions when reached by telephone.

Jiang Tianyong, a lawyer involved in a class-action lawsuit against the Linyi officials, cast doubt on the government's statement and accused local authorities of continuing to hold Chen Guangcheng, the activist leading the lawsuit, under house arrest without due process.

Jiang said the government may have disciplined a few low-level officials but appeared to have refrained from punishing the local party leaders who ordered Chen's arrest and the population-control crackdown.

Chen, 34, had been collecting evidence that Linyi officials were requiring parents with two children to be sterilized and forcing women pregnant with a third child to have abortions. Chen, who is blind, was detained Sept. 6 in Beijing, taken back to Linyi and placed under house arrest. It is unclear if he has been charged with a crime, though police have threatened to prosecute him for "providing intelligence to foreign countries," apparently a reference to interviews he has given to The Washington Post, Time magazine and other foreign media organizations.

Last week, local police also detained two residents who helped Chen organize the lawsuit: his nephew, Chen Hua, 27, and Han Yandong, 35, a neighbor. University officials in Beijing have also threatened to fire Teng Biao, a prominent legal scholar involved in the case.

Local authorities have cut Chen's phone service, but sympathetic villagers helped him escape briefly last Wednesday. In a hurried phone interview, he accused police of roughing up his wife, and he appealed to the central government for help. But he expressed misgivings about the government's probe of his allegations, noting that investigators had not bothered to speak with him.

US Having A Hard Time Finding Allies For UN Reform (CSM)

By Tom Regan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

After a week when most of the reforms it wanted to see initiated at the United Nations were stymied or watered down, The Sunday Times of London reports that the United States wants to "come out blazing" on Monday and push for change. But it faces a new geopolitical world as it attempts to do this, according to a New York Times analysis; one where countries will ally with you on one issue, while at the same time strongly opposing you on other issues. What Bush faced from the well of the United Nations on Wednesday morning was a strange new geopolitical world, in which your allies on one issue are ganging up on you in the next room. When Bush started coalition-building after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he expected the United States to be the linchpin. But now, post-Iraq, the president is increasingly facing what might be called coalitions of the unwilling, pursuing their own interests or pushing back US goals around the world, issue by issue.

DOJ_NMG_0006698

Some of the new geopolitical partnerships that have stood in the way of US goals include India, China and Pakistan on the issue of referring Iran and its nuclear program to the UN Security Council; South Korea and China working together against the US and Japan on North Korea; and Russia and Europe on three key US issues - the Middle East, the war in Iraq, and global warming.

Meanwhile, many UN delegates said the US has not one to blame but itself for the lack of UN reform. The The Sunday Times reports that many blame US Ambassador John Bolton for demanding more than 400 changes to the reform plan at the last second, a demand that threw the whole process into question. And The Observer reports that senior diplomats say it was the US who "deliberately" derailed an attempt to craft an agreement to prevent terrorists from obtaining "weapons of mass destruction." Officials involved in the negotiations have confirmed that the Bush administration's refusal to countenance any form of disarmament blocked attempts to push measures that would prevent regimes seeking to develop a nuclear capability. It contradicts reports last week that the US had in fact been furious that plans to crack down on nuclear proliferation were stripped out of the final UN document.

However, diplomats speaking on condition of anonymity have revealed it was in fact President Bush who scuppered what the UN believed was a crucial move in helping make the world safer from the risk of terrorists obtaining a nuclear threat. Mr. Bolton, meanwhile, says he is ready to "make himself unpopular" in order to push some of the reform goals that the US would like to see in place. Of particular concern to the Americans is the UN Commission on Human Rights. United Press International reports that President Bush would like to see the commission disbanded and replaced with a smaller body "in which only countries with a good human rights record would be eligible for membership." The US is furious that countries with abusive human rights records could sit on the human rights commission and block condemnation of their actions. The New York Times reports that Bolton, despite charges that he helped undo the reform process, has won some respect for his knowledge, diligence, and negotiations during his short time at the UN. "People were very cautious, to say the least, because of his reputation as a tough guy who didn't like the UN" said Abdallah Baali, the ambassador of Algeria, who said he knew Bolton from working with him in Africa. "In fact, I was the only one who said that Bolton was an intelligent man who could be creative and constructive and wouldn't go around bullying delegations." But even while admiring his abilities, observers say that his focus on "what the United States would never accept" has "encouraged more active opposition to US positions." John Ruggie, a professor of international relations at Harvard and a former undersecretary general for planning, said he thought Bolton's approach had emboldened opponents of American priorities, like reforming the UN management structure to give more power and flexibility to the secretary-general.

"After Bolton's bombshell [the last minute request for 400 changes], they were able to make the case that this is why we have to stand firm, because if we give great discretionary authority to the secretary-general, there is a danger that the Americans will roll over him, and behind him always stands the Congress willing to withhold funding," he said. The US will get to see this week if it can still form the needed coalitions to push through its agenda, as the International Atomic Engergy Agency (IAEA) takes up the issue of Iran's nuclear program. Reuters reports that the US and Europe, who are working together on the Iranian issue, face "fierce resistance," with more than half a dozen of the 35 countries that make up the IAEA's board saying that "there is no cause for a referral" of Iran to the UN Security Council."

Sunday Iran's president declared at the UN that nuclear power was an "inalienable right" for Iran and accused the West of practicing "nuclear apartheid" by depriving it of nuclear know-how."

The U.N. Must Look For A New Secretary-General (WSJ)

By Norm Coleman

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Last week, world leaders met for what Kofi Annan described as a "once-in-a-generation opportunity to take bold decisions in the areas of development, security, human rights and reform of the United Nations." But a reading of the "outcome document" world leaders are signing shows it to be yet another missed opportunity for U.N. reform. John Bolton pushed hard to improve the document and succeeded in modifying its most objectionable clauses. But what remains falls far short of "bold."

DOJ_NMG_0006699

The document, for instance, calls for a Human Rights Council to replace the thoroughly discredited Human Rights Commission. But negotiators could not agree on the criteria for participation, leaving open the possibility that this new organ will be more of the same. In the same way, the document does not adequately address critical issues such as establishing a code of ethics, implementing sunset provisions on redundant U.N. programs or a staff buyout to eliminate the deadwood that pervades the personnel system; instead, it merely asks for a report by the secretary-general. And it leaves out entirely essential components of U.N. reform like the installation of a chief operating officer and an independent auditing board.

Instead, we have a document that advocates the implementation of the Mauritius Strategy for small island states, the Almaty Program of Action for landlocked developing countries, the Declaration and Program of Action on a Culture of Peace, and the Global Agenda for Dialogue Among Civilizations. The document, in fact, is structured around such delusions. The first half -- a full 18 pages -- is devoted to amorphous platitudes about development. The superficial treatment of reform is buried at the end. It strains credulity for an organization wracked by corruption and mismanagement to broaden the scope of its mandate when it is supposed to be engaged in self-critique. The U.N. needs to clean house, address its shortcomings and restore its ability to function efficiently and honestly before moving forward.

The problem is not a lack of awareness about the need for reform. The U.N.'s most ardent supporters and even the secretary-general himself publicly acknowledge its urgency. Of course, this is undeniable in light of the widespread abuses and scandals in activities ranging from humanitarian programs to peacekeeping. The report released by Paul Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee, exposing the corruption in the Oil For Food program and harshly criticizing the performance of the U.N. Secretariat, only provides the latest evidence.

The problem cannot be attributed to a shortage of reform ideas. To his credit, the secretary-general commissioned a high-level panel to put together a U.N. reform proposal earlier this year. Newt Gingrich and George Mitchell produced an excellent consensus document on U.N. reform. So why is the U.N. unable to reform itself? Fundamental flaws in the structure and membership of the organization make not only management reform, but also the mission of the entire organization, highly dubious.

• First, the U.N. is dominated by countries that do not have a vested financial interest in efficient organization. Just eight countries pay almost 75% of the budget. The U.S. alone contributes 22%. Common sense dictates that those who "have skin in the game," who have invested literally billions, have a greater interest in seeing their funds spent properly than those who do not make the same commitment.

• Second, the U.N. has become a jobs program for many countries. Hiring is steeped in patronage and nepotism. This partially explains the waste that pervades U.N. operations, and means that reform that might result in a leaner organization is going to be opposed from the outset. Reforms designed to curtail corruption will face a similarly uphill battle.

• Third, there is the power of regional blocs. These shut out Israel from full membership, yet accord human rights violators such as Cuba, Zimbabwe and Sudan membership on the Human Rights Commission.

• Finally, the General Assembly offers countries that have little influence outside the U.N. a rare opportunity to run the show, as it accords the same rights and privileges to dictatorships as it does democracies. In the Assembly, which will be responsible for turning summit pledges into real action, countries such as Myanmar have the same voting power as the U.S. The taste of power otherwise marginal states get has translated into an unwillingness to delegate sufficient administrative powers to the secretary-general, who ultimately must be afforded the authority to enact U.N. reform.

* * *

If the U.N. is to genuinely reform itself, it needs visionary and credible leadership. Mr. Annan, whose management failures are unambiguous, is simply too weak to muscle through an effective reform package. We should begin looking for new leadership now.

U.N. reform carries a price tag. Those who care about the U.N. can put their money where their mouths are. Mr. Annan has proposed a buyout of some of the U.N.'s entrenched bureaucracy to make way for a new cadre of the world's best and brightest. I would challenge U.N.-supporters with deep pockets, such as George Soros and Ted Turner, to make an investment in reform by helping to reinvigorate the U.N. staff.

DOJ_NMG_0006700

The good news is that this summit is not the end of the reform process. There is still opportunity to create a credible human rights body, to achieve transparency, and to develop meaningful oversight of operations. But it is still highly questionable whether this will come to fruition.

And if it does not? Too much of the debate in Congress is focused on whether failure to achieve reform should result in automatic or discretionary withholding of dues. The reality is that this failure may undermine Congress' willingness to appropriate any funding to the U.N. Dollars can easily be targeted to other international organizations dedicated to humanitarian and security efforts -- NATO, the OAS, the WHO, the Global Fund, or the Red Cross. President Bush put it best during his speech to the General Assembly: "If member countries want the United Nations to be respected . . . they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect."

Sen. Coleman is chairman of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations and a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Germany In Limbo As 2 Stake Claim To Chancellorship (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, September 20, 2005

BERLIN — "Chancellor War!" screamed the headline in Bild, Germany's largest tabloid newspaper, on Monday. "Who will govern Germany now?"

The answer is still days, if not weeks, away. Incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his opponent, Angela Merkel, both claimed victory in Sunday's parliamentary elections. Their competing claims put Germany in a political deadlock and could stall efforts to revive the torpid economy.

"An unstable government and a perpetual election campaign with an uncertain outcome is the last thing our country needs," said Hermann Franzen, the head of HDE, a retail trade association.

Merkel's party, the Christian Democratic Union, won 35.2% of the vote in Sunday's elections, compared with 34.3% for Schroeder's Social Democratic Party.

Neither side had the necessary majority in the parliament to form a government. Merkel and Schroeder scrambled to form alliances with other political parties that would put them in control.

Party leaders said they would start negotiations this week. Traditionally, Merkel's Christian Democrats have linked with the Free Democrats. Schroeder's Social Democrats have allied with the Greens. Merkel and Schroeder are trying to woo each other's ally.

A majority coalition must be in place by Oct. 18. The parliament has three chances to choose a chancellor. If it fails, President Horst Koehler can appoint a minority government or call new elections.

Merkel, a former physicist from East Germany, had held a double-digit advantage over Schroeder for months. The main editorial in the daily Sueddeutsche Zeitung called her "the woman who thought she had it all in her hands, but let it fall through her fingers."

Merkel's agenda of changes scared off many of the 5 million unemployed Germans or those worried about losing their jobs. The German economy grew 1.6% last year after two years of almost no growth.

If Merkel and Schroeder join in a "grand coalition," the resulting government would probably be too divided to push through changes to improve economic conditions. On Monday, each side said it would consider an alliance only if its candidate became chancellor.

Until the chancellor is named, little is expected to change in U.S.-German relations, which soured when Schroeder opposed the U.S.-led war in Iraq, said Jan-Friedrich Kallmorgen, founder of the Atlantic Initiative, a think tank in Berlin. If Merkel wins, "She would foster very close political and military ties with the U.S.," he said. However, Merkel said she would not send German soldiers to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0006701

The indecision weighed on financial markets. Germany's DAX stock index fell 1.2% at the close of trading Monday, and the euro dipped against the U.S. dollar.

"Whatever the color of Germany's new government will ultimately be, the pace of structural reforms is likely to be slow," Bank of America economist Holger Schmieding said.

After German Election, Deadlock Hardens (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein And Judy Dempsey

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

BERLIN, Sept. 19 - The stalemate in German politics deepened Monday, the day after an inconclusive national election result, as key party leaders rejected some of the coalition solutions that might otherwise lead to the formation of a new government and the selection of a chancellor.

Most important, the chairman of the Social Democratic Party, Franz Müntefering, confirmed that Chancellor Gerhard Schröder would refuse to enter into any coalition with the main opposition party that did not choose Mr. Schröder himself as chancellor.

This, for the moment at least, seemed to rule out a "grand coalition" between Mr. Schröder's Social Democrats and the Christian Democratic Union, the party of Mr. Schröder's main rival as chancellor, Angela Merkel. That option had been deemed the most likely outcome in the event that no party won a majority.

In that scenario, Mrs. Merkel, as leader of the party with the biggest bloc of seats in Parliament, would then become chancellor, while Mr. Schröder would step down. But both Mr. Schröder and Mr. Müntefering have ruled that out.

For her part on Monday, Mrs. Merkel said at a news conference that she had opened negotiations with other parties in an effort to form a coalition that would command a parliamentary majority.

Her first talks were with the leaders of her party's traditional coalition partner, the Free Democratic Party, even though the election left the two parties combined about a dozen seats short of a majority. That means that Mrs. Merkel still needs to find support from another party, and it was unclear where that support would come from.

One possibility was the Green Party, which is now Mr. Schröder's coalition partner. And Christian Democratic officials said Monday that talks would be held with the Greens.

"We need to speak to the Greens and the F.D.P. in the next few days," said Dieter Althaus, a Christian Democrat who is prime minister of the state of Thuringia. "What we need is the largest possible consensus. We have our own agenda. We need to conduct open talks."

The chairman of the Greens, Reinhard Bütikofer, did not rule out an agreement.

"It's the turn of the C.D.U.," he said. "They should say what they've got to say."

But the best-known Green politician, Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, when asked at a news conference if he would be willing to serve in a government headed by Mrs. Merkel, said, "Mrs. Merkel will not be chancellor." He did not elaborate on his reasons for that statement.

But by Monday, Mrs. Merkel's grip on the chancellorship did seem to be slipping, even in her own party. The Christian Democrats had not expected the poor showing on Sunday, and historically they have not tolerated failed candidates.

When she stepped onto the podium in the headquarters of the Christian Democrats, she received mild applause from staff members who had remained after late-night drinking and dining.

During past regular Monday meetings of the party's presidium, senior Christian Democratic party leaders always lingered in corridors, waiting to mix with the journalists. There were always a few premiers from the states outside Berlin who would stand not too far from the podium, as if to show support for Mrs. Merkel.

But not on this Monday. As soon as the presidium was over, the black Mercedes that had brought the state premiers to Berlin disappeared into the warm September sun.

Mrs. Merkel was left to field questions, flanked only by the spokesman for the Christian Democrats. Volker Kauder, the party's secretary general, was the only senior party official in sight.

DOJ_NMG_0006702

According to Germany's Basic Law, the newly elected Parliament has 30 days to hold its first meeting, at which presumably it would elect a chancellor. Theoretically, the main candidate is nominated by the president of the Federal Republic, but customarily the president chooses the person who has already been able to get majority support through negotiations with other parties.

Parliament then votes on the candidate. If the candidate fails to win a majority, there must be a second vote. If that vote also turns up no majority, then the president can essentially select a minority candidate to be chancellor, or he can dissolve Parliament and call for new elections.

But there has never been a case in postwar German history where it came to a third vote in Parliament.

Until Parliament chooses a chancellor, or is dissolved by the president, the former government continues in power, meaning in this instance, Mr. Schröder and his partners in the Green Party.

Even for political experts, it was difficult to predict how events might unfold from here.

"It's a power game going on right now," said Peter Lösche, a professor of political science at Göttingen University. "You don't know who's bluffing and who means what they say seriously. But sometimes strange bedfellows wake up in the morning and find themselves in a coalition."

Meanwhile, a great deal of speculation was being devoted to Mr. Schröder's aim in insisting on remaining chancellor in a coalition with the Christian Democrats, even though his party trailed in the vote.

"Yesterday, he was incredible," said Klaus von Beyme, a political science professor at Heidelberg University. He was referring to a television appearance Mr. Schröder made with Mrs. Merkel and other leaders in which he first voiced his insistence that he remain as chancellor.

One interpretation of Mr. Schröder's actions is that he is aiming ultimately at a compromise in which both he and Mrs. Merkel would step down, leaving the way for a compromise chancellor, presumably a Christian Democrat.

"I can imagine a deal in which Schröder has to withdraw and, maybe in exchange for that, the Social Democrats ask the C.D.U. to give up Merkel," Mr. Beyme said.

"The Bavarians are ready to accept such a deal," he continued, referring to the leaders of the Christian Democratic Union's sister party in Bavaria, the Christian Social Union. "And some of the C.D.U. prime ministers of the states would also accept such a deal, because they are not loyal to Merkel, who committed too many blunders and has no charisma. And normally in the C.D.U., there is a rule that somebody who fails has to leave."

Who Will Take Germany's Top Office? (CSM)

By Andreas Tzortzis

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

BERLIN - Europe's largest economy is momentarily rudderless as both incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schröder and his challenger Angela Merkel claimed Germany's top office the morning after one of the biggest election surprises in the country's recent history.

The unexpected subpar performance of Ms. Merkel's Christian Democratic Union and its sister party, the Christian Social Union, in Sunday's election gave Mr. Schröder an outside shot at staying in office after reform-shy German voters refused to give either of the major parties a clear mandate. "I'm very pessimistic about the prospect for wholesale economic reform," says Karen Donfried, senior director of the German Marshall Fund in Washington. "It's very clear that's not what Germans want."

The conservative Union parties are less than one percent ahead of Schroeder's SPD, dooming their plans to form a coalition with the pro-business Free Democrats that aimed to aggressively liberalize Germany's social market economy.

The chancellor, emboldened by the SPD's strong showing in the election's final spurt, declared that he planned to stay on as chancellor, whether at the head of a so-called grand coalition with the CDU/CSU or in another party constellation.

The confusion over who will take over at the helm of Europe's economic motor, has unsettled financial markets and business leaders and surprised European politicians. The German capital was abuzz Monday with the political fallout of a tight race which saw the pro-business Free Democrats claim a surprising 9.9 percent share of the vote, followed tightly by the Left Party, their polar opposites in the reform discussion. The Green Party finished a disappointing fifth.

DOJ_NMG_0006703

Rumors of coalition possibilities, described using the colors assigned to Germany's parties, made the rounds rapidly as both Merkel and Schröder lay claim to the chancellery.

After seven years of rule, voters had had enough of Schröder's coalition with the Green Party, the so-called red-green government. The government's popularity has been at rock bottom after welfare, health, and labor market reforms it introduced in 2003 cut significant benefits but failed to create jobs for the more than 4.7 million out of work.

But voters also weren't ready to hand over the reins to Merkel's conservatives and Free Democrats, who were planning to strip away hiring and firing laws, reduce unemployment benefits, and push through tax cuts for wealthier Germans, all in the hope of kick-starting growth and investment.

"It's a very mixed message from the voters," says Uwe Andersen, political scientist at Ruhr University. "The majority of the population is still not ready to go through with a harder reform course. On the other hand, they know that things can't go any further with the red-green coalition government."

In the coming week, Merkel, whose party still won the largest share of the vote at 35.2 percent, will begin meeting with the Greens and Schröder's SPD to decide how to proceed. The likely coalition outcome remains a so-called grand coalition, which would put the SPD and the CDU together and Merkel as Germany's next chancellor.

But Schröder doesn't see it that way. The Chancellor appeared visibly smug during a television talk show Sunday night, and his party pointed out that the CDU only has more votes than the SPD if the performance of its sister party, Bavaria's CSU is counted. Such logic would indicate that Schröder, not Merkel, should stay on as Chancellor.

Either way, the predicted political infighting has left industry heads and other European leaders doubtful the continent's largest economy is serious about turning its fortunes around any time soon.

"We won't see any steps backwards, but the tempo of reforms will slow," Holger Schmieding, an economist at Bank of America in London told Agence France Presse. "Germany won't be able to tap into its full potential. The economy is improving, it'll simply improve more slowly."

Others were less optimistic. The head of the BDI industry federation, Juergen Thumann called the results "bitterly disappointing." European politicians expressed confidence that Germany's political class would find an appropriate coalition solution, but acknowledged Germans were obviously not ready for drastic change.

"I think the Germans have responded in a way that will certainly not allow a totally liberal [economic] model to be put in place," French Defense Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie told Europe1 radio. And it's unclear how much power Merkel will wield after leading her party to one of its worst federal electoral showings in German postwar history. Political analyst Mathias Micus said the confusion surrounding who will govern the country plays perfectly into the hands of Schröder.

"Times like this need a power player like Schröder," said Mr. Micus, at the University of Mainz. "He is someone who knows how to play with all his cards, who isn't held up by party dogma and who is Machiavellian."

Germany Faces Leadership Standoff (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker and David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

BERLIN -- Germany's deadlocked election threatened to become the country's messiest postwar political crisis, as both the major parties' leaders insisted they should be chancellor, while small parties ruled out other possible coalitions aimed at forming a governing majority.

That likely means nobody can rule Germany at all unless either incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schröder or challenger Angela Merkel makes a humiliating climb-down. Otherwise, the next most likely outcome could be another election, perhaps months away -- with the danger of another inconclusive result.

As business groups warned that prolonged political uncertainty could hurt investors' and consumers' confidence in the world's third-biggest national economy, a persistent standoff looked more and more likely. A mere 35% of voters backed Mr. Schröder's center-left Social Democrats on Sunday and only 36% supported Ms. Merkel's conservative Christian Democrats, leaving both of Germany's historically dominant parties with too few seats in Parliament to govern with their usual minor-party allies.

DOJ_NMG_0006704

"Never before in Germany has there been no clear way to cobble together a government," said Josef Joffe, publisher of newspaper Die Zeit and one of Germany's top political commentators. "This is not only the worst possible outcome to the election, but the worst election outcome in the history of the Federal Republic."

An election that was widely expected to give Germany a conservative-led government, likely shifting the balance of power in European politics toward freer markets and better trans-Atlantic relations, now threatens to contribute to paralysis in the European Union. Ms. Merkel's failure to win a majority with her program of far-reaching economic overhaul could slow the pace of such restructuring across the Continent.

"Without a dynamic Germany, Europe cannot recover," EU Commission President José Manuel Barroso said yesterday, trying to urge German leaders to reach a speedy agreement and avoid spreading limbo on economic policy.

Desperate to fashion a victory, each major party is trying to woo the other's minor-party coalition partners to form a government. The courtships look likely to fail. Ms. Merkel's ally, the Free Democratic Party, reiterated its refusal to defect to Mr. Schröder. The Green party, Mr. Schröder's governing partner for the past seven years, said it saw little chance of finding common ground with Ms. Merkel's conservatives.

A bipartisan government uniting Germany's two major parties in a "grand coalition" is likely the best bet for forming a majority. Still, it confronts a basic problem: Who would be the boss?

The chancellor typically comes from the party that wins the most seats in Germany's Parliament. Right now, that would mean Ms. Merkel, by a mere three-seat margin. Mr. Schröder argues that far more Germans prefer him to Ms. Merkel, a claim based on personal approval ratings in opinion polls. Social Democrats also made the claim that they were the biggest party in Parliament, by arguing that Ms. Merkel's conservatives are really two parties, a national Christian Democrat organization and a sister party in Bavaria, though they campaign together.

In claiming he won, Mr. Schröder may have overreached. Some in his party began to say yesterday that he would have to swallow his pride and accept that he no longer would be chancellor. Mr. Schröder's bravado Sunday night and yesterday, when he repeatedly proclaimed that only he could lead a stable government, must be seen as an understandable "emotional overreaction" to the election result, said Rolf Stöckel, a Social Democrat member of Parliament.

Pundits had written off Mr. Schröder's chances before the election, but he nearly pulled level with the conservatives. He wanted to "demonstrate that the Social Democrats are not on the defensive" going into negotiations with other parties, Mr. Stöckel said.

Mr. Schröder's fate may hinge on whether Ms. Merkel's conservatives are united enough to insist on his removal from office. His insistence on keeping his job may be a gamble that he can face down Ms. Merkel if support for her within her own party crumbles, after she squandered a huge lead and gave the party one of its worst-ever results. Christian Democrats had widely thought they would win the election outright.

So far, most conservatives are standing firm behind Ms. Merkel. After a meeting of top Christian Democrats in Hanover, senior party official Friedbert Pflüger said Ms. Merkel would become chancellor -- unless Mr. Schröder clings to power through a pact with ex-communists, which Mr. Schröder has denied is an option. To shore up her position, Ms. Merkel is expected to ask a meeting of Christian Democrat members of Parliament today to re-elect her as their chairwoman.

Meantime, the most controversial figure in her campaign resigned: Paul Kirchhof, an academic advocate of flat-rate income taxes. Ms. Merkel had pegged him as her finance minister, a move that won votes for Mr. Schröder amid fear the conservatives planned taxes favoring the rich over the working class.

Many analysts expect a grand coalition to emerge, if only after weeks of haggling. Amid deep differences on major policy areas from labor laws to health care, such a bipartisan administration probably would struggle to overcome Germany's chronic problems of low economic growth and mass unemployment.

"An unstable government and endless fighting is the last thing our country needs to finally get moving," said Hermann Franzen, president of Germany's association of retailers.

The prospect is likely to chill needed foreign investment, as companies look for more stable situations for their funds. "Abroad, and especially in the U.S., the process of building a coalition is difficult to comprehend," said a statement by the American Chamber of Commerce, which represents U.S. businesses that have €110 billion invested in Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0006705

Following the election, the euro sagged 0.7% to $1.21, while Germany's DAX stock-market index fell 1.2% to 4926.13.

Many economists say individual German companies will carry on improving competitiveness even if political parties are immobilized. In the latest example of corporate restructuring, engineering giant Siemens AG announced cost cuts and layoffs at its German units. "German firms are the true reformers, not the government," said Jörg Krämer, chief economist at German bank HVB Group in Munich.

"Germany is becoming like Italy, in a bad and a good sense," Mr. Joffe said. "Any possible coalition government will be unstable, but we no longer need the government to have healthy companies."

Without a deal, the German Parliament could fail to elect any chancellor at all when it meets in late October -- and the head of state, President Horst Köhler, could be forced to dissolve it and trigger another election.

Maneuvering Begins For A New German Government (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

BERLIN, Sept. 19 -- Germany's major political parties both claimed the right on Monday to patch together a new government following inconclusive national elections, but were confronted with the likelihood of weeks of backroom deal-making before anyone is able to take control.

After their respective parties took a beating in Sunday's vote, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his chief rival, Angela Merkel, were losing their sheen as candidates to lead the country. Lawmakers and analysts tossed around various scenarios in which the country's numerous factions could settle on someone else as a compromise.

Merkel, 51, whose Christian Democrats once had a double-digit lead in opinion polls, said she would open talks with other parties -- including Schroeder's Social Democrats -- about assembling a coalition. But she insisted that her party take the lead in forging a new government by virtue of its narrow first-place finish, with about 35 percent of the vote.

"The election campaign is over, the voters have had their say and we are the strongest party in Parliament," she said at a news conference in Berlin, the capital. "We received a clear mandate to govern."

But Schroeder, 61, and the Social Democrats were having little of that. Even though Schroeder's governing coalition was toppled, his party fared better than predicted. It polled about 34 percent, an achievement that the chancellor portrayed as a virtual victory, given how he was forced to call early elections because of widespread dissatisfaction with a weak economy and record high unemployment.

Franz Muentefering, the Social Democrats' party chairman, said Schroeder deserved a third term. "Mrs. Merkel was being cheered as if she were already the chancellor," Muentefering told reporters. "But it's quite clear that this country doesn't want Mrs. Merkel. I do think it is a personal defeat for her."

Analysts said that despite the Social Democrats' posturing, Schroeder had few realistic prospects for remaining in office. But they also said Merkel had wasted a golden opportunity during the campaign and would be hard-pressed to salvage her candidacy.

"The woman who thought she had everything in her hands now feels it all slipping through her fingers," Heribert Prantl, political editor of the influential Sueddeutsche Zeitung newspaper, wrote in a signed editorial. "Seldom has such a presumed victor looked so disgraced."

Constanze Stelzenmueller, director of the Berlin office of the German Marshall Fund of the United States, agreed. "Angela Merkel may very well be a dead woman walking," she said. "My gut instinct tells me Merkel is in a very difficult position, which is why the Social Democrats are grinning so broadly. Right now, everybody is playing chicken."

The message that the electorate delivered on Sunday was a muddled one. Exit polls showed that many voters were tired of the status quo in Germany -- with its high joblessness and flaccid economy -- but were equally skeptical of the solutions offered by either Merkel or Schroeder. The result was the most splintered vote in decades.

For now, Schroeder's ruling coalition of Social Democrats and Greens will remain in charge, but only until a new alliance emerges that can cobble together a majority of the seats in Parliament. The major parties began that work in earnest on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0006706

Muentefering, for instance, indicated that the Social Democrats would put pressure on the Free Democrats -- an anti-taxation, pro-business party that received about 10 percent of the vote -- to abandon Merkel and join them in a coalition.

The leader of the Free Democrats, Guido Westerwelle, categorically rejected the overture on election night. But Muentefering said he would keep pushing. "Perhaps they were a little too overconfident about yesterday's result," he said.

Similarly, Merkel served notice that her party would try to persuade the Greens to change their stripes, giving them a chance to remain in power under the Christian Democrats, even though the two parties disagree sharply on some issues, such as nuclear energy.

Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, the most prominent Green, said he could not foresee his party marching under Merkel's banner. "She will not be chancellor," he declared. But other Green officials said they were willing to listen.

While the German constitution requires that Parliament reconvene within 30 days of an election, there is no deadline for picking a chancellor or governing majority.

Christian Pestalozza, a constitutional law professor at the Free University of Berlin, dismissed suggestions that Germany was facing a political crisis. He predicted that the parties would soon lower the rhetoric and be more pragmatic in building a coalition.

"According to the constitution, they have all the time they need to take to work this out," he said. "I'm quite sure that after two or three weeks, we'll know what we'll have."

Germany's Political Impasse May Take Weeks To Solve, Observers Say (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, September 20, 2005

BERLIN - Germany's electoral standoff moved from the inconvenient to the impossible Monday, as leaders of the country's four largest political parties spent the day primarily outlining whom they wouldn't work with in a future coalition government.

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, whose Social Democratic Party came in second in Sunday's elections, with 34 percent of the vote, insisted that he should remain Germany's leader, while backers of Christian Democrat Angela Merkel, whose party won 35 percent, said she should lead a new government.

Political observers said the impasse might take weeks to resolve, a prospect that worries economists in a nation where unemployment is 11 percent and the economy has grown only marginally for years.

"Uncertainty at a time of economic crisis is our worst-case scenario," said Manuela Glaab, the head of the University of Munich-based Center for Applied Policy Research. "We need a working government to get Germany back on track. Every responsible politician has to understand that there is no time to lose."

Investors said they feared the deadlock would slow needed economic reforms, and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barrasso urged a compromise. "Without a dynamic Germany, Europe cannot recover," he said.

Others suggested that new elections are likely. If no government is agreed on by Oct. 18, when Schroeder's current term ends, new elections could be called.

The Christian Democrats had been expected to win Sunday. But missteps by Merkel and a hard campaign by Schroeder allowed the Social Democrats to close the gap, which polls had showed at one time to be as wide as 20 points.

The Christian Democrats won about 225 seats in Parliament while the Social Democrats finished with about 222.

Christian Democrat ally the Free Democrats got 10 percent of the vote, or 61 seats, while Social Democrat ally the Green Party won 8 percent, or about 51 seats.

Parliament will have at least 598 members - the number can change, based on Germany's system of proportional representation - meaning that one party must control at least 300 seats to form a government.

Leaders for the Green Party and the Liberal Party made it clear Monday that that goal was all but unattainable.

The Green Party said it wouldn't join any coalition that the Christian Democrats led. The Liberal Party said the same about any coalition that the Social Democrats led.

All sides have rejected working with a fifth group, the New Left, made up of former communists, largely from the former East Germany. It won 54 seats.

DOJ_NMG_0006707

That leaves the possibility of a so-called "grand coalition" between the Christian Democrats and the Social Democrats. But Schroeder said Monday that he'd serve in such a coalition only as chancellor. Christian Democrats responded that they'd won more votes.

Such a coalition would be fraught with problems in any case, said Lutz Erbring, professor of communications at Free University in Berlin, as the two parties positioned themselves for dominance in the next elections.

The likely losers in such political maneuvering would be serious progress on economic reform measures, especially those aimed at creating more jobs and stabilizing government social programs.

"The reform program is not about the next few years, but being able to maintain our society for the next generation," Erbring said. "We may well lose years in the reform process, and we can't afford to lose any time."

The German stock market fell about 2 percent on the news early Monday, before recovering some to close down 1.2 percent.

German economic malaise was the theme of the campaign leading up to Sunday's balloting, and until recent weeks, Merkel and the Christian Democrats were expected to win a decisive victory over Schroeder, whose coalition has led Germany for seven years of little growth.

But many analysts said Merkel frightened German voters with calls for making it easier for small businesses to fire people and for increasing the value-added tax so that payroll taxes could be reduced for employers.

"It is clear that Germans do not want Mrs. Merkel as their chancellor," Social Democratic party chief Franz Muentefering said.

It wasn't clear, however, how Schroeder would be able to form a government, and many saw the likely delay as a disaster.

"The stalemate that emerged in the election is of course the worst result that you could have wished for, the worst for the interests of Germany and for Europe," Klaus Liebscher, a European Central Bank Governing Council member who heads Austria's central bank, said in Vienna.

Tied German Rivals Try To Forge Coalitions (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

BERLIN -- Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and conservative challenger Angela Merkel fought for their political lives yesterday after a cliffhanger election reminiscent of the Bush-Gore deadlock of 2000.

Unlike in the United States, Germany's battle over the Sunday election will be fought not in court but with backroom bargains as the rivals appeal to smaller parties in their struggle to form a government and become the next chancellor.

Failure to form a government would in effect end the political careers of Mr. Schroeder and Mrs. Merkel, said officials from their respective Social Democratic Party (SPD) and Christian Democratic Union (CDU).

The two parties yesterday issued invitations for coalition talks to each other, as well as to the pro-market Free Democratic Party (FDP) and the leftist Greens.

"I have initiated contact with [their] offices," Mrs. Merkel said, urging the center-left Social Democrats to "accept that they are not the strongest party" and to agree to a right-left "grand coalition" under her leadership.

The SPD leadership said it will talk with the CDU and its Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union (CSU), but it ruled out taking part in a Cabinet led by Mrs. Merkel.

"It is clear that Germans do not want Mrs. Merkel as their chancellor," SPD Chairman Franz Muentefering told reporters after a party meeting.

"We have a responsibility to make clear that we want to rule with Mr. Schroeder as chancellor and implement much of what we have undertaken to do," he said in reference to an economic and social reform package known as Agenda 2010.

But Mrs. Merkel said: "I do not rule out anybody revising their position."

SPD officials also challenged Mrs. Merkel's assertion that hers is the country's strongest party, having won 225 seats in the Bundestag, the parliament's lower house, against 222 for the SPD.

The Bundestag has 598 seats, but more may be added under the country's proportional representation electoral system.

DOJ_NMG_0006708

The Social Democrats argued that the CSU should be considered a separate party, even though it always has allied with the CDU in federal elections.

In addition, the election in a district in the eastern city of Dresden will not take place until Oct. 2 because of a candidate's death. That vote could provide up to four members and tip the balance, although it is unlikely that all the seats will go to the SPD, analysts said.

The CDU/CSU alliance won 35.2 percent of the vote compared with 34.3 percent for the SPD. FDP, Mrs. Merkel's preferred coalition partner, received 9.8 percent -- not enough for the two parties to form a government.

Mr. Schroeder's coalition partners, the Greens, received 8.1 percent. The new Left Party of former communists and a breakaway SPD fraction did slightly better with 8.7 percent.

Interior Minister Otto Schily, a leading Social Democrat, said he hoped the Free Democrats would join the center-left "red-green" coalition because "we have points in common." But FDP leader Guido Westerwelle rejected the overture.

The Greens were the most accommodating party yesterday. Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, the party's leader, said he would not serve in a Merkel Cabinet, but neither he nor any other party leader ruled out joining a CDU-FDP government.

"We are interested in content," the Greens' co-leader Claudia Roth told ARD television. "We are not interested just in governing. We are interested in politics."

Both the CDU and the SPD ruled out a coalition with the Left Party.

The political deadlock was not to the markets' liking yesterday. German stocks tumbled, and the euro fell to its lowest level against the dollar in seven weeks.

Euro Falls As Germany Splits After Poll Stalemate (FT)

By Bertrand Benoit

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

The euro fell to a seven-week low against the dollar on Monday after Germany's election ended in a stalemate, casting doubt over the country's ability to enact the policy changes needed to bolster faltering economic growth.

Angela Merkel, Christian Democratic Union leader, and her rival Chancellor Gerhard Schröder both claimed the right to form a government after the unprecedented poll outcome left the two parties with an almost equal number of seats in parliament.

Mr Schröder's Social Democratic party and Ms Merkel's CDU now have 30 days to form a government from a number of coalition possibilities. They would then put their choice to parliament, which would elect the new chancellor.

But fears mounted on Monday that protracted coalition talks would increase uncertainty over the pace and direction of the country's economic policy.

Economists have already interpreted the outcome of the poll as a clear rejection of Ms Merkel's reform programme.

One possibility remains a grand coaltion between the SPD and CDU but Elga Bartsch, economist at Morgan Stanley, said such an alliance would probably “lead to reform gridlock”.

The Dax 30 index of German blue chip stocks initially fell 2.2 per cent on disappointment over the poll outcome. But it later rallied on hopes German companies would continue their restructuring efforts. The index finished 1.21 per cent or 60.37 points lower at 4,926.13.

The euro fell to $1.2101 against the dollar before staging a recovery to $1.2155. But analysts said it could slip below $1.20 amid continuing uncertainty.

While a grand coalition remained a likely outcome yesterday, Mr Schröder said his party would not join a cabinet led by Ms Merkel. The SPD appears to be banking on Ms Merkel's weakened authority in her party to exact a high price for its participation in a national-unity government.

Capturing the sense of crisis, Bild led its front page on Monday with an article entitled “the war of the chancellors”.

Having gained the backing of her party's top executive, Ms Merkel will first try to outmanoeuvre Mr Schröder by seeking a “Jamaica cabinet”, a three-way alliance with the Free Democratic and Green parties, named after their respective colours of green, yellow and black for the CDU.

DOJ_NMG_0006709

The CDU leads in the race to form the next government, having gained the most votes, at 35.2 per cent against 34.2 per cent for the SPD, and the largest share of seats at 225 against 222 despite scoring one of its worst results in six decades.

Manfred Güllner, head of the Forsa polling group, said it was "theoretically possible but in practice unlikely" that a by-election in Dresden on October 2 could give the SPD three additional seats, putting it on an equal footing with the CDU.

Neither the Greens nor the FDP ruled out a Jamaica alliance. Ronald Pofalla, deputy CDU parliamentary leader, said the CDU and Greens were "not that far apart" on central economic issues. However, Joschka Fischer, Green foreign minister, poured cold water on the scenario, saying "I don't see myself sporting dreadlocks."

By contrast, a three-way cabinet under Mr Schröder appeared out of reach on Monday, after the FDP rejected the SPD's invitation to talk, describing it as "a form of stalking".

Europe's Direction Is Unclear, Much As Germany's Is After Vote (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

PARIS, Sept. 19 - Europe, weakened by the seeming collapse of its constitutional project in May, faces even more uncertainty after the election in Germany on Sunday, which left no party with a clear mandate.

"It's May 29 all over again," said Dominique Moïsi, a senior adviser at the French Institute for International Relations, referring to the date that France rejected the European Union's draft constitution, stalling a half-century of progress toward European unity.

Both Germany and France, the traditional engines of the European Union, are now consumed by domestic politics and are unlikely to provide the strong leadership needed to re-energize the bloc.

Germany may emerge with a weak coalition government from its split vote, while France has lost steam since May, leaving President Jacques Chirac largely sidelined while his would-be successors dominate the political stage.

Of course, it is too early to say what the real impact of the German elections will be. But the surprisingly narrow margin of the conservative, Angela Merkel, over Chancellor Gerhard Schröder brought anxious analysis across Europe.

At best, Europe will continue to idle while Germany sorts out who is in charge. But many commentators worry that the most ambitious European vision - a union speaking with one voice on international affairs and backed by a military capacity distinct from that of NATO - may evaporate in the meantime.

"You have this big, fuzzy Europe looking inward instead of discussing world affairs," said Anne-Marie Le Gloannec, a European relations specialist at the Center for International Studies and Research in France.

Hopes that Europe can salvage its constitutional project also grow more uncertain. A complicated effort to wrap the various treaties governing the union into a single document foundered on the French rejection of the draft constitution. Mr. Schröder's government had backed the idea of writing a shorter, simpler constitution, but that issue is one of many that are in limbo.

"In most questions, Germany won't be able to take a leadership role," Ms. Gloannec said.

Mr. Moïsi said the muddied European waters were bad for the United States, which more than ever needed a clear ally to deal with an increasingly despotic Russia, an increasingly assertive China and a recalcitrant Iran. Europe has played a central role in pressing Iran to give up a uranium enrichment program that both sides of the Atlantic fear is intended for nuclear weapons.

Europe could suffer in other ways, too. While changes in Germany's economy may yet proceed, many Europeans had also hoped that a clear mandate for Mrs. Merkel's ambitious pro-business plans would add momentum to much needed economic restructuring on the Continent.

"The message already is that Germany is attached to an economic model founded on social guarantees," said Guillaume Klossa, a professor focused on European economies at the École des Hautes Études Commerciales, one of the Continent's leading business schools. "It will slow reform in France."

Without competitive pressure from Germany, the region's largest economy, inertia could stymie efforts to revamp Europe's other sluggish socialist economies.

DOJ_NMG_0006710

The lack of European leadership is also expected to cloud talks about Turkey's membership in the union, scheduled to start Oct. 3. Mr. Schröder supports Turkey's membership, but Mrs. Merkel opposes it. Analysts say the talks are unlikely to make much progress without a clear German position.

Merkel Is The Big Loser In Germany's Elections (WSJ)

By Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

It will take some time and convoluted coalition negotiations before the world knows who won Sunday's German elections. But it's not too early to call the loser: Angela Merkel.

Putting on a brave face, she kept an appointment Monday night to speak at the opening banquet of the Frankfurt Auto Show. Before her talk, a dinner guest wished her congratulations. "There's not much to congratulate me for," she responded candidly, knowing she had frittered away a lead in the polls that had been as much as 18 percentage points and finished just shy of a percentage point ahead (35.2% to 34.3%) of a chancellor whose legacy is nearly the highest unemployment and lowest growth rates in Europe.

That was far short of what it would take to build a government with her coalition partners, and the party's second worst return ever. She then stood before the Frankfurt car crowd and delivered a dry speech on transportation policy, as if to confirm her failing political instinct. Very briefly, before talking about the Autobahn and articulated filters, she expressed regret that she didn't get the mandate she wanted for economic change, but promised she would push for it anyway. As to forming a government, she told the crowd of Germany's business elite, the core of her political support, "I can assure you that we are going to get this over as quickly as possible."

She has no other choice.

Political insiders say moving quickly to build a government is Angela Merkel's last chance of survival. Any delay will mean her political death, either by Chancellor Schroeder's hand or, just as likely, rivals within her own Christian Democratic party who have never been comfortable with the eastern German Protestant woman in a political leadership that is overwhelmingly male, western and Catholic. Indeed, there may have been method to the madness of Chancellor Schroeder's bellicose appearance on a post-election television show last night, leaving viewers shaking their heads in disbelief and prompting the Berliner Zeitung to interview a psychiatrist, who described Mr. Schroeder's outburst as an "infantile reaction." The chancellor loudly declared himself the winner, though he had lost, and that "his" Social Democrats would never join a grand coalition with Ms. Merkel.

A Social Democratic party insider said Mr. Schroeder's game plan is increasingly clear. He will plant so many obstacles to Ms. Merkel's ability to form a coalition that she is forced to throw up her hands and call for new elections. Having regained so much ground in the final weeks of the election, Mr. Schroeder believes the momentum would then be his. The men-in-waiting of the Christian Democratic party – leading provincial governors who have never favored Ms. Merkel – would likely take out their long knives and try to replace her before the next vote.

Yet what is behind Ms. Merkel's decline? And who, besides Ms. Merkel, will be this election's losers?

The truth is that Merkel's injuries have been largely self-inflicted. Germans were no less against change when they put her significantly ahead of Mr. Schroeder throughout most of the period after he called for early elections in May. They know the country is in trouble, but weren't sold that Ms. Merkel was its salvation.

German leaders traditionally have inspired trust (Konrad Adenauer, Helmut Kohl, Helmut Schmidt). They have also led through charisma (Willy Brandt). Yet Ms. Merkel neither inspired German voters nor charmed them during her campaign. It didn't help that she is a woman in a society where women have never held the country's highest political position nor its top chief executive jobs, and Christian Democratic pollsters to the end weren't sure what impact this would have on legendarily conservative German voters. Mr. Schroeder used comparisons of Ms. Merkel to Margaret Thatcher as a way to frighten voters – among whom the British leader isn't respected for how she remade her country economically but rather is seen as harsh and "unsozial."

Growth isn't as great an allure to most Germans as stability.

DOJ_NMG_0006711

Ms. Merkel's problem among German voters, however, wasn't that she was too strong. Rather, the criticism heard most often about her yesterday in the wake of her moral defeat was that she was "wishy-washy" (pronounced, in German, vishy-vahshy), that she was a purveyor of zigzag politics. It wasn't so much that Germans in such great numbers opposed reform, but rather she hadn't convinced them she could guide it.

The biggest misstep of the campaign came in how she managed her choice as top economic adviser, Paul Kirchhof, who during the campaign called for a flat tax of 25% on all incomes. Though Ms. Merkel had chosen him, she at first appeared to distance herself from Mr. Kirchhof, then support him, in the end leaving voters not quite sure how she felt about him. In the campaign's final days, she brought onto the team long-time party rival Friedrich Merz, an economic expert whose views are more palatable to most Germans. Mr. Kirchhof resigned yesterday from Ms. Merkel's shadow cabinet, the party's first sacrifice.

"She failed to project and convince," said Jeffrey Gedmin, director of the Aspen Institute Berlin. "She didn't convince voters she had the plan and the capability."

The other losers from Germany's political stalemate will be the European and world economy. In the wake of this month's election victory for Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who ran on an economic-change agenda, investors began to speak of a potential "Angela Koizumi" impact. Their argument was that the world economy has been running on just two cylinders -- the U.S. and China -- and that the two September elections could get all four cylinders pumping, as Germany could shift Europe.

"It's going to be a very unsettling period," said John Kornblum, a former U.S. ambassador to Germany who heads the Berlin office of investment bank Lazard Freres. "Business doesn't like insecurity and uncertainty."

Yet the German stock market index fell only 1.4% yesterday, and some investors are speaking of a buying opportunity. What they understand is that Germany's failing reforms have made the country a two-speed economy. Even as the German economy overall has seen slow growth, many of its companies have responded to global competition by cutting costs and become among the world's healthiest competitors. They've also lowered labor costs as individual unions, hoping to hold onto their remaining jobs, have grown more compromising. And as those German corporations build up profits, they are buying up companies in healthier economies.

Just today Deutsche Post announced it would buy British rival Excel for 3.7 billion pounds, or $6.72 billion. Early this month, the German utility company E.on confirmed a planned 10 billion pound bid for Scottish Power. It is already the owner of Powergen, the U.K.'s second largest electricity provider. Ms. Merkel is unlikely to become Germany's Maggie Thatcher, but her country's companies are investing in the more liberal economy Ms. Thatcher helped create.

Germany's companies have learned that their challenge is global and not domestic, and they will move if their country won't. It was a message that Angela Merkel tried to carry to the German voter albeit unsuccessfully, telling The Wall Street Journal early in the campaign that her country could no longer redistribute what it didn't produce. The fact that she failed to convince German voters that she could best lead them won't change the economic forces that were at the center of her message.

Colombian Violence Spills Over (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

URENA, Venezuela -- Colombian paramilitaries and Marxist guerrillas are running kidnapping, extortion and smuggling rackets as they infiltrate Urena and other communities near Venezuela's border, residents and officials say.

"There are more and more FARC in Apure and in Tachira [two western border states of Venezuela] present in the communities, and they are recruiting," said Virginia Trimarco, regional representative of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

"That makes people inside the country, and the Venezuelans, worried about security and selective killings," she said, near the end of four years of working in Venezuela and more than 20 years in Latin America.

FARC is the acronym in Spanish of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, a guerrilla army founded in 1964 by the Communist Party of Colombia.

DOJ_NMG_0006712

On the outskirts of this hot, dusty town several hundred yards from the border, Colombian refugees fleeing the violence take shelter in dusty shacks of paper and branches.

Mrs. Trimarco estimates there are about 1.5 million Colombian refugees now living on the Venezuelan side of the border. Government estimates are as high as 3 million, and nongovernmental organizations have put the number as low as 350,000.

Venezuelan cattle ranchers and a local state official -- who asked not to be named -- said the government of President Hugo Chavez turns a blind eye to FARC guerrillas operating in Venezuela, pushed to the border by the success of the U.S.-backed Plan Colombia, aimed at eradicating the cocaine trade in Colombia that funds the rebels.

Right-wing Colombian paramilitaries are not far behind them, running "protection" operations.

Restaurant owners, taxi drivers and even Colombian refugees are forced to pay what is locally known as a "vaccination" -- money to protect themselves from these armed groups.

The FARC's favorite fundraisers are kidnapping for ransom and cocaine trafficking. Venezuela is a major transshipment point for Colombian cocaine headed for the United States and elsewhere.

Illicit commerce rife

"There is arms trafficking, drug trafficking, people trafficking," said Mrs. Trimarco, one of the few officials ready to speak out about what many in these border towns will say only in private.

"The situation is slipping out of their control. Nobody wants confrontation or war, but the military are worried," she said.

Much of the violence is invisible. Villages of whitewashed houses with red-tiled roofs clinging to the sides of the Andean foothills appear idyllic, but cafes are guarded with shotguns at night and drivers head home after 11 p.m.

"As [Colombia's President Alvaro] Uribe pushes his war and illegal armed groups to the borders, they are moving over the borders, and moving their [cocaine] labs into neighboring countries," said Mrs. Trimarco.

"The border areas are heavy with conflict between the illegal armed groups fighting for turf," she said.

Venezuelan ranchers reportedly sometimes hire Colombian paramilitaries to protect themselves -- either from the FARC or from rural workers trying to invade their land. Even so, in towns like San Cristobal, there are daily kidnappings and assassinations; the local La Nacion newspaper even runs a daily kidnapping column.

More obvious is the daily gasoline-smuggling operation at popular border crossings like San Antonio de Tachira, which leads to the bustling shopping town of Cucuta in Colombia.

Hundreds of beat-up Dodges, Fords and Chevrolets from the 1970s -- the period of Venezuela's last oil boom -- make the crossing every day, carting as much as 100 extra gallons of gasoline in specially built tanks.

Gasoline in Venezuela costs about 18 cents per liter -- 72 cents a gallon -- but about 85 cents per liter -- $3.40 per gallon -- in Colombia. In addition to being a motor fuel, gasoline is also used in the processing of cocaine.

Moms, children hide

Colombian women who have survived the killings of their villages come straggling over the border with numerous children in tow. They settle in dusty shantytowns like El Cuji on the outskirts of Urena, and until they get Venezuelan papers, they are not allowed to travel more than 10 kilometers [about 6.2 miles] from the border.

Their shacks are not much more than mud and paper, sometimes just plastic bags and empty flour sacks glued together and held up on sticks above the dirt floor. Many of the children suffer from respiratory diseases and blisters from the unsanitary conditions.

Local government officials fill each family's drum with water, but it runs out fast, and families are forced to cope. The lucky ones, whose children or newfound husbands do underpaid work in small factories nearby, pool their money to buy extra water.

The UNHCR, along with Caritas and Jesuit Relief Services, two Roman Catholic charity groups, struggle with meager resources to integrate the asylum seekers into the Venezuelan community and process their claims. But many of the Colombians streaming across the border are too afraid to identify themselves.

"There is a great degree of insecurity, because of the high rate of murder and crime" all along the border, said Jenncy Penaranda, a UNHCR protection assistant. The husband of one woman seeking help was slain last month on the dirt track outside his home, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0006713

A 34-year-old mother of seven bathed her youngest child, who stood naked in a cement wash tub, using a small plastic pail to pour water over the crying child, trying to keep her children clean to prevent the diarrhea and skin diseases that plague many people here.

"I came from Colombia four years ago because of the violence," said the mother afterward, as she balanced one of a pair of twin girls on her knee while sitting on a broken chair. She asked that her name and those of her children not be used.

"I lived in a village far from the border, but my kids were in danger," she said, light brown hair blowing around her face. "They would cut off people's ears. I was so scared I could not even sleep."

One of her young sons added from behind his mother's shoulder: "And cut their tongues out." Life for this young mother and other families nearby is measurably better, she said. But the guerrillas and paramilitaries that tortured and killed their fathers, brothers and husbands have not disappeared with their move to Venezuela.

Her husband works in a furniture factory, earning the equivalent of $10 per week, barely enough for water and food for the family of nine. A teenage son manages to bring home about $2.50 a week in bolivars for working in a motorbike maintenance shop.

'Slow procedure'

"There is no safety," said the mother. "Anyone can come here and rip the wall," she said, gesturing at the burlap bags and tin roof beside her.

"We also pay the 'vaccination' here for protection," she added when the UNHCR representatives were out of earshot. "Someone comes to pick up the money."

Government commissions have dealt with 700 asylum requests in the past two years, and only 300 applicants were considered refugees, said Mrs. Trimarco in her office in Caracas.

"It is a very slow procedure, but they are slowly getting better. At this pace, we will not meet the needs," she said.

And the needs increase every day as the guerrillas and paramilitaries penetrate deeper into the border towns, not only of Venezuela, but also of neighboring Brazil and Ecuador, said Mrs. Trimarco.

Rights Report Details Uzbek Crackdown After Uprising In May (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

MOSCOW, Sept. 19 - The government of Uzbekistan, stung by the outcry in the West over its bloody suppression of a prison break and anti-government demonstration in May, has engaged for months in a ferocious crackdown against those who have tried to expose the brutality, says a report released Monday by a prominent human rights organization.

The report, by Human Rights Watch, the New York-based organization, says the crackdown included widespread arrests, threats and harassment and was directed at witnesses, survivors, human rights defenders, journalists and political workers.

The report says that some victims have been beaten and that some have been forced to issue scripted confessions on state television, saying they were misled into attending the anti-government demonstration and begging for forgiveness from President Islam A. Karimov.

While many elements of the crackdown have previously been described, including the indefinite detention of human rights workers and intense coercion against the families of refugees who fled Uzbekistan after the demonstration, the report was the most thorough description to date of the crackdown in one of the most autocratic of the former Soviet states.

It also framed the crackdown in the larger context of the unease Uzbekistan's leadership has displayed since revolutions in Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan have swept aside other corrupt and clannish post-Soviet leaders.

Mr. Karimov "fears he is the next domino," Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, said in a telephone interview. He said the crackdown was not merely an attempt to airbrush the ugliest event in recent Uzbek history, but also a program to stifle dissent and the development of civil society.

The uprising in the northeastern city of Andijon, which survivors said was smashed by fusillades of gunfire in the hours after it began on May 13, ended with the deaths of hundreds of civilians, according to survivors' accounts and previous investigations by journalists and independent organizations, including the Organization for the Security and Cooperation in Europe and Human Rights Watch.

DOJ_NMG_0006714

Uzbekistan has so far resisted Western calls for an open international investigation into the origins of the uprising and the Uzbek actions to disperse it.

Instead, it has described the uprising as the work of international Islamic terrorists. It has also shifted its foreign relations, aligning more closely with Russia and China. It has issued an eviction notice to the United States for an air base near the Afghan border that the Americans have used since 2001.

Mr. Karimov, a former Soviet bureaucrat who has ruled Uzbekistan since its independence in 1991, has also suggested that Western governments have worked surreptitiously to overthrow him and even collaborated with the possible terrorists. He further said that Western journalists had advance knowledge of the uprising, as if they, too, were agents of some foreign plot.

He has offered no proof for his accusations, and his government was silent about the report on Monday.

Telephones at the Foreign Ministry's information office in Tashkent, the Uzbek capital, were not answered or were busy, as has often been the case since May 13. When a correspondent called the Uzbek Consulate in New York and inquired about the report, the employee who answered promptly hung up.

Uzbekistan Accused Of Coercion In Protest Probe (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

MOSCOW, Sept. 19 -- The Uzbek government has detained and questioned hundreds of people in a campaign of intimidation aimed at securing testimony that backs its version of events about the killing of demonstrators in the city of Andijan in May, according to a new report by Human Rights Watch.

"Police and security agents threatened or severely beat many of those detained in order to coerce them to confess to belonging to extremist religious organizations and bearing arms while participating in the May 13 protest," the New York-based advocacy organization said in an 81-page report titled "Burying the Truth: Uzbekistan Rewrites the Story of the Andijan Massacre."

The first 15 people charged with organizing an armed revolt in Andijan were to go on trial Tuesday in the Uzbek capital, Tashkent. Prosecutors allege that the 15 were part of a broad conspiracy, financed from abroad, that was designed to overthrow the government and replace it with an Islamic state. Prosecutors said another 106 people may face similar charges.

The deputy chief prosecutor, Anvar Nabiyev, said last week that "external destructive forces" had given organizers of the revolt $300,000. He said two-thirds of it came from the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan, a group listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. government.

Human rights groups charge that government forces killed hundreds of unarmed civilians in Andijan after a day of protests that were largely driven by anger over poverty and government repression. The protests began when armed men freed 23 prominent businessmen from a local prison early on May 13; the men were on trial for alleged membership in a banned Islamic group.

The mass killing led to international demands for an independent investigation, but the Uzbek authorities rejected those calls, leading relations with the United States, among other Western countries, to sour. Uzbekistan ordered the U.S. government to remove its forces from an airfield the Pentagon was using to support operations in Afghanistan.

After the mass killing, Andijan was effectively closed to outsiders, and locals were warned not to talk about the incident. Many people were visited at home by neighborhood committees. The government announced that 187 people were killed and 287 wounded in the violence, and it said most of them were terrorists.

"It was in this atmosphere of fear that the authorities detained hundreds -- and perhaps thousands -- of people in Andijan with the purported aim of obtaining testimony about the crimes committed on May 13, as the government has defined them," Human Rights Watch said.

The government has also arrested human rights workers, journalists and political activists who attempted to investigate the killings. At least 11 activists have been detained and another 15 have been forced into exile, according to Human Rights Watch.

DOJ_NMG_0006715

One long-time activist, Saidjahon Zainbitdinov, who was widely quoted after the killings, has been in prison since May 21 on charges of terrorism and sowing panic among the population.

In Tashkent and other cities, human rights activists have been the target of "hate rallies and other public denunciations in which local community leaders vilify them, calling them Islamic extremists and enemies of the people, and mobs attempt to run them out of town," according to Human Rights Watch.

The organization called on the United States to freeze any remaining military and counterterrorism assistance to the Uzbek military and said the European Union should suspend assistance to the country. The United States and the E.U. should also stop issuing visas to senior members of the Uzbek government, the group said.

Lining Up To Be Raped? (NYT)

By Nichola D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

Our close ally President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan visited the U.S. last week and fretted aloud about a surprising problem: The "easiest way" for Pakistani women to make money is to get raped, he said, so they're lining up to be raped and thus making him look bad.

That's right. He's nuts.

"You must understand the environment in Pakistan," The Washington Post quoted him as saying. "This has become a moneymaking concern. A lot of people say if you want to go abroad and get a visa for Canada or citizenship and be a millionaire, get yourself raped."

That comment got Mr. Musharraf in hot water. So over the weekend, Mr. Musharraf denied that he had ever said any such thing - noting that if he had, he would have been "stupid."

True.

The Washington Post reviewed its tapes and reported that it had quoted him correctly. It also added an additional quote from the same interview, in which Mr. Musharraf spoke of rape as an avenue to riches: "It is the easiest way of doing it. Every second person now wants to."

Sexual violence has become a sensitive issue for Mr. Musharraf because of the pioneering work of women like Mukhtaran Bibi, whom a tribal council sentenced to be gang-raped as a way to punish her brother - and who then used her compensation money to start schools and launch a nationwide anti-rape campaign. After I wrote about her last year, Times readers sent her a total of $160,000, which she is using to start an ambulance service, operate schools and campaign for women's rights.

Fearing that Ms. Mukhtaran's anti-rape campaign would make his country look bad, General Musharraf barred her from traveling to the U.S. to attend a conference. When she protested to me and others, the government kidnapped her to keep her from complaining, releasing her only after Condi Rice raised the issue with the Pakistani government.

Then in July and August, I wrote about Dr. Shazia Khalid, a Pakistani physician whom the authorities drugged, put in a mental hospital, threatened to kill and finally exiled to keep her from recounting her rape.

The latest victim to come forward is Sonia Naz, a 23-year-old woman whose husband disappeared. Desperate, she went to the National Assembly building in Islamabad to see if she could get help. Then, she says, the police arrested her and repeatedly stripped her, raped her and beat her.

Embarrassed by these revelations, Mr. Musharraf held a conference in Pakistan this month on women's issues. He wore a necktie with blue and pink, which he said could reflect cooperation between men and women - and then he denounced Dr. Shazia.

Here in New York on Saturday, General Musharraf held a meeting with an invited audience to show himself off as a sensitive man. The meeting started awkwardly when he tried to demonstrate his feminist credentials by saying he opposed violence against women because it's unchivalrous toward the weaker sex. Then, in response to skeptical questions, Mr. Musharraf lost his temper, shouting at audience members and threatening to "get" anyone who exposed Pakistan's problems to the world.

DOJ_NMG_0006716

"He totally lost it," said Yasmeen Hassan, a Pakistani lawyer in New York who was present. "It's so unbecoming of a president to get into shouting matches, and to say, 'I'm going to get you.' "

Meanwhile, activists in Pakistan say that the government is stepping up its harassment of women's groups. I tried to phone Ms. Mukhtaran yesterday, but the government seemed to be blocking international calls to her line. Finally I was able to interview her by a circuitous route. She said that all her mail is now intercepted and that the government had just transferred away two senior police officials who had supervised her bodyguards and tried to protect her.

"I feel insecure and controlled," she said.

The irony is that while he's a nitwit on social issues, General Musharraf has proved himself to be a good economic manager, and the 7 percent growth rates generated by his reforms will help undermine fundamentalism and sexual violence in the long run. During his visit, Mr. Musharraf pressed for a free-trade area between the U.S. and Pakistan, and that's a great idea to promote Pakistan's development.

So let's give Mr. Musharraf a free-trade deal - but only on the condition that he clamp down not on Pakistani women fighting against rape, but on Osama bin Laden.

****

For more information on Mukhtaran Bibi, Shazia Khalid and other rape victims from Pakistan, visit www.4anaa.org or www.equalitynow.org.

DOJ_NMG_0006717

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Al Qaeda Suspect Tells Of Bush Plot (WP) 4
U.S. Details Charges Against Student Linked To Plot Against Bush (NYT) 4
Md. Man Charged In Terror Case (WP) 5
College Park Man Charged In Plot To Aid Terrorist Group (WT/AP) 6
U.S. Says Maryland Man Aided Pakistani Terror Group (NYT) 6
Prosecutors, Al-Arian Defense Dispute Payment (TAMPTRIB) 7
More Details: Possible Terror Plans (WCPO-TV) 8
SAFETY MEASURES QUESTIONED (NBC5CINN) 9
Man With Local Ties Ordered To Leave The U. S. (WDTN-TV) 9
Al Qaeda Admits To London Bombings (WT/AP) 9

Patriot Act:

Gag-Rule Decree Sets Off A Clash Over Patriot Act (WSJ) 10

War News:

Estimate Puts Afghan Turnout At 50% For Vote (USAT) 10
Afghan Electorate's Message: The Provinces Need Public Works And Restoration Of Order (NYT) 11
Voter Turnout At About 50 Percent (WT) 12
Is Pakistan Doing Its Part In The War On Terrorism? (USAT) 13
British Army Storms Basra Jail To Free 2 Soldiers From Arrest (NYT) 15
British Smash Into Iraqi Jail To Free 2 Detained Soldiers (WP) 16
Shiite Militia, British Soldiers Clash (LAT) 17
Reporter Working For Times Abducted And Slain In Iraq (NYT) 18
England Now To Fight Abu Ghraib Charges (AJC/AP) 19
An Honest Victory (NYT) 19
Guard Relief Hurt By Obsolete Equipment (USAT) 20
Army Abandons Plan To Borrow From Funds For Troops' Vehicles (WSJ) 21

Corporate Scandals:

Ex-Tyco Execs Receive Prison Sentences (FINDLAW/AP) 22
Former Tyco Executives Sentenced To Up To 25 Years In Prison (LAW) 22
Tyco's Kozlowski To Spend Up To 25 Years In Jail (FT) 24
Ex-Tyco Officers Get 8 To 25 Years (NYT) 24
Ex-Tyco Chiefs Whisked Off To Prison (USAT) 26
Ex-Tyco Officers Sentenced (WP) 26
Tyco Figures Will Be Jailed At Least 7 Years (WSJ) 28
Ex-Tyco Execs Face $1-a-day Pay But Could Get Bail For Appeals (USAT) 29
Tyco Endgame (WSJ) 30
The Crime And The Time (NYT) 30
In Bermuda, AIG Helped Shape A Legendary Corporate Haven (WSJ) 31

Criminal Law:

Ex-White House Aide Charged In Corruption Case (NYT) 34
Bush Official Arrested In Corruption Probe (WP) 35
Former White House Official Arrested (AJC/AP) 36
Former White House Budget Official Arrested (DMN) 37
Official, Abramoff Associate Arrested (HILL) 38
Bush Appointee Is Arrested In Obstruction Case (LAT) 38
Ex-OMB Official Hit With Charges (RC) 39
Top Federal Procurement Official Arrested (FEDTIMES) 40
Key OMB Official Arrested (GOVEXEC) 41
Recruits Sought For Porn Squad (WP) 41
U.S. Jury Signals Possible Deadlock In John A. `Junior' Gotti Mafia Case (FINDLAW/AP) 42
Three Arrested In Army Kickback Scheme (AP-Y2) 43
Three More Sentenced For Corruption (TTNJ) 43
Probe Cost County $107,000 For Lawyers (APP) 45
New Mexico Treasurer Pleads Not Guilty (AP) 49
Abu Ghraib Guard To Fight Abuse Charges (WP) 49
Oswego Mayor Allowed To Go Home, To Work While Sex Case Pending (AP) 50
Prominent Imam Sentenced To 87 Months (PHI) 51
Philly Cleric Sentenced For Corruption (AP) 51
ALI RECEIVES 7-YEAR JAIL SENTENCE (PHI) 52
Task Force Takes War On Gangs To County (TAMPTRIB) 53
European Art Thieves Busted With FBI's Help (PHI) 54
Four Face Extradition In Rembrandt Case (WP) 54
Pair Pleads Guilty In Scams (KNOXNS) 55
MAN PLEADS GUILTY TO EXTORTION CHARGES (TMT) 56
Lil' Kim Reports To Detention Center In Philadelphia (AP) 56
Psychologist Endorses Overnights Visits For Hinckley (WT) 57
Hinckley Wants Girlfriend, Psychologist Says In Court (WP) 57
Jury Selection Begins In Ex-Illinois Gov's Trial (REU-Y2) 58
Racketeering And Fraud Trial Begins For Illinois Ex-Governor (NYT) 59

Ryan Trial Off To Slow Start As Potential Jurors Are Grilled About Bias (AP) ... 60
D.C. Killing Was 'Face-to-Face,' Police Say (WP) ... 61
Missing Girl's Car Offers Leads (WT) ... 62

Civil Law:

Office Depot, Feds Settle False Claims Case (FCW) ... 63
Office Depot Pays $4.75 Mln To Settle Claims Case (REU) ... 63
FEC Sues Pro-Republican Political Group (WP/AP) ... 63
F.E.C. Sues Republican Group Over Political Contributions (NYT) ... 64
FEC Sues GOP 527 Group For Violating Finance Laws (WT) ... 65
New State Law May Nix Asbestos Cases (LAW) ... 65
Unconstitutional Cartel (WSJ) ... 67

Civil Rights:

Bipartisan Panel Recommends U.S. Election Changes (REU-Y2) ... 67
Panel Recommends Photo ID For Voters (WT) ... 68
Panel On Elections Proposes Changes (WSJ) ... 69
Reforming The Vote (WP) ... 69
Denying Access To The Ballot (NYT) ... 70
Suit Slams Voter ID Law Plaintiffs Assail Ga. Requirement As Illegal 'Poll Tax' (AJC) ... 70
Rights Groups Challenge Photo ID Law (AP) ... 71
Single-member Districts Divide Osceola's Hispanics (ORS) ... 72
Tired Of 'Being Nice,' Disabled Group Storms Hill (RC) ... 73
Flag Issue May Burn Brightly In '06 Races (HILL) ... 74

Antitrust:

More States Plan Minimum-service Real Estate Laws (INMAN). 75
MasterCard Says Millions No-touch Cards To Be Issued (REU) 76
Verizon Wireless, Records Vendor Settle (WP) ... 77
U.S. Is Close To Approving Deals Altering The Telephone Industry (WSJ) ... 78
File-Sharing Services Seek Pact With Record Studios (NYT) ... 79
Financier Weighs Visteon's Assets For Parts Venture (WSJ) ... 80
StarPoint To Buy Acclaim In Joining Of Energy Trusts (WSJ) ... 81
Norway's Norsk Hydro To Acquire Spinnaker Of U.S. For $2.45 Billion (WSJ/DJN) ... 81
Microsoft Acquires Alacris To Beef Up Software Security (WSJ) 82

Environment/Indian Affairs:

House Bill Would Limit U.S. Power To Protect Species (NYT) ... 82
Losers In Eminent Domain Case Face Hefty Fees (WT) ... 83
Alaska Natives Offer A Herd Of Reasons To Block Oil Drilling (WP) ... 84

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds: Internet Drugs Ring Cracked (PHDN) ... 85
Congress To Probe Orioles' Palmeiro (AP) ... 86
Afghan Heroin Tied To Terror (WT) ... 86
Drug Trial To Begin For Former Haitian Anti-narcotics Chief (BRAH) ... 87
194 Youths Arrested In Crackdown On Violence (TUCCIT) ... 88
Federal Judge Rules That Marshals Service Must Release Photos Of Defendants (FREEP) ... 88
Deadly Rig Blast May Have Been Criminal (NYPOST/AP) ... 88

Immigration:

Immigration Nominee's Credentials Questioned (WP) ... 89
DeLay Must Bridge Gap With Bush (HILL) ... 90

Tax:

American `Survivor' Winner Pleads Innocent To Tax Evasion (FINDLAW/AP) ... 91

Congress-Administration:

Right Rift Over Roberts (HILL) ... 91
Specter Backs U.S. Chief Justice Nominee Roberts (REU-Y2) .. 93
Roberts Seen As The Warm-Up In High Court Battle (LAW) ... 94
For '08 Dems, A Tough Choice Lies Just Ahead (HILL) ... 95
Confirm Roberts (LAT) ... 95
White House Is Said To Shift Names On List For 2nd Seat (NYT) ... 96
Diversity Changes The Way Justices See The World (USAT) ... 97
Choice Should Be Blind ... (USAT) ... 98
Cost Of Katrina Relief Splits Republican Ranks (CSM) ... 98
Deficit Foes: Defer New Drug Benefit To Offset Katrina Cost (WT) ... 99
RSC Pressing For Deep Cuts (RC) ... 100
Possible Fed Candidate Proposes Hurricane Relief Plan (REU-Y2) ... 101
If The Politicians Really Want To Help ... (LAT) ... 101
Bush Proposes Vouchers For All Displaced Students (WP) ... 102
Contractors Get Affirmative Action Exemption (NYT) ... 103
Black Clergy Wary Of Bush's Courtship (LAT) ... 104
Incompetence, Not Racism (WP) ... 105
Visions Of The New New Orleans (WP) ... 106
Can You Hear Us Now? Let Poor Americans Speak For Themselves (RC) ... 107
President Sinking In Ratings (USAT) ... 108
Some Firms Hired In Katrina's Wake Have Checkered Pasts (WSJ) ... 109
Federal Contractors Seek Liability Shields (WP) ... 110
House GOP Scraps Plan For Joint Probe On Hurricane Response (LAT) ... 111
Congress — Again — Misses The Boat (USAT) ... 111
Storm Threat Halts Returns To New Orleans (WP) ... 113
City Clears Out Again (USAT) ... 114
Mayor Suspends Flow Of People To New Orleans (NYT) ... 114
Bush Questions Reopening Of New Orleans (AJC/AP) ... 116
New Orleans Suspends Reopening Of City (AJC/AP) ... 117
New Storm Halts Reopening Of Big Easy (WT/AP) ... 118
Reopening Of Parts Of New Orleans Delayed (KRT) ... 119
New Orleans Mayor Halts Return Of City's Residents (LAT) ... 121
New Orleans Mayor Reverses Plan To Reopen Parts Of The City (WSJ) ... 122
Officials At All Levels Butt Heads Over Hurricane Relief Operations (WT) ... 122
Weary, Wary Residents Trek Back Into The City (USAT) ... 124
Rita Rages Toward Florida Keys (USAT) ... 125
Florida Keys Are Ordered Evacuated As Rita Nears (WP) ... 125

DOJ_NMG_0006719

As Its Coffers Swell, Red Cross Is Criticized On Gulf Coast Response (NYT) ... 126
Red Cross Official To Meet With Lawmakers (HILL) ... 128
From FEMA To WEMA (NYT) ... 128
Kerry, Edwards See Chance For Change After Katrina (REU-Y2) ... 129
Kerry, Edwards Criticize Bush Over Response To Hurricane (WP) ... 130
Kerry Blasts Bush On Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina (HILL) ... 131
Kerry And Edwards Say Bush's Actions Have Been A Disaster (LAT) ... 131
La. Begins Probe Into 14 Nursing Home Deaths (USAT) ... 132
Nurse Says Hospital Owner Left Her 'High And Dry' (LAT) ... 133
For Illegal Immigrants, Some Aid Is Too Risky (WP) ... 134
Dying For A Drink Of Clean Water (WP) ... 136
Cameras Headed To Court? (RC) ... 137
Senate Poised For Test Vote On Drug Reimportation (HILL) ... 138
Social Security Appears To Be DOA In Senate (RC) ... 139
Inside Politics (WT) ... 140
FDA Rethinks Women's Chief (WP) ... 142
Is FDA's New Chief Counsel A Change In Name Only? (LEGTIMES) ... 142
NASA Planning Return To Moon Within 13 Years (NYT) ... 145
NASA Aims For A Return To Moon By 2018 (Houston Chronicle) ... 146
NASA 'Vision' Sees Man On Moon, Mars (WT) ... 148
Back To Moon Via 'Apollo On Steroids' (Los Angeles Times) ... 148
A Retro Look To Next US Spacecraft (CSM) ... 149
Space Vision: The Experts Split Again (NYT) ... 150
NASA Details Plan For Craft That Will Fly To The Moon (USAT) 151
NASA Unveils $104 Billion Plan To Return To The Moon By 2018 (Washington Post) ... 152
NASA's Back-to-the-Future Plans (NYT) ... 153
Bush And The Mad Scientists (LAT) ... 154

Other News:

Wind Or Flood? Fights With Insurers Loom (USAT) ... 155
Mississippi Governor Calls Special Session (USAT) ... 157
Witness Says Researchers Warned Merck On Vioxx (WSJ) ... 158
At Vioxx Trial, Witness Says Short-Term Use Posed A Risk (NYT/BLOOM) ... 158
Oil Prices Rise As Gulf Storm Looms (WSJ) ... 159
New US Hurricane Threat Sends Energy Prices Soaring (FT) . 160
Oil Prices Spike As Storm Nears (WP) ... 160
Storm Makes Oil Cleanup Crews Uneasy (USAT) ... 161
Gas Prices Fall, But Storm Worries Push Oil Higher (USAT) ... 162
OPEC Set To Open Oil Taps Full Blast (NYT) ... 163
Fears Of New Storm Send Oil Soaring (USAT) ... 164
Shares Tumble On Worries Over New Storm And Rates (NYT/AP) ... 165
Rita Fears Drag On Stocks (WSJ) ... 165
Stock Trackers Become Master Storm Trackers (USAT) ... 166
Bond Market Signals Little Faith In Fed To Slow March Of Inflation (WSJ) ... 167
Greenspan And Katrina (WSJ) ... 168
Yes, Parallel Tracks To North, But Parallel Tracks Don't Meet (NYT) ... 168
N. Korea, U.S. Both Bend A Bit For A Deal (USAT) ... 169
Bush Hails North Korea Nuclear Accord (FT) ... 170
N. Korea, U.S. Gave Ground To Make Deal (WP) ... 171
U.S.-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open (NYT) ... 173
North Korea Pledges To Exchange Nukes For Other Benefits (KRT) ... 174
North Korea's Agreement To Scrap Its Nukes (CSM) ... 176
Diplomacy At Work (NYT) ... 177
North Korea Agrees To Give Up Nuclear Arms (WSJ) ... 177
N. Korea's Reactor Demand Could Be A Deal-Breaker (LAT) .. 178
North Korea Hedges On Nuclear Deal (WT/AP) ... 179
Diplomacy And Double Talk (LAT) ... 180
'Wonderful Step' In Korea? (USAT) ... 181
Progress In Beijing (WSJ) ... 181
Accord With North Korea (WP) ... 182
Arrest Ties Pyongyang To Counterfeit $100 Bills (WT) ... 183
U.N. Nuclear Inspector Calls For Talks On Iran (USAT) ... 184
Taiwan Slammed On Lax Defense (WT) ... 184
China Terse About Action On Abuses Of One-Child Policy (WP) 185
US Having A Hard Time Finding Allies For UN Reform (CSM). 185
The U.N. Must Look For A New Secretary-General (WSJ) ... 186
Germany In Limbo As 2 Stake Claim To Chancellorship (USAT) 188
After German Election, Deadlock Hardens (NYT) ... 188
Who Will Take Germany's Top Office? (CSM) ... 190
Germany Faces Leadership Standoff (WSJ) ... 191
Maneuvering Begins For A New German Government (WP) ... 192
Germany's Political Impasse May Take Weeks To Solve, Observers Say (KRT) ... 193
Tied German Rivals Try To Forge Coalitions (WT) ... 194
Euro Falls As Germany Splits After Poll Stalemate (FT) ... 195
Europe's Direction Is Unclear, Much As Germany's Is After Vote (NYT) ... 195
Merkel Is The Big Loser In Germany's Elections (WSJ) ... 196
Colombian Violence Spills Over (WT) ... 198
Rights Report Details Uzbek Crackdown After Uprising In May (NYT) ... 199
Uzbekistan Accused Of Coercion In Protest Probe (WP) ... 200
Lining Up To Be Raped? (NYT) ... 201

DOJ_NMG_0006720

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al Qaeda Suspect Tells Of Bush Plot (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

A Falls Church man charged with conspiring with al Qaeda to kill President Bush told Saudi interrogators that he dreamed up the plot on his own but that it never got past the "idea stage," prosecutors say in court documents unsealed yesterday.

"I wanted to be the brain, the planner" of the assassination, Ahmed Omar Abu Ali is quoted as saying. He likened himself to Mohamed Atta, who led the terror cell that carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, according to the court papers, which quote from an FBI report detailing Abu Ali's interrogation by Saudi security officials while he was detained in the kingdom in June 2003.

"My idea was . . . I would walk on the street as the President walked by, and I would get close enough to shoot him, or I would use a car bomb," Abu Ali is quoted as saying.

Abu Ali, 24, also said during the same interrogation that he "wanted to be in al Qaeda so bad that I decided to go to Afghanistan for jihad." He said he was unable to get a visa to travel there but did join an al Qaeda cell in Saudi Arabia.

The court filings were unsealed the same day as a federal judge in the District dismissed a civil lawsuit that Abu Ali's parents filed against the U.S. government last year. The lawsuit was part of a highly public campaign by Abu Ali's family to win his release from Saudi custody. It asked the court to order that Abu Ali be returned to the United States and alleged that U.S. authorities were involved in his imprisonment there and expected he would be tortured.

But U.S. District Judge John D. Bates said the issues raised by the lawsuit were moot because Abu Ali is back in the United States and in custody on the criminal charges. Bates said his ruling does not prevent the family from filing another civil suit over Abu Ali's treatment.

Morton Sklar, an attorney for Abu Ali's parents, said the civil lawsuit is not moot. "The issues of Ahmed's unlawful detention in Saudi Arabia for 20 months and his torture in Saudi Arabia are highly relevant to his criminal case," said Sklar, executive director of the World Organization for Human Rights USA, which filed the lawsuit. He would not say whether the ruling will be appealed.

Abu Ali is charged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria with conspiracy to kill Bush and other terrorism counts. Prosecutors say he has admitted to plotting with al Qaeda to conduct a Sept. 11-style terrorist attack in the United States.

Defense attorneys are also pursuing the torture allegation in the criminal case, arguing that any statements Abu Ali made while in Saudi custody were obtained through torture. Two doctors who examined Abu Ali found evidence that he was tortured in Saudi Arabia, including scars on his back consistent with having been whipped, defense attorneys have said in court papers.

Abu Ali was arrested by Saudi security officials in June 2003 while he was studying at a university in the country. He was held until he was charged in the United States in February. Prosecutors have denied that Abu Ali was tortured. The issue is critical to the case, because if a federal judge concludes that Abu Ali was tortured, much of the evidence against him could be thrown out.

In their response to Abu Ali's motion to throw out his confession and other evidence, prosecutors wrote that several Saudi security officials have already testified that Abu Ali was "treated in a respectful and humane manner while in Saudi custody." That same filing contained the additional details of Abu Ali's interrogations.

U.S. Details Charges Against Student Linked To Plot Against Bush (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - An American student in Saudi Arabia who is charged with plotting to assassinate President Bush told Saudi interrogators that "I came up with the idea on my own" because he wanted to be "the brain, the planner" for a terrorist operation, American prosecutors said in a court filing made public on Monday.

The Justice Department said the student, Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, 24, "represents one of the most dangerous terrorist threats that America faces in the perilous world after September 11, 2001: an Al Qaeda operative born and raised in the United States, trained and committed to carry out deadly attacks on American soil."

The department made the claims in opposing efforts by Mr. Abu Ali's lawyers to throw out his statements to Saudi interrogators. The defense lawyers maintain that his admissions came only after he was tortured and beaten repeatedly.

The department called the charges of torture a "fabrication." The prosecutors said that Mr. Abu Ali, after he was arrested in Saudi Arabia in 2003, was confronted with evidence of his extremist ties and "quickly launched into a prolonged and detailed confession" of his involvement with a Saudi cell linked to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Abu Ali, now in custody in Alexandria, Va., faces life in prison if convicted on charges of conspiring to assassinate Mr. Bush and attack American airliners.

Judge Gerald Bruce Lee of United States District Court also ruled Monday that the Justice Department would be allowed to offer depositions from two Saudi officials under highly unusual conditions.

The Saudi officials, who were involved in Mr. Abu Ali's interrogation, will be allowed to testify using pseudonyms via a live video feed from Saudi Arabia, with the courtroom in Alexandria closed to all but a handful of lawyers and court officials. The arrangements were necessary, Judge Lee said, because the Saudis "will not allow them to travel here to participate in judicial proceedings."

The case is a crucial test of the ability of American prosecutors to bring a case that relies heavily on intelligence gathered by foreign officials under disputed conditions.

The Justice Department's filing says that agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation first interviewed Mr. Abu Ali themselves in September 2003 for four days. Because the aim was to gather intelligence rather than build a criminal case, the agents did not read him Miranda warnings, nor did they stop questioning him once he requested a lawyer, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors sought to debunk claims of torture by quoting from telephone conversations Mr. Abu Ali had with his parents in Northern Virginia while he was in Saudi custody. "I am very healthy," prosecutors quoted him as saying.

John K. Zwerling, a lawyer who represented Mr. Abu Ali initially in the case before withdrawing, said in a telephone interview that the statements were meaningless.

"Would he want to worry them?" Mr. Zwerling asked. "And who's standing next to him when he's making these calls? The head of the prison. If he says anything else, what do you think is going to happen to him?"

Mr. Zwerling said the plots Mr. Abu Ali reportedly said he considered - like getting close enough to Mr. Bush to shoot him or breaking into the American detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and freeing prisoners - were "ludicrous."

And he ridiculed the Justice Department's claims about the danger Mr. Abu Ali posed.

"If he's the most dangerous guy they have," Mr. Zwerling said, "then we're very lucky, because I don't believe he's very dangerous at all."

Md. Man Charged In Terror Case (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Brigid Schulte, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Federal prosecutors in Alexandria unveiled terrorism charges against a Maryland man yesterday, alleging that Ali Asad Chandia helped a foreign terrorist group acquire an electronic autopilot system and video equipment for use on model airplanes.

Chandia, 28, of College Park, is also accused of shipping 50,000 paint balls to the group, Lashkar-i-Taiba, which the U.S. government has designated as a terrorist organization. The group runs terrorist camps in Pakistan and claims to have trained thousands of Islamic "holy warrior" mujahideen to fight in Afghanistan, Kashmir, Bosnia, Chechnya, Kosovo and the Philippines.

The charges against Chandia, a legal permanent resident who emigrated from Pakistan in 1994, are an outgrowth of the "Virginia jihad network" case, in which nine Muslim men have been convicted over the past two years of training overseas for holy war against the United States. The training also included playing paint ball in the Virginia countryside.

Some of the defendants attended terrorist camps in Pakistan run by Lashkar-i-Taiba.

The indictment accuses Chandia of traveling to a Lashkar office in Lahore, Pakistan, in November 2001, shortly after resigning from his job at a Costco store. "I have to leave now due to some family emergency," Chandia is alleged to have written to his supervisor at the time.

In Pakistan, he worked with other defendants to help a top Lashkar official, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, obtain equipment for the group, prosecutors allege. Khan, a British national who is jailed there on terrorism counts, was also named in the four-count indictment unsealed yesterday in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

The equipment allegedly included 50,000 paint balls and components of an MP1000SYS system, which the indictment describes as an "electronic automatic pilot system" that can be installed on a small, remote-controlled airplane using Global Positioning System cordinates.

Some of the equipment was sent by two California companies to Khan's address in England, but it was unclear if any was used by Lashkar -- or if any was intended for use in the United States.

Prosecutors would not comment beyond the indictment, which charges Chandia and Khan with providing, and conspiring to provide, material support to Lashkar-i-Taiba. If convicted, they each face up to 15 years in prison.

Federal officials arrested Chandia on Thursday night at his home in Maryland. Wearing an orange T-shirt, khakis and sneakers, he appeared briefly yesterday in federal court in Alexandria and was ordered jailed pending a detention hearing Tuesday.

His attorney, Marvin Miller, described him as a studious man and University of Maryland graduate who has written articles on both Islam and Jesus Christ. His mother and his wife, who both sat watching in the courtroom, said Chandia is a teacher at a Muslim school.

"This is a molehill case, and the government is going to have to make a mountain out of it," Miller said.

Miller said the remote-controlled airplanes -- which the indictment says can have military uses -- "don't have big ranges, certainly nothing like the drones with the satellite systems the U.S. military has."

But the indictment paints a different portrait of Chandia, saying that a 2003 search of his Maryland home found books, tapes and videos supporting "violent jihad," including one by a Lashkar leader titled "Jihad is the best defence for oppressed Muslims."

Court documents also describe Chandia as the former "personal assistant" of Ali Al-Timimi, the convicted spiritual leader of the men who trained for jihad. In 2000 and 2001, the indictment says, Chandia helped Timimi with speaking engagements, typing and "research on Islamic subjects."

Timimi was convicted this year by a federal jury of inciting his followers to attend terrorist camps abroad and prepare to battle U.S. troops. He was sentenced to life in prison in July.

Prosecutors said Timimi exerted a strong influence over the other defendants when he was the primary lecturer at the Center for Islamic Information and Education, also known as Dar Al-Arqam, in Falls Church.

Eleven Muslim men, all but one from the Washington area, were charged in 2003 with participating in paramilitary training -- including playing paint ball -- to prepare for "holy war" abroad. Two of the men were acquitted.

Chandia offered to cooperate against the other defendants but only in return for immunity from prosecution, Miller said yesterday. He said the government declined the offer.

College Park Man Charged In Plot To Aid Terrorist Group (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A College Park man has been charged with conspiracy to help a terrorist group, part of an investigation of the "Virginia jihad network" that so far has resulted in 10 convictions, U.S. law-enforcement officials said yesterday.

Ali Asad Chandia is named in a four-count indictment saying he conspired to provide material support to the Lashkar-e-Taiba group, which the U.S. designated a terrorist group in 2001.

Mr. Chandia was arrested Thursday at his home, Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said.

The indictment was returned Wednesday and unsealed yesterday after Mr. Chandia's arrest.

Mohammed Ajmal Khan of Coventry, England, who prosecutors said is a senior official in Lashkar-e-Taiba, an Islamic rebel group fighting for independence in the India-controlled portion of Kashmir, is also charged.

Mr. Khan is in custody in England.

Ali al-Timimi, who authorities called the spiritual leader of the Virginia jihad network, was sentenced to life in prison in July after being convicted of soliciting treason and other charges.

Prosecutors said al-Timimi wielded enormous influence among a group of young Muslim men in Northern Virginia who played paintball games in 2000 and 2001 in preparation for holy war around the globe.

Nine other members of the group have been convicted for their roles in the conspiracy, with prison terms ranging from three years to life.

U.S. Says Maryland Man Aided Pakistani Terror Group (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 - A Maryland man who federal authorities say served as a research assistant to a controversial Muslim leader in the Washington area has been charged with providing equipment and support to a banned terrorist group in Pakistan.

But a lawyer for the man, Ali Asad Chandia, said the charges amounted to guilt by association.

Mr. Chandia, 28, is the latest in a string of young Muslim men charged in the so-called Virginia jihad case. Ten people have been convicted in the case in connection with what federal authorities say was a plot to wage war against Americans overseas by aiding a terrorist group in Pakistan called Lashkar-e-Taiba.

Prosecutors say the young men convicted in the case underwent training - in part by playing paintball in rural Virginia - to provide military aid overseas in defense of Islam. Some Muslim leaders in Northern Virginia refer to the prosecution derisively as

DOJ_NMG_0006723

"the paintball case," insisting that the men were guilty of little more than playing games and speaking out against American foreign policy.

Mr. Chandia was arrested Thursday evening at his home in College Park, Md., the Justice Department said. A federal indictment against him says he had been a personal assistant to Ali al-Timimi, a Muslim leader and scholar in Northern Virginia who was sentenced to life in prison in July for inciting his followers to violence.

The indictment says Mr. Chandia helped Mr. Timimi schedule appearances and speaking engagements and research Islamic subjects. In a meeting on Sept. 16, 2001, at the home of another defendant in the Virginia case, Mr. Timimi reportedly told other followers that "it was compulsory to assist Afghanistan in jihad against the expected U.S. military invasion," the indictment says.

The indictment says Mr. Chandia visited Pakistan in November 2001 and, after returning to the United States, helped ship 21 boxes of paintball supplies from Virginia to Lahore, Pakistan.

The indictment also charges a man now in British custody, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, who American authorities said was a senior official with Lashkar-e-Taiba and served as a procurement officer.

Both men were charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, which was designated by the United States as a foreign terrorist organization in December 2001. Each of the four charges carries a maximum of 15 years in prison.

Mr. Chandia made a brief appearance Friday in federal court in Alexandria, Va., and is scheduled for a bail hearing on Tuesday.

His lawyer, Marvin D. Miller, declined to discuss the specific accusations against Mr. Chandia because he had not yet reviewed the indictment in detail, but he said the charges were groundless and amounted to "a great case of guilt by association."

Mr. Miller said that Mr. Chandia was held as a material witness for several weeks in 2003 in connection with the Virginia jihad case but that talks to secure his cooperation lapsed when the government refused to offer him immunity.

"The government doesn't have anything else to do, so now they're going back to a guy they had two years ago, and they'll say he's a flight risk," Mr. Miller said. "With their great skill in making innocent events look really dangerous, they take something that normally wouldn't pass the laugh test and turn it into an indictment."

In a separate terrorism investigation in Memphis, an Egyptian student at the University of Memphis was ordered held without bond Thursday after federal law enforcement officials said he had bogus credentials and had ordered $2,500 worth of pilot paraphernalia and flight instructional material over the Internet this summer.

The student, Mahmoud Maawad, 29, is charged with wire fraud and fraudulent use of a Social Security number. An assistant United States attorney, Steve Parker, described the accusations outlined in an affidavit and search warrant for Mr. Maawad's Memphis apartment as "scary," and said he was a flight risk.

A criminal complaint says Mr. Maawad used a debit card in June, July and August to order $3,300 worth of merchandise from Sporty's Pilot Shop in Batavia, Ohio.

An affidavit for a search warrant lists items including a private pilot course, flight simulator software, a flight gear bag, maps of the Memphis airport, a $239 leather Navy flight jacket, a DVD titled "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act" and instructional programs on airplane terminology.

Prosecutors, Al-Arian Defense Dispute Payment (TAMPTRIB)

By MICHAEL FECHTER

Tampa Tribune, September 20, 2005

TAMPA - In a trial in which "shirts" and "magazines" are considered coded references to money, talk about "books" just may be talk about books, a defense attorney said Monday.

FBI agent Ed Ortega acknowledged a secretly recorded telephone call about a 2003 money transfer to the Middle East did reference books for defendant Sameeh Hammoudeh.

Hammoudeh is one of four men, including former University of South Florida professor Sami Al-Arian, charged with conspiracy to commit racketeering and to provide material support to terrorists. Last week, Ortega detailed a series of money transfers defendant Hatim Fariz sent to a charity that prosecutors say is part of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group.

Ortega's testimony showed the defendants discussing money, then arranging to send it through a Chicago financial services office.

Under questioning by defense attorney Stephen Bernstein, Ortega acknowledged he doesn't read or speak Arabic and did not check to see whether Hammoudeh or other defendants ever received books mentioned in a call with Hammoudeh's father in the West Bank. After Hammoudeh's father indicated he had not received an anticipated $1,000 transfer, the men talked about a specific author and whether Sameeh Hammoudeh needed copies of the Koran.

DOJ_NMG_0006724

Later, defense attorney Kevin Beck, who represents Fariz, picked up on Bernstein's point. Ortega said he didn't know whether the conversation, in fact, was about books.

"Sir, how do you know they are not?" Beck fired back.

Other calls preceding money transfers discussed buying an ambulance for a Gaza hospital and supporting a charity for blind women.

The money was not sent directly to those outlets. Rather, most of it went to the Elehssan Society, considered an arm of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad that operates in the West Bank and Gaza. Agents found printouts of a Web page from the society when they searched Fariz's home after his 2003 arrest.

Beck emphasized the society's self description as a cultural and charitable and athletic club established in 1998. It even had a theater troupe called Al Noor, Beck said, reading from the document.

But federal prosecutor Alexis Collins twice pointed to a play performed by that troupe, called "Children rushing toward martyrdom."

She also pointed to the Elehssan Society's report that the troupe performed for Hamas leader Ahmed Yassin and an Islamic Jihad leader named Abdullah Al-Shami.

Meanwhile, defense attorneys are fighting government plans to recall two computer experts to introduce evidence from an Islamic Jihad Web site called Qudsway .com. Assistant U.S. Attorney Terry Zitek said the FBI experts discovered new information after testifying in June.

The evidence shows Salah Abu Hassanein, the recipient of many money transfers from Fariz, used the Web page to communicate with Fariz and others.

Agents also have determined that the Web site is based in Tehran, Iran, a country that provides the Islamic Jihad with the bulk of its funding.

Allison Guagliardo, another of Fariz's attorneys, argued that the evidence is coming too late for the defense to prepare adequately. Their computer expert estimates needing four to six weeks to analyze the new material.

"At this point," she said, "it's way too late in the game for us to be able to deal with this," she said.

She added that information from Web sites constitutes hearsay and cannot pass legal hurdles. Moody deferred ruling on the motion until he receives more specific information from the defense experts. WHAT HAPPENED

Prosecutors and defense attorneys offer varying interpretations of money the defendants sent to a Palestinian charity from 2001-03.

More Details: Possible Terror Plans (WCPO-TV)

By Lance Barry

WCPO-TV, September 20, 2005

There is new information on an Egyptian college student being held under suspicions of terrorism in Tennessee.

As 9News first reported on Sunday, it was a tip from a Batavia business that led the feds to the suspect who is illegally in the country.

On Monday 9News obtained the receipts for the items the suspect tried to purchase this summer from Sporty's Pilot Shop. His credit card was denied, which prompted the investigation.

9News uncovered items that seem to point to a far more extensive interest in aviation than first thought.

At fifteen pages and more than $3,000, these receipts were enough to pique the interest of federal agents in Mahmoud Maawad.

Besides a flight jacket and flight equipment that Maawad purchased, 9News found other items on the receipts, including aviation maps of his home airport in Memphis, Tennessee and cassettes on listening to control tower communications.

9News wanted to ask Sporty's why anyone might need access to purchase those items, but their spokesperson would only give us an off camera statement, saying, "Sporty's does not make comments on matters which may involve national security."

As 9News first reported Sunday, another DVD Maawad purchased this summer from Sporty's was titled "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act."

Sporty's tells us the DVD isn't meant for people to learn how to deceive, but rather to teach proper etiquette to new pilots.

Sporty's also offers in-flight training to prospective pilots at their Clermont County airport facility.

9News asked the company whether the suspect had come there to receive any in-person training but were told he had not.

The University of Memphis freshman was a 29-year-old economics student.

He has yet to be charged with any terrorist planning, but is facing wire fraud allegations that he stole a social security number to make the purchases online from Sporty's.

He remains in federal custody being held without bond.

There are no allegations that Sporty's did or sold anything illegal. 9News was told if someone had even a small interest in aviation it would be hard to not order something from the business as it's one of the country's leading mail order suppliers of aviation material.

SAFETY MEASURES QUESTIONED (NBC5CINN)

NBC 5 Cinncinati, September 19, 2005

CINCINNATI -- A chief Tri-State law enforcement official said it's time to beef up safety measures at stores that sell pilot equipment, News 5's Brian Hamrick reported.

Mahmoud Maawad, now the center of a federal investigation, bought almost $3,000 worth of equipment from a Sporty's Pilot Shop in Batavia over the Internet, Hamrick reported.

Sporty's sells everything a pilot could need -- uniforms, maps, even instructional DVDs.

Store managment notified the FBI when Maawad didn't pay for the items he purchased, and investigators found out he didn't have a Social Security number and isn't even in the United States legally.

Michael Snowden, director of homeland security for Hamilton County, said Maawad's case reveals carelessness in a system meant to protect American flyers after 9/11.

"Unfortunately, it's not that difficult to obtain identification, insignia badges -- those are all easily obtained," he said

In Maawad's Memphis apartment, federal agents found $2,500 worth of pilot paraphernalia, including a DVD called "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act" and a chart of the Memphis airport.

"It's very concerning, because part of what we're trying to do with homeland security is to make sure all of our critical assets and infrastructure are all secure," Snowden said.

No one with Sporty's would speak with Hamrick. And while it's not illegal for the store to sell a pilot's uniform to someone who's not a pilot, Snowden said he thinks retailers need to be cautious.

"I would think at the very least they should be checking it out," he said.

Man With Local Ties Ordered To Leave The U. S. (WDTN-TV)

WDTN-TV, September 20, 2005

A Jordanian native who had been living in the Miami Valley was ordered to leave the country after being investigated for possible connections to terrorism.

Thirty-three year old Mohammed Obeid had been living in Piqua, and was engaged to a Piqua woman when the FBI raided their home last summer, taking Obeid into custody.

An immigration judge had ordered him jailed on accusations of marriage fraud. He'd been married to, then divorced from two different American women before meeting the Piqua woman. Authorities claimed he was marrying women just to stay in the country.

The FBI claimed he was visiting terrorist related web sites at the couple's Piqua apartment.

On Monday, another hearing was held, this one in Monroe, Michigan. It was originally scheduled to be in Detroit, but they ended up holding it in the Monroe County jail because "security concerns."

Obeid and his attorney do have 30 days to appeal the judge's decision to remove him from the United States.

He is to be held in jail until that happens.

Al Qaeda Admits To London Bombings (WT/AP)

By Maggie Michael, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

CAIRO -- Al Qaeda deputy leader Ayman al-Zawahri said in a statement broadcast yesterday that his terror network carried out the July 7 London bombings, marking the group's first direct claim of responsibility for the attacks that killed 52 persons.

"The blessed London attack was one which al Qaeda was honored to launch against the British crusader's arrogance and against the American crusader aggression on the Islamic nation for 100 years," al-Zawahri said in the tape aired on Al Jazeera TV.

"In their final testament, the heroic brothers in the London attacks ... provided great lessons to the Islamic nation and Muslims in Pakistan to oppose the infidels," said al-Zawahri, who was shown wearing a white turban.

The attacks also killed the four bombers.

A spokeswoman for London's Metropolitan Police said she had no immediate comment on the tape.

Al-Zawahri also challenged the legitimacy of Afghanistan's parliamentary elections Sunday, saying they were held "under the terror of the lords of war," an apparent reference to the country's government.

DOJ_NMG_0006726

The election reference suggested the tape was made recently. Al Jazeera showed five minutes of it.

The Egyptian-born al-Zawahri also denounced U.S. demands for political reform around the world, including in Islamic countries.

"The Americans will not allow any Islamic regime to take power in the heart of the Islamic world unless it is a regime collaborating with them as happens in Iraq," he said.

PATRIOT ACT:

Gag-Rule Decree Sets Off A Clash Over Patriot Act (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Even as Congress moves to renew much of the 2001 Patriot Act, a federal judge in Connecticut has set up a clash over one of the antiterror law's most contentious provisions.

The Justice Department moved to block and is appealing a recent decision by U.S. District Judge Janet Hall that strikes down the gag orders imposed on recipients of so-called National Security Letters as part of a terrorism probe. NSLs are requests for information similar to subpoenas but are issued by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, not a grand jury, and aren't reviewed by a judge.

The Patriot Act prohibits disclosure of NSLs. In its appeals-court filing, the Justice Department cited the harm in "alerting the target of the investigation that his activities are subject to scrutiny, and allowing the target to hide, move his activities to another provider, provide misinformation to the government or otherwise frustrate the FBI's investigation."

But in her Sept. 9 ruling, the judge found in favor of the recipient of a recent letter, dubbed John Doe because of the gag order, and the American Civil Liberties Union. She said that the way the law was written has "the practical effect of silencing individuals with a constitutionally protected interest in speech and whose voices are particularly important in an ongoing national debate about the intrusion of governmental authority into individual lives."

Congress is reviewing the Patriot Act, which was passed in the weeks following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror strikes to give federal investigators more tools to prevent attacks. Sixteen provisions of the law will expire at the end of the year if not renewed. The NSL provision, while not among those 16, has been the target of much discussion because the secrecy requirements raise concerns about abuse.

"Our point isn't that the government could never justify a limited secrecy order in an ongoing investigation," said Ann Beeson, associate legal director at the ACLU. "Our point is they are required to justify that order by showing that the disclosure of that information would undermine a compelling government interest. In this case, the district court looked at their classified evidence and decided they hadn't."

This isn't the first time a federal judge has ruled against the government on NSLs. Last September, a district judge in New York declared unconstitutional a similar letter, sent to an Internet-service provider, on the grounds that it violated free-speech rights. The Justice Department has appealed the decision.

The ACLU and other civil-rights groups have been pressing Congress and the Bush administration to rein in some of the Patriot Act. But in July, the Senate and the House both passed similar versions of the law, extending 14 of the 16 provisions due to end. Differences are expected to be hammered out in coming weeks.

WAR NEWS:

Estimate Puts Afghan Turnout At 50% For Vote (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 20, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — Lamia Aszada had high hopes when she cast a vote for the first time in Afghanistan's presidential election last fall. She picked a winner, too: Hamid Karzai won in a landslide.

Aszada, 40, a civil servant who earns $40 a month at Afghanistan's Education Ministry, didn't vote in equally historic legislative elections Sunday. Her enthusiasm for democracy faded when Karzai failed to come through with raises for government workers.

DOJ_NMG_0006727

"He is a liar guy," she said. She also was appalled by some of the names she saw on the ballot: warlords who plundered and destroyed Kabul in the 1990s. "They robbed my house four times, the warlords," she said Monday. "Why should I vote for them?"

Turned off by the candidates, intimidated by the threat of violence and assuming a been-there, done-that attitude toward what had been the novelty of voting, hundreds of thousands of Afghans like Aszada sat out Sunday's elections.

Vote counting begins today. Final results are expected in early October because some ballots are being delivered from remote regions. When the count is completed, the turnout is expected to come in well below that of last year's presidential election, in which 70% of eligible voters cast ballots.

Chief electoral officer Peter Erben said Monday that early results suggest 6 million Afghans voted, about 50% of registered voters and well below expectations. Erben, a Dane who has worked on elections in Bosnia, Kosovo, East Timor, the Palestinian territories and Iraq, declared the turnout figures "satisfactory." He said there always is great initial enthusiasm for voting in "post-conflict" countries, as in Afghanistan's presidential election. That cools, he said, usually settling at turnout rates of about 50%.

Erben said the stakes in the legislative elections were not as "tangible" as they had been in the simple choice for presidency: Nationwide, nearly 6,000 candidates contended Sunday for 249 seats in the Wolesi Jirga, or lower house of the Afghan National Assembly, and 420 provincial council seats. To make things easier in a country where 49% of men and 79% of women are illiterate, planners devised ballots that let voters identify candidates by their photographs, by a number and by a symbol.

Nevertheless, the number of candidates made for bewildering ballots: In Kabul, the National Assembly ballot had 390 candidates and required seven pages.

Erben said the ballots were designed to be completed in 10 minutes and that "many" voters managed to complete them in three or four minutes. However, some voters in Kabul had trouble locating their candidate. "They were wasting 10 or 15 minutes, and still they couldn't find the guy," said Shahnaz Qasmi, a high school principal and election officer.

Before the vote, the Taliban warned Afghans to boycott the polls. In a statement Monday, President Bush said Afghan voters had defied the Taliban and "those who threaten their lives."

The threats did not stop the vote. What stopped many from going to the polls was the candidates. Among those running for office were former Taliban leaders and commanders such as fundamentalist warlord Abdul Rabb al-Rasul Sayyaf. His forces battled other factions in Kabul from 1992 to 1996.

"It's better not to vote for anybody," said Rasul Beg, 25. "In Afghanistan, it is too hard to find someone who will serve the people. They are all criminals."

Was his view jaded because he'd been exposed to corruption in his job as a government anti-narcotics officer? Beg smiled: "Maybe."

Afghan Electorate's Message: The Provinces Need Public Works And Restoration Of Order (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 19 - The winners and losers of the landmark Afghan elections on Sunday will remain a mystery for another several weeks, but whoever makes it to the legislature will quickly be tested against the universal axiom of parliamentary democracy: that all politics is local.

With widespread frustration over the pace by which the central government in Kabul is distributing reconstruction aid to the provinces, diplomats and election observers said, the test of credibility for the new Parliament will be its ability to deliver on the peace dividend, from roads and bridges to law and order.

Speaking to reporters on Monday, the United States ambassador, Ronald E. Neumann, acknowledged that citizens' expectations for internationally financed reconstruction projects were running high, for everything from public works to a functional justice system.

"These expectations of the people will have to be met," Mr. Neumann said. "What the election does is give the Afghan people a new channel to voice their opinions and demands."

He took pains to offer reassurance that the United States and other foreign donors would stay the course in Afghanistan's recovery. "It's going to be long term," he said. "This job is not done. For Afghanistan to be stable and peaceful, the international community is going to have to stay involved for a long time."

In the elections on Sunday, in which Afghans voted for a 249-seat lower house of Parliament and for 34 provincial councils, an estimated six million people voted. The turnout of a little over 50 percent was far lower than expected, election officials said. Results are expected by Oct. 22.

DOJ_NMG_0006728

The provincial councils and the president will in turn select members of the 51-seat upper house. Parliament is to convene in December.

Mr. Neumann, as well as European election observers and Afghan election officials, insisted that despite threats from insurgents linked to the country's former Taliban rulers, violence was scattered and lower in intensity than had been feared.

The chief of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, Jean Arnault, said that to maintain their credibility, the executive and legislative branches would have to answer to a public increasingly frustrated about the lack of visible improvements.

"One of the very, very widespread complaints about reconstruction process today is where is the money going," Mr. Arnault said. "There is a sense out there that resources are not fairly allocated."

An elected Parliament, he said, will prompt accountability on the part of President Hamid Karzai's administration and his international backers.

Likewise, a preliminary assessment of the reconstruction efforts, issued last week by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, based in Washington, found that while security had improved in the nearly four years since the American-led military overthrow of the Taliban, good governance, a working criminal justice system and economic development remained dangerously lacking. The report described the Karzai government as weak.

"A broad foundation for success is being built, but too few needs have been met in Afghans' day-to-day-lives," the report said. "The formal justice system in Afghanistan remains unable to confront impunity, adjudicate land disputes, unravel criminal networks or protect citizens' rights. Economic growth has been significant but uneven."

Peter Erben, the chief of the United Nations-assisted Joint Election Management Board, said Monday that the election turnout was satisfactory, considering that post-conflict elections usually begin with high participation and then level off. He gave the example of Bosnia, where he said turnout was about 70 percent in 1996, shortly after the end of the war there, only to drop to about 55 percent by 2002.

In Afghanistan there were other explanations for the turnout beyond the threat of violence. Voters and election observers said the ballot was confusing, with voters in Kabul, for instance, having to sift through a list of roughly 400 parliamentary candidates to make their one selection. Some voters appeared not to understand the function of a Parliament, a weakness that critics attributed to weak civic education in the prelude to elections.

More worrying was a creeping sense of disillusionment with the fairness of the democratic process.

"I thought it might be again the same spaghetti and the same plate," said Zubair Ahmed, 29, who is unemployed. He said he tore up his voting card after the election for president last October. "There was no motive for voting again," he said. "We expected a change after the presidential election, but nothing happened."

Humayoun, 24, a farmer from a village in the Shomali plain, just north of Kabul, said: "Why we should bother to vote? The people in the Parliament are already selected. They come sealed and stamped from America, like Karzai."

Those who did turn out Sunday said they had come with hope that their choice for Parliament would bring their communities a greater share of reconstruction assistance.

"I'm hoping for security first, then roads, then education," said Muhammad Tahir, 45, a Kandahar shopkeeper.

Nur Alam, 54, a farmer in a village north of Kabul, said, speaking of the newly elected officials: "They should definitely do it for us, because they cannot sit on their chair and do nothing. Of course if they don't do anything, people will not vote for them the next time."

Voter Turnout At About 50 Percent (WT)

By Carmen Gentile

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan -- Early returns show a lower-than-expected voter turnout for the embattled nation's widely anticipated parliamentary elections, electoral officials said yesterday.

Peter Erben, the chief electoral official for the Sunday vote, said about half of Afghanistan's 12.4 million registered voters cast ballots.

"With these early indications, I can say turnout appears just over 50 percent," said Mr. Erben yesterday at a press conference in the capital, Kabul. He made the assessment after a third of polling stations in Afghanistan's 34 provinces reported the volume of their voter traffic.

In the presidential election last year, about 70 percent of registered voters headed to the polls, and ahead of the Sunday vote, many officials had predicted that between 80 percent and 85 percent of eligible voters would head to the polls.

Officials expect the vote tally to take more than two weeks, with results likely announced in the next two weeks, although it could be mid-October before the results are announced.

DOJ_NMG_0006729

Afghans went to the polls to select 249 members of the country's Wolesi Jirga, or "House of People." It is the first time since 1969 that a Wolesi Jirga was chosen by a democratic vote.

They also selected provincial leaders among the thousands of candidates vying for hundreds of local positions.

Terrorist attacks early Sunday might have hurt turnout, even though the day passed relatively peacefully.

Several polling stations visited by The Washington Times in Kabul late Sunday were devoid of the long lines seen earlier in the day.

U.N. and Afghan electoral officials, working together in the elections, reported that polling stations in other provinces were packed all day and even stayed open past the 4 p.m. cutoff time to get those in line to vote.

The hard-line Taliban, which once ruled almost all of Afghanistan under a version of Islamic law that prohibits girls from going to school, had threatened to disrupt the voting.

In Ghazni province, lines for female voters reportedly were longer than those for men. The vote was particularly poignant for women, because 25 percent of Wolesi Jirga seats have been set aside for women.

At a ballot collection station outside Kandahar Stadium, where the Taliban used to conduct public executions and amputations for crimes such as adultery and theft, security officer Gulam Mohendeen gestured fondly toward 20 trucks loaded with ballot boxes collected from polling stations nationwide.

"Though the country still doesn't have a real government, these boxes represent the future of Afghanistan," he said.

Is Pakistan Doing Its Part In The War On Terrorism? (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 20, 2005

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Police commandos burst into an all-girls madrassa here in what was meant to be a dramatic example of Pakistan's commitment to cracking down on Islamic extremism and religious schools that promote it. But the July 19 raid turned into a debacle.

Caught without their veils, the teenage girls screamed — and then rallied. Grabbing mops, brooms, stones and knives, they drove the commandos out. The retreating police fired back with tear gas. The girls staggered into the street, where the melee continued; 62 students had to be hospitalized after the police beat them with batons.

The target of the raid was extremist mullahs from Islamabad's Red Mosque, which runs the school and is famous for organizing anti-American, pro-Taliban demonstrations. No one was arrested, and police even missed a chance to nab one of the mosque's top clerics: Hours before the raid, Abdul Rashid Ghazi had been in police headquarters for a routine meeting with the commissioner. “They could have arrested me there,” Ghazi says.

So goes Pakistan's campaign against homegrown religious extremism: considerable drama, few results. President Pervez Musharraf has taken huge risks — he has survived two assassination attempts — to hunt down al-Qaeda fugitives. He has sent thousands of troops to battle militants along the lawless border with Afghanistan. But his government has been reluctant to go after its former allies: the Taliban in Afghanistan and groups that have fought a proxy war against Indian troops in disputed Kashmir. It also has been slow to crack down on madrassas that teach intolerance and glorify jihad, or holy war.

As a result, Pakistan is still turning out young militants burning to kill and die for their extreme interpretations of Islam.

Pakistani forces also have been unable to find two of the world's most-wanted men — Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar — after four years of searching. The fugitives are believed to be hiding along the Afghan border.

Musharraf's pledge to eradicate extremism is coming under closer scrutiny four years after the U.S. began its military campaign to topple the Taliban. A recent upsurge in Taliban attacks on U.S. troops in Afghanistan near the Pakistani border is raising questions about the degree to which the militants are receiving sanctuary, training and supplies inside Pakistan.

There also is concern that the militants might be getting support from rogue elements of Musharraf's own security services.

“It's very obvious (the militants) are interfering in Afghanistan,” says Gen. Abdul Manan Farahi, head of counterterrorism at the Afghan Interior Ministry. “They are coming into Afghanistan from Pakistan. They are being trained in Pakistani madrassas.”

Pakistan rejects criticism

Pakistani officials reject the criticism. “We should not be accusing each other,” says Jehangir Karamat, Pakistan's ambassador to the United States.

Although Pakistan once supported the Taliban, the government insists it has no incentive to do so now. “Pakistan has absolutely nothing to gain from a destabilized Afghanistan,” Karamat says.

Pakistan is developing its southern port of Gwadar in anticipation of increased trade with Afghanistan and central Asia. “This can happen only when Afghanistan is at peace,” says Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, Pakistan's military spokesman.

Pakistan has dispatched more than 80,000 troops to hunt militants along the rugged Afghan border. They've captured 700 al-Qaeda suspects and endured heavy losses: 270 Pakistani troops killed, another 600 wounded, Sultan says.

DOJ_NMG_0006730

But Pakistan has been more aggressive rounding up foreign al-Qaeda fighters than militants with origins closer to home. Musharraf "has been making a distinction between al-Qaeda, the Taliban and homegrown Pakistani groups," says Husain Haqqani, a visiting scholar from Pakistan at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

Sultan says only 46 Taliban leaders have been arrested. Pakistan's military, which overthrew an elected government in a bloodless 1999 coup that put Musharraf in power, has old ties to the Taliban and to domestic extremist groups.

The United States and Pakistan encouraged Muslims to wage a successful jihad against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s. Emboldened by the Afghan triumph, Pakistan recruited militants to fight the Indian army in Kashmir, a low-budget way to bleed the Indian occupation of territory Pakistan claims as its own. Pakistan also threw its support behind the Taliban as the militia seized power in Afghanistan, convinced that a friendly, anti-Indian government in Kabul was crucial to Pakistan's security.

But Sept. 11 changed everything. Under pressure from Washington, Musharraf agreed to abandon the Taliban and support the U.S.-led war on terrorism. On Jan. 12, 2002, Musharraf delivered a much-anticipated speech in which he banned extremist groups, pledged to end support for militant attacks in Indian-controlled Kashmir and promised to crack down on madrassas. He said they would have to register with the government.

Since then, militant infiltrations into Kashmir have decreased, and Pakistan has entered into diplomatic talks with India to resolve the long-standing dispute. But inside Pakistan, nothing much came of Musharraf's pledges.

The International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based, non-profit organization that works to prevent conflict, reported that hundreds of militants were detained — but then released. Militant groups re-formed under new names, most madrassas never registered and militant leaders continued to operate openly, the report said.

In the most extreme example noted by the International Crisis Group, the government allowed Sunni extremist Maulana Azam Tariq to run successfully for parliament in 2002 even though he was facing terrorism charges. His political career ended when he was gunned down in October 2003.

In many madrassas, textbooks and teachers promote intolerance against different sects and religions. Even in public schools, textbooks glorify jihad and warn children to be ever vigilant against enemies of the state.

"Intolerance is deeply ingrained in the culture," says Mariam Abou Zahab, a French expert on Pakistan.

Worries about Pakistan's madrassas grew after the July 7 London bombings. At least one of the four suicide bombers had visited a Pakistani madrassa before the attacks; he and two others were Britons of Pakistani ancestry.

In June, the former U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan, Zalmay Khalilzad, set off a diplomatic furor when he pointedly said he didn't believe bin Laden or Omar was hiding in Afghanistan.

The implication was clear: The fugitives had instead found sanctuary in Pakistan. Musharraf challenged skeptics to "please come and show us where he is."

"The Pakistan government is playing a double game," says retired U.S. diplomat Dennis Kux, author of The United States and Pakistan 1947-2000: Disenchanted Allies.

"It is a firm ally in the war on terror," he says, "but at the same time wants to preserve its options to use the Taliban."

'Walking a tightrope'

Musharraf can't risk moving aggressively against homegrown extremists. "He is walking a tightrope," Zahab says. His government has marginalized secular democratic political parties and forged a partnership with a coalition of religious parties.

"Both Musharraf and the Islamic parties have a stake in the continuation of the current policies," says political consultant Hasan Askari Rizvi.

"Even if the Pakistani government wished, it could not fully control the extremists," Kux says. "For too long it coddled them or just looked the other way. Moreover, Musharraf, I assume, fears pro-Islamist elements in the military. Otherwise, he would not back down every time he says he is going to put the lid on madrassas or take other measures that offend the extremists."

The Pakistani public, inflamed by scenes of civilian deaths in Iraq and Afghanistan, is increasingly hostile to the U.S.-led war on terrorism and Pakistan's official support of it.

Musharraf may be taking an even greater risk by making tentative overtures to Israel, a close U.S. ally shunned in most of the Muslim world. He met briefly with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week at the United Nations.

"We want to try to influence Israel to establish a Palestinian state," the Pakistani president said in an interview published Saturday in the Arabic-language Asharq al-Awsat newspaper. "We won't have a role if we don't deal with them."

"There is an increasing gap between the state and society," says Muhammad Waseem, political analyst at Islamabad's Quaid-i-Azam University. "The state is supporting America. The society is increasingly anti-American. If the government ignores the public sentiment, it can't be legitimate."

DOJ_NMG_0006731

After the London bombings, Musharraf repeated the pledges he'd made 3½ years earlier. Pakistani police began another roundup of extremist suspects — a campaign that included the ill-fated July 19 assault on the girls school. The government last month passed an ordinance requiring madrassas to register.

Musharraf's critics are waiting to see whether he pushes ahead this time with the registration and regulation of madrassas, something religious groups pledge to resist.

"What one looks for is evidence, not rhetoric," says Samina Ahmed of the International Crisis Group.

British Army Storms Basra Jail To Free 2 Soldiers From Arrest (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 19 - Two British soldiers working under cover were arrested Monday in the southern city of Basra and then freed as a British armored vehicle blasted through the wall of their jail after an angry crowd began rioting outside, an Interior Ministry official said.

The official said that the soldiers were undercover officers dressed as Iraqis and that Iraqi police officers had arrested them after the men fired at a traffic police officer.

A British military spokesman in Basra confirmed that "two U.K. military personnel" had been detained early on Monday "in a shooting incident" and that troops had used an armored fighting vehicle "to gain entry" to the police station to release them. He said that more than one vehicle had been in the area and that the police inside the station had refused to obey orders from the Interior Ministry to release the men.

The incident came a day after British forces in Basra arrested three members of the Mahdi Army, the militia loyal to the rebellious Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, on suspicion of terrorism.

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press, said the riot began Monday evening when militia members converged on the police station holding the British men, apparently hoping to seize them in order to free their three colleagues in British custody. The British spokesman said there had been 100 to 200 people in the crowd.

Ali Dabagh, a Shiite member of the National Assembly who had just emerged from a briefing with Interior Minister Bayan Jabr in Baghdad on Monday night, said that militia members had begun attacking the station with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, and that British troops soon responded to defend it.

The ministry official said that British armored vehicles had fired on the station, headquarters of the major crimes unit in central Basra, and broken through its outer wall. Troops then stormed in and freed the two men, he said. There were reports of prisoners escaping, but the official denied them.

A broadcast on Al Arabiya satellite television showed two men, whom the station identified as British undercover officers, one with his head bandaged and both with their hands behind their backs.

The video showed men and boys hurling stones at a burning armored fighting vehicle outside the police station. A British soldier could be seen climbing out of the hatch and jumping to the ground, as the crowd pelted him.

[Despite the graphic images, British Defense Minister John Reid said Monday that the soldiers wounded in the attack were "being treated for minor injuries only and are expected to return to duty shortly," Agence France-Presse reported.]

Reuters reported that two Iraqis had been killed in the fighting. The Interior Ministry official said that 25 people had been wounded but that he could not confirm any deaths.

Violence continued in other parts of the country. Car bombs exploded near Iraqi police convoys in Mahmudiya and Latifiya, just south of Baghdad, just after 1:30 p.m., killing a total of nine police commandos and wounding 12, officials said.

In the northern city of Mosul, a man driving a sport utility vehicle blew himself up with a bomb near an American convoy, killing at least one civilian. The military did not report any deaths of soldiers in the attack.

In a statement on an Internet site on Monday, the terrorist group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia modified a declaration of war made last week by its leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The statement said followers of Mr. Sadr, the Shiite cleric, who has twice ordered his group to fight against American troops, would not be directly attacked.

In an effort to persuade Iraqis that it is taking a hard line with insurgents, the Iraqi government announced that the Central Criminal Court had handed down sentences for 54 foreigners who had been convicted of crossing into Iraq illegally. A majority were from Syria and Saudi Arabia.

In another court action on Monday, Saddam Hussein's nephew Ayman Sabawi was sentenced to life in prison for supporting the insurgency. Mr. Sabawi was arrested in May in Tikrit. His father, Sabawi Ibrahim alHassan, Mr. Hussein's half brother, was arrested in February and is awaiting trial.

DOJ_NMG_0006732

British Smash Into Iraqi Jail To Free 2 Detained Soldiers (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 19 -- British armored vehicles backed by helicopter gunships burst through the walls of an Iraqi jail Monday in the southern city of Basra to free two British commandos detained earlier in the day by Iraqi police, witnesses and Iraqi officials said. The incident climaxed a confrontation between the two nominal allies that had sparked hours of gun battles and rioting in Basra's streets.

An Iraqi official said a half-dozen armored vehicles had smashed into the jail, the Reuters news agency reported. The provincial governor, Mohammed Walli, told news agencies that the British assault was "barbaric, savage and irresponsible."

British officials said three soldiers were hurt in the day's violence, in which at least one armored personnel carrier was destroyed by firebombs. Iraqi officials said at least two civilians were killed.

In London, authorities said the two commandos were released after negotiations. But the BBC quoted British defense officials as saying a wall was demolished when British forces went to "collect" the men.

Monday's violence underscored the increasing volatility of Basra, a Shiite Muslim-majority city that had previously escaped much of the violence of the Sunni Muslim-led insurgency. Tension has been growing between British forces in the city and Shiite police and militias that operate there.

On Monday, an Iraqi reporter working for the New York Times was found shot dead on the outskirts of Basra with his hands bound, his family and security sources said. The reporter, Fakher Haider, had been handcuffed and taken away from his home Sunday night by four masked men who said they wanted to interrogate him, his family said.

"This murder of a respected colleague leaves us angry and horrified," Bill Keller, the newspaper's executive editor, said in a statement. "Fakher was an invaluable part of our coverage for more than two years. His depth of knowledge, his devotion to the story and his integrity were much admired by the reporters who worked with him."

Elsewhere in Iraq, anti-corruption investigators said they expected charges against the country's former defense minister, Hazim Shaalan, in the alleged embezzlement of more than $1 billion that was meant to help rebuild the country's security forces.

In Baghdad, Ayman Sabawi, a nephew of deposed president Saddam Hussein, was sentenced last week by an Iraqi court to six years in prison for financing the insurgency and making bombs, said Army Lt. Col. Guy Rudisill, a U.S. military spokesman.

Near the Shiite holy city of Karbala, bomb and mortar attacks killed at least five Shiite pilgrims as millions gathered for an annual religious festival there.

Basra, a city of 1.5 million, is heavily under the control of Shiite political parties and fighters of the Badr militia of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Shiite religious party that has a leading role in Iraq's government.

Citizens and authorities allege that Badr fighters have infiltrated police forces and are carrying out abuses under the guise of police authority. Rivalry also runs strong between those militia fighters and the militia of Moqtada Sadr, a Shiite cleric.

Attacks on Westerners -- once a rare event in Basra -- have targeted British and U.S. diplomatic convoys in recent weeks and killed at least eight Britons and Americans.

Earlier Monday, gunmen loyal to Sadr attacked the house of Basra's governor to press demands for the release of two prominent members of the cleric's militia whom British forces arrested Sunday.

The killing of the New York Times reporter took place six weeks after an American freelance journalist, Steven Vincent, was kidnapped and killed in Basra, allegedly after being taken away in a marked police car. Vincent had published numerous articles, including in the Times, alleging heavy-handedness by Basra security forces and deriding Sadr and other Shiite officials.

Britain is the second-leading contributor of foreign troops to the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, with 8,500 troops compared with 140,000 Americans.

Iraqi security officials on Monday variously accused the two Britons they detained of shooting at Iraqi forces or trying to plant explosives. Photographs of the two men in custody showed them in civilian clothes.

When British officials apparently sought to secure their release, riots erupted. Iraqi police cars circulated downtown, calling through loudspeakers for the public to help stop British forces from releasing the two. Heavy gunfire broke out and fighting raged for hours, as crowds swarmed British forces and set at least one armored vehicle on fire.

Witnesses said they saw Basra police exchanging fire with British forces. Sadr's Mahdi Army militia joined in the fighting late in the day, witnesses said. A British military spokesman, Darren Moss, denied that British troops were fighting Basra police.

Another Western military spokesman in Basra confirmed "an ongoing disturbance" in the city on Monday but said Iraqi and British forces were working together to quell it.

DOJ_NMG_0006733

In the southern city of Latifiyah, an insurgent stronghold, bombs targeted Shiite pilgrims driving and walking to Karbala for an annual rite. A car bomb hit the crowd of pilgrims first, followed 10 minutes later by mortar rounds, said police Capt. Muthanna Ahmed.

A suicide bomber killed five Iraqi policemen and two civilians Monday when he blew himself up near an Iraqi police commando patrol in Mahmudiyah, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, the Associated Press reported.

Shiite Militia, British Soldiers Clash (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Violent street clashes erupted Monday between Shiite militia and British soldiers in the southern city of Basra, after British tanks stormed a local jail where two of their troops were being held.

The daylong violence in Iraq's second-largest city raised troubling questions about the relationship between British forces in charge of security and their Iraqi counterparts, in what once was considered a relatively safe area of the country.

The clashes, which involved members of cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Al Mahdi army, apparently began when British commandos fired on Iraqi police, who took them into custody.

Tanks then bore down on the jail, knocking down a wall before the men were freed -- along with dozens of other detainees who took advantage of the chaos to escape, according to local reports and news agency accounts.

Two Iraqis were reportedly killed in the clashes, and several British soldiers were wounded.

Television images of the street fighting showed Iraqis firebombing a tank, and a British soldier emerging with his uniform in flames. The British Broadcasting Corp. reported the soldier was treated for minor injuries.

As night fell Monday, confusion and chaos dominated Basra's city center. Residents huddled in their homes reported gunfire and tank maneuvers.

Though Basra has not suffered the same level of violence as other cities in Iraq -- such as Fallouja, Samarra and the capital -- residents say peace has come at a cost. Armed militiamen rule the streets, enforcing perceived infractions of Islamic law with beatings and even killings, residents say.

In the once cosmopolitan city, women no longer can go unveiled on the streets, and physicians have been beaten for treating female patients.

The militias have also infiltrated the police, taking orders from clerics instead of commanders. When the Basra police chief acknowledged this spring that he'd lost control of his 13,000-strong force to Shiite Muslim militiamen, he was quickly removed from his job.

"The shift in Basra's situation from calmness to disorder is because of the authorities here," said Abid Sayid Mohammed Samad, 52, a Basra auto mechanic. "All are affiliated with different entities and blocs, and this rivalry among parties has undermined the security situation."

The clashes followed the discovery Monday of the body of Fakhr Haidar al-Tamimi, 38, a journalist and father of three who worked for local TV and radio, as well as The New York Times, the Guardian in London, National Geographic and other publications, according to the New-York-based Committee to Protect Journalists.

His death brought the toll for journalists or media workers in Iraq to 68 since the conflict began in 2003 -- five more than were killed in 20 years of covering the conflict in Vietnam, according to Reporters without Borders, a Paris-based advocacy group. Two thirds of those killed were Iraqis, the group said.

The Committee to Protect Journalists put the death toll at 55.

After enjoying a brief flowering of freedom and opportunities in the wake of the 2003 U.S. invasion, Iraqi journalists live in fear for their lives and rarely admit their profession in public.

"All the media people are now targeted and vulnerable simply because they convey the truth," said Nadhem Jabari, spokesman for the Basra provincial council. "We know very well that the truth would embarrass and many people."

Because of threats to Western reporters, much of the street-level reporting has been done by local Iraqi journalists, who file reports to all major media, including the Los Angeles Times.

It was unclear if Tamimi was targeted for his work with Western or local media.

"Covering this war is a perilous assignment for all journalists, but the gravest risk falls on those whose country is the battleground and whose lives are inextricable from the society," Bill Keller, executive editor of The New York Times, said in the announcement.

"We're all in shock about Fakher's death," said Robert F. Worth, a Baghdad-based New York Times correspondent. "He was a wonderful colleague, gentle and brave and resourceful. He had a great sense of humor. We will miss him."

Elsewhere, Iraq's steady tempo of bloodshed continued, with at least 11 other Iraqis killed in politically motivated violence.

DOJ_NMG_0006734

Near Baghdad on Monday, at least eight Iraqi police commandos, an Iraqi soldier and a civilian were killed and 12 others injured in car bombings at two checkpoints beyond the city's southern edge.

The attacks, in Mahmoudiya and Latifiya, were launched within the perilous cluster of small towns and palm groves south of Baghdad known as the "triangle of death." Authorities have tightened security in the area as pilgrims head on foot toward the holy city of Karbala for an annual Shiite religious ceremony.

In Baqouba, a turbulent city of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds 40 miles north of the capital, the provincial governor escaped an assassination attempt that injured three of his guards while an explosion targeting a group of day laborers left one civilian killed. U.S. forces in the northern city of Mosul killed two suspected insurgents and detained three in early morning raids. The men were "suspected of having senior al-Qaeda in Iraq connections," the military announced.

Reporter Working For Times Abducted And Slain In Iraq (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 19 - An Iraqi journalist and photographer working for The New York Times in Basra was found dead early Monday after being abducted from his home by a group of armed men wearing masks and claiming to be police officers, relatives and witnesses said.

The journalist, Fakher Haider, 38, was found with his hands bound and a bag over his head in a deserted area on the outskirts of Basra, in southern Iraq, hours after being taken from his house in that city. A relative who viewed his body in the city morgue said he had at least one bullet hole in his head and bruises on his back as if he had been beaten.

Mr. Haider had worked for The Times since April 2003 and had recently reported on the growing friction and violence among Basra's rival Shiite militias, which are widely believed to have infiltrated the police.

He did part-time for work for other news organizations, including Merbad TV, a local Basra station, and for publications including The Guardian of London and National Geographic. But his principal affiliation was with The Times.

"This murder of a respected colleague leaves us angry and horrified," said Bill Keller, the executive editor of The Times. "Fakher was an invaluable part of our coverage for more than two years. His depth of knowledge, his devotion to the story and his integrity were much admired by the reporters who worked with him."

Mr. Haider is the second journalist to be killed in Basra in the past two months. In August, Steven Vincent, an American freelance reporter who was writing a book about the city, was abducted along with his Iraqi interpreter, and he was later found dead. The interpreter remains hospitalized.

Days earlier, Mr. Vincent had written an Op-Ed article for The Times in which he criticized the British security forces in the city for failing to act against the Shiite militias' growing power within the local police force.

Basra has grown increasingly violent, with a complex web of sectarian agendas playing itself out almost daily on the streets. Insurgents continue to attack Shiite civilians and military patrols, while Shiite militias fight among themselves and, recently, with British troops as well.

On Sunday, Mr. Haider filed reports about angry demonstrations that had broken out after the arrest by British forces of two high-ranking members of the Mahdi Army, the militia loyal to the renegade Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Shortly after midnight, two cars, one of them an unmarked sedan, one a police car, were driven up to Mr. Haider's apartment building, according to witnesses who said they could not be identified without jeopardizing their lives.

Efforts to reach the Basra police on Monday were not successful. Police officials tend to rely on cellphones, which are often unreliable between Basra and Baghdad.

Three of the men, carrying AK-47 assault rifles, entered the apartment building as frightened neighbors emerged from their homes, said Mr. Haider's wife, Intisar Abbas Hamza, in a telephone interview. They then entered the apartment and ransacked it, she said.

The gunmen took Mr. Haider's telephones, his pistol and some videotapes, Ms. Hamza said. As they prepared to leave with Mr. Haider, they told her they were only going to interrogate him for a few hours and bring him back, she said.

Mr. Haider told his wife not to worry, and then quickly wrote down the phone number of a friend and fellow journalist. He told his wife to tell the friend to call the Basra governor's office. The gunmen were standing by at the time, Ms. Hamza said.

In recent months, Mr. Haider had confided to friends that he was worried about the increasingly violent atmosphere in Basra. In July, gunmen in a pickup truck chased his car and fired at him, and he narrowly escaped after driving off the road and firing his pistol into the air, he told a friend.

A lean man with a quiet voice and a shy, curious smile, Mr. Haider was a Shiite and a member of the Tamimi tribe. Although his English was limited, he was brave and resourceful in his work with reporters. His extensive tribal connections were a great advantage in his journalistic work, both in Basra and in the marshes of southeastern Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0006735

Mr. Haider, who was born in Basra, fought in the 1991 uprising against Saddam Hussein after the Persian Gulf war. He said that he later escaped to Kuwait and was lucky to avoid being killed when Mr. Hussein's forces regained control of southern Iraq.

During the uprising, Mr. Haider risked his life to help the daughter of a local Baath Party official secure a decent burial for her brother, who had been killed by rebelling Shiites. After the Baathists returned to power, the official spared his life for that reason, Mr. Haider said.

Before starting his work for The Times in 2003, Mr. Haider worked for years at a fertilizer factory in Basra, said his brother, Muhammad Haider. In addition to his wife, Mr. Haider is survived by three children, ages 5, 7 and 9.

England Now To Fight Abu Ghraib Charges (AJC/AP)

By T.a. Badger, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

SAN ANTONIO — Army Pfc. Lynndie England will abandon her earlier courtroom strategy and fight charges that she was a key participant in detainee abuse by guards at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, her lawyer said.

The 22-year-old reservist, who appears in a series of graphic photos taken inside Abu Ghraib, was to go on trial Tuesday at Fort Hood, Texas, on seven counts of mistreating prisoners.

She will be the last of a group of junior enlisted soldiers charged with Abu Ghraib abuses to have their cases resolved. Two have been convicted at trial, while six others made plea deals and received prison sentences of up to eight years.

Three months after England's attempt at a plea agreement fell apart, her lead defense lawyer, Capt. Jonathan Crisp, said "there's not going to be a deal."

Crisp said he plans to base much of his defense on England's history of mental health problems that date back to her childhood.

He said he also will focus on the influence exerted over England by Pvt. Charles Graner, the reputed abuse ringleader. Graner, who England has said fathered her young son while they were deployed, is serving a 10-year sentence after being convicted at trial in January.

"I wouldn't say it's 'Blame Graner,'" Crisp said of his trial strategy, which includes calling Graner as a witness. "But certainly Graner is involved as far as what was going on."

England pleaded guilty in May to conspiracy, maltreating detainees and committing an indecent act — the same charges she faces this week — in exchange for an undisclosed sentencing cap. The charges carry a maximum sentence of 11 years.

But judge Col. James Pohl abruptly threw out the deal and declared a mistrial during the sentencing phase when testimony by Graner contradicted England's guilty plea.

Graner, called as a defense witness, said pictures he took of England holding a prisoner on a leash were meant to be used as a training aid. But in her guilty plea, England said the pictures were being taken purely for the amusement of the guards.

Prosecutors, who declined to talk about the trial, are expected to rely on the photos that have made England the scandal's most recognizable figure.

A ruling by Pohl in July, however, tossed out a key piece of the prosecution's case — statements to Army investigators in which England implicated herself in the abuse.

The judge said that he believed England did not fully understand the consequences when she waived her rights against self-incrimination before speaking to the investigators in January 2004.

An Honest Victory (NYT)

By Nathaniel Fick

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

Cambridge, Mass.

Authority can be delegated; responsibility cannot. President Bush's speech last week accepting responsibility for the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina was commendable, if overdue. Though it has been derided by some as political expediency, the president's acknowledgment was a necessary first step in rebuilding the Gulf Coast and preparing for the next disaster.

This new transparency, however, shouldn't stop with Hurricane Katrina. Consider the positive effects that would follow a similar presidential assumption of responsibility for American missteps in Iraq.

By declaring that the buck stops at his desk, President Bush could begin a top-down rethinking of our military and political strategies since the 2003 invasion. He would also establish a standard of personal accountability for everyone in the chain of command, much as his statement last week prompted Gov. Kathleen Blanco of Louisiana to follow suit. And it just might galvanize enough bipartisan support to break the ideological gridlock that has limited changes in Iraq policy to marginal tweaks rather than a full reassessment.

DOJ_NMG_0006736

Of course, many people we will depend on in our attempt to rebuild Iraq - including Iraqi civilians, nongovernmental aid organizations and our foreign allies - will respond only to results, not to rhetoric. There is, however, at least one group that would respond well to this particular piece of rhetoric: senior military leaders. The fate of Gen. Eric Shinseki, the former Army chief of staff who fell into disfavor with the White House after telling Congress in 2003 that several hundred thousand troops would be needed in postwar Iraq, has cast a long shadow across the officer corps.

Much of the military's trustworthiness derives from its culture of accountability. In 1944, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower prepared a speech in case the D-Day invasion failed, knowing that his continued leadership of the Army depended on taking responsibility for its shortcomings. Half a century later, my own Marine training stressed that I, as a commander, was responsible for everything my troops did, or failed to do.

Senior military officers rightly expect the same sense of responsibility from the elected government they serve. The tradition of providing apolitical advice based on sound military judgment is predicated on the willingness of civilian leaders to consider unpopular counsel, something this administration has been unwilling to do. An admission of responsibility from the top would give our commanders new freedom to analyze what has gone wrong in Iraq and to work with the Pentagon's civilians to improve it, translating presidential rhetoric into results on the ground.

While our mistakes have been many - from broad policy to specific tactics - the most frustrating are those that recur. Many of the problems I witnessed in Iraq two years ago are being repeated: the three enablers of insurgency - weapons, men and money - still flow freely from Syria and Iran; many American units are still blind to cultural nuance, largely because of a shortage of translators; and there's still too much focus on the misleading statistic of dead insurgents, as if the enemy were finite.

As things stand, American citizens - and the military - have been offered a false choice between "staying the course" in Iraq and precipitous withdrawal. The historian James Chace compared the former to a sailor who, having been blown off course in a storm, continues to sail straight ahead, but in the wrong direction. Cutting and running, on the other hand, isn't a strategy. A hasty exit would give us anarchy, civil war and maybe revenge killing on a scale unseen since Rwanda. That withdrawal is frequently advanced as the "humanitarian" option is appalling. There must be a third way.

Enter presidential leadership. Envision this: In a primetime address like last Thursday's, President Bush focuses the power of his office on Iraq. He doesn't claim that we have turned a corner or that the insurgents are fighting harder because they are weaker. He speaks honestly, acknowledges the administration's mistakes, accepts responsibility for them and explains why creating a stable Iraq is in America's national interest. Then, and this is the key, he announces a reassessment of American strategy spanning from the roles of the commander in chief to the lowliest private.

We are not talking about shifting a few thousand troops from one city to another. President Bush would have to condone a major philosophical and strategic shift away from what hasn't worked. Fortunately, there are leaders in the military who understand counterinsurgency warfare. Conventional armies have been fighting guerrillas since ancient times, and this history offers countless cautionary examples, from Masada to Malaya. The nearest thing to a universal maxim is that counterinsurgents who fail to see their mistakes and to adapt on the fly are doomed to lose.

The military has proved itself adaptable in Iraq. Robots now zap roadside bombs with jolts of electricity and microwave energy. Junior officers and noncommissioned officers now post accounts of the hard lessons they've learned on military Web sites for quick dissemination to their peers. Soldiers and marines now return for second and third tours, armed with a better sense of the landscape, geographic and cultural. But these better methods will not become standard across Iraq unless the president himself encourages the military to undergo strategic adaptation. Officers must be granted authority to change course by the person who bears ultimate responsibility for the outcome.

There's no shortage of good alternatives waiting in the wings. One that has recently garnered much attention is the military historian Andrew Krepinevich's "oil spot" strategy, which involves shifting the focus from killing insurgents to protecting civilians by pouring money and manpower into protected cantons where average Iraqis can see the tangible advantages of our system over Al Qaeda's.

The particulars of whatever strategy we decide to go with are, at this point, secondary. First, commitment to change must be made, and quickly. The federal government came under assault for a delay of days in its response to Hurricane Katrina. Each week's delay in Iraq costs about a dozen Americans dead, a hundred wounded and a billion dollars down the drain, plus vast harm to American prestige and the Iraqis themselves.

President Bush has the power to change the United States' prospects in Iraq. But doing so requires the courage to admit errors, and the willingness to embrace good ideas. A break with the past can be Hurricane Katrina's positive legacy.

Guard Relief Hurt By Obsolete Equipment (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0006737

By Dave Moniz

USA Today, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina exposed serious weaknesses in the National Guard's communications systems, particularly a shortage of high-tech radios and satellite communications gear, the Guard's top general said Monday.

If it's going to protect the USA while also fighting overseas, the Guard needs better equipment, Lt. Gen. Steven Blum, head of the National Guard Bureau, said in an interview with USA TODAY.

"We were underequipped," Blum said. "We don't need tanks and attack helicopters and artillery, but we must have state-of-the-art radios and communications."

Much of the Guard's best communications equipment was being used by troops fighting in Iraq and wasn't available for units helping Gulf Coast states recover from the hurricane, Blum said.

Many Guard military police in New Orleans were using obsolete radios as they sought to restore order, he said. That, combined with a crippled civilian communications network, made it harder for them to communicate. Many also lacked night-vision goggles.

After Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, about 50,000 Guard troops were sent to states battered by the storm, the largest such domestic response in Guard history, said Blum, who oversees Army and Air National Guard units in all 50 states.

The active-duty Army, which helps equip the Guard, recognizes the deficiencies, said Blum, who has met with Pentagon officials to find more money for new equipment. "The leadership of the Army is committed to addressing the problem," he said.

Last week, Sens. Kit Bond, R-Mo., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., wrote President Bush asking for $1.3 billion to buy new equipment for the Guard.

Long-standing shortages and the stress of fighting wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have left the Guard with "a perilously low level of equipment available for natural disasters," the senators wrote.

Only 34% of the Guard's equipment is available for use in the USA, the letter said. The worst shortages are in trucks, night-vision goggles, engineering equipment and communications gear, the letter said. The Guard has historically used hand-me-down equipment from the active-duty military. For example, the Army Guard is using radios from the Vietnam War era and needs 37,000 newer radios, according to a recent Guard budget briefing paper posted on its website.

Two wars and a recruiting shortfall have taxed the 350,000-member Army National Guard this year. At one point, about 40% of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq were from the Guard or Reserves.

Army Abandons Plan To Borrow From Funds For Troops' Vehicles (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Pentagon reversed a plan to ease the Army's year-end cash crunch by borrowing from funds dedicated to buying better armored vehicles for troops in Iraq.

The $300 million-plus transfer had met strong behind-the-scenes opposition in Congress over the past week. The skirmish underscores the budget pressure on the military, given the tempo of operations in the war, rising fuel costs and competing priorities like the Hurricane Katrina recovery.

"We did get some people excited. It raised the hair on the back of their necks," said Lt. Gen. Jerry Sinn, a top Army budget official, who confirmed the reversal in an interview yesterday. He said he knew in advance the appearances could be awkward but said the transfers were never intended to be more than a "temporary loan" that would be repaid before impeding production.

Nonetheless, Gen. Sinn said defense officials had "blinked a little bit" at the proposal. And lawmakers said the fact that the Army would consider touching such sensitive funds -- after all the public attention to the armor issue -- showed the pressure to keep down the costs of the war.

"They're desperate. They're under tremendous pressure," said Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) a Marine veteran and senior member of the House Appropriations Committee, who had a heated telephone conversation last week with Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, about the request.

The Army accounts for the greatest share of the war costs in Iraq and Afghanistan, now estimated to be running at $6.7 billion a month. That is markedly higher that what was assumed in the spring, when Congress approved a supplemental war-spending bill that included $17.48 billion for Army operations -- more than $200 million above the Pentagon's request.

Higher fuel costs have since played havoc with these numbers. Further complicating matters, Congress has yet to complete action on the 2006 Pentagon budget. That means -- unlike most years since the war began -- the military could be subject to the vagaries of whatever interim spending resolution is agreed to in coming weeks.

Some conservatives, alarmed by the cost of the Katrina recovery, want a tightly written stopgap bill. But the Army would be squeezed unless some adjustment is made to reflect the fuller costs of the war.

DOJ_NMG_0006738

"The Army's really running close; they are trying not to appear to be spending a lot of money," said Rep. Bill Young (R., Fla.), the former chairman of the Appropriations Committee who now oversees the defense budget. "I think the OMB [Office of Management and Budget] is trying to keep down the image of spending."

The proposed transfers were outlined in a 15-page budget plan to shift an estimated $1.43 billion among Army accounts to meet operations costs for the final weeks of the fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30. The documents were forwarded to Congress Sept. 7, and both Defense Daily and Inside the Army have reported on the request. Gen. Sinn's comments yesterday were the first official Army confirmation that the request would be modified.

Absent some action, Pentagon officials said the Army wouldn't be able to pay its bills. To find savings within its own budget, the Army decided to tap a number of procurement accounts important to protecting forces in Iraq and restoring damaged equipment.

These included the purchase of mortars and trucks, but none was more sensitive than those involving armored vehicles. An estimated $152.8 million was to come from funds to install armor on existing equipment. An additional $155 million would be taken from funds to purchase heavily armored Humvees.

The proposal was subject to veto by the major defense committees, which have 15 days to review the requests. From the outset, lawmakers were surprised that the office of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld hadn't come forward with alternative funding sources for the Army.

That is occurring now. Gen. Sinn said the Army request has been modified to tap funds in an Air Force capital account and a second more-generic account, the Iraq Freedom Fund, which is under Mr. Rumsfeld's direct control. New papers reflecting these changes have been forwarded to Congress, and Mr. Young said he expected the changes will be cleared. "When our soldiers are involved in combat, they should get everything they need," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-Tyco Execs Receive Prison Sentences (FINDLAW/AP)

By Samuel Maull, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 20, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former CEO of Tyco International, was sentenced Monday to eight and one-third years to 25 years in prison Monday for stealing hundreds of millions of dollars from the company.

His codefendant, former Tyco finance chief Mark Swartz, received the same sentence, which means they will be eligible for parole after eight years and four months.

The judge also ordered them to pay a total of $134 million in restitution. In addition, Kozlowski was fined $70 million and Swartz $35 million.

Family members wept in the gallery as the sentences were imposed.

The sentences end a case that exposed the executives' extravagant lifestyle after pilfering some $600 million from the company including a $2 million toga birthday party for Kozlowski's wife on a Mediterranean island and an $18 million Manhattan apartment with a $6,000 shower curtain.

Kozlowski, 58, and Swartz, 44, were convicted in June after a four-month trial on 22 counts of grand larceny, falsifying business records, securities fraud and conspiracy. It was their second trial - the first ended in mistrial after a juror said she received threats following reports that she made an "OK" signal to the defense team.

Kozlowski and Swartz join a line of other executives sent off to prison in a wave of white-collar scandals that shook corporate America and outraged the public after thousands of people lost their jobs and pension nest-eggs.

WorldCom Chairman Bernard Ebbers was sentenced to 25 years in prison for the $11 billion accounting fraud that toppled the telecommunications company that emerged from bankrutpcy as MCI Inc. Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison for his role in the looting and fraud at that cable TV company. His son and former finance chief, Timothy Rigas, got 20 years.

Former Tyco Executives Sentenced To Up To 25 Years In Prison (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 20, 2005

The two former top executives of Tyco International Ltd. were each sentenced Monday to prison terms of 8 1/3 to 25 years on charges they stole more than $150 million in unauthorized loans and bonuses from the company.

DOJ_NMG_0006739

L. Dennis Kozlowski, 58, Tyco's former chief executive officer, and Mark H. Swartz, 44, the former chief financial officer, were led away in handcuffs after Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Michael Obus handed down the sentence. The judge denied their request to delay incarceration while they applied to be released on bail pending appeal of their convictions.

In the course of their three-year-long prosecution, the two men, particularly Kozlowski, have become symbols of corporate greed and excess. But the judge put the case in straightforward terms in imposing sentence.

Despite many unusual characteristics and complications, he said, "the heart of the case is basic larceny."

First indicted in September 2002, the two executives were convicted in June on several counts of grand larceny, securities fraud, conspiracy and falsifying business records. The judge issued separate sentences on the other counts but said those would be served concurrently with the grand larceny sentence.

Justice Obus also ordered Kozlowski to pay $97 million in restitution to Tyco and $70 million in fines. Swartz was ordered to pay $37 million in restitution and $35 million in fines.

The restitution amounts were tied to the amounts of bonuses the two men were found to have stolen. The defense had maintained throughout the trial that the bonuses were legitimate and fully approved by Tyco's board of directors.

Though tough, Obus' sentence was less than that requested by the prosecution. Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer had asked the court to impose the maximum sentence of 15 to 30 years "to send the signal that, here in the financial capital of the world, we will not tolerate theft ... no matter who you are."

Heimer said Kozlowski had been found guilty of the largest larceny ever prosecuted in New York state and, as such, a 15-year term would not be "unduly harsh."

In urging a tough sentence, prosecutors said Kozlowski and Swartz should not be treated more leniently than other criminal defendants because of their backgrounds. Rather, they argued, the executives should be treated more harshly because they turned to crime despite already possessing every advantage and opportunity.

The defense lawyers argued for leniency on the grounds that both defendants were fundamentally good people with close ties to family and community and histories of charitable contributions. Both men submitted to the court scores of letters by family, friends and colleagues attesting to their good character.

Stephen Kaufman, Kozlowski's chief lawyer said only "vitriolic vengeance" would be served by the sentence requested by the prosecution.

In attacking the prosecution's attempts to have the maximum sentence imposed, Swartz's lawyer, Charles Stillman, invoked Army lawyer Joseph Welch's 1954 denunciation of Senator Joseph McCarthy.

"Have you no sense of decency?" Stillman asked rhetorically. "Have you no sense of decency at long last?"

Each of the defendants spoke briefly on his own behalf. Kozlowski said he was a different man than had been depicted by the prosecution and in the media. He said he understood he would be incarcerated but asked the judge to be as lenient as possible.

In asking for leniency, Swartz said he had always tried to live an honest life and to benefit his family and community.

"I never thought I would be in the position I'm in today nor did I ever fear it," he said.

In handing down sentence, Obus said his view of the defendants was not as "stark" as that of the prosecutors, who had mocked the defendants' claims of charity and questioned the motives of some who testified about their character.

LETTERS CONSIDERED

The judge said he had carefully considered all the letters he had received from people regarding the defendants' character. The judge said he, unlike the prosecution, believed most of the letters were genuine. He said they depicted men whose behavior towards friends and family was sharply at odds with the conduct of which they were convicted.

The long sentences recently given to white-collar criminals has spurred debate on whether such criminals, treated lightly in the past, are now being treated too harshly.

Former assistant Manhattan district attorney Ronald Blum, now a partner at Manatt, Phelps & Phillips who also teaches white-collar criminal law at Fordham School of Law, said such sentiments had some merit but he said the sentence given to Kozlowski and Swartz sounded "pretty sensible" to him.

Given the scale of the thefts, he said, "I don't think the judge could have gotten away with less than that with a straight face."

State judges have more flexibility in sentencing than federal judges, who are subject to strict sentencing guidelines. The Tyco executives' sentences are considerably lower than that recently meted out in federal court to former WorldCom CEO Bernard Ebbers, who was sentenced to 25 years in prison in July.

Kozlowski and Swartz will be eligible for parole after serving 8 1/2 years of their sentence. With good behavior, they will be able to shave one-sixth off that time as well.

DOJ_NMG_0006740

On the other hand, the state prison system lacks the relatively comfortable minimum security facilities in which federal white-collar inmates are typically incarcerated. Blum said the realities of state prisons were a likely though unacknowledged influence on state judges' sentencing decisions.

Kaufman warned the judge Monday that any sentence over 72 months would likely mean his client would be placed in a maximum security lockup.

The prison at which the two men serve their sentences will be determined by the Department of Corrections. Justice Obus said he would tell the department that neither of the men should be regarded as a security risk.

Tyco's Kozlowski To Spend Up To 25 Years In Jail (FT)

By Christopher Bowe

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

Dennis Kozlowski, the former head of Tyco, and Mark Swartz, his chief financial officer, were on Monday sentenced to at least eight years in prison for stealing $150m and fraud while at the US conglomerate.

The two men were also ordered to pay about $240m in penalties and restitution. A New York state court Judge Michael Obus ordered them to repay $134m to Tyco for stealing a string of unauthorised bonuses and compensation between 1999 and 2001 - $97m from Mr Kozlowski and $37m from Mr Swartz. The court also fined Mr Kozlowski $70m and Mr Swartz $35m.

After sentencing, Mr Kozlowski, 58, and Mr Swartz, 45, were led from the courtroom in handcuffs. They immediately began their sentence of eight years and four months to 25 years in state prison, depending on the decisions of parole officials.

The two men were convicted in June in their second trial for theft and fraudulent gains of more than $650m. They were found guilty on 22 counts of grand larceny, conspiracy, securities fraud and falsifying business records. Before the sentencing, Mr Kozlowski asked the judge to be "as lenient as possible", while Mr Swartz asked to be quickly returned to his family.

But Manhattan prosecutor Owen Heimer said the men had committed theft and fraud on an "unprecedented and staggering scale", the largest ever in the state.

They become the latest in a series of high-profile executives sentenced to significant jail time, including former WorldCom chief Bernie Ebbers' 25 years.

Monday's sentences could see Mr Kozlowski and Mr Swartz leaving prison in eight years, even potentially five years depending on good behaviour and parole.

Orin Snyder, attorney at Gibson, Dunn Crutcher LLP and a former prosecutor said: "The sentencing sends the message that the sentence is harsh, but gives flexibility for serving less time."

Lawyers for Mr Kozlowski and Mr Swartz have vowed to appeal against the guilty verdicts, and to file for release on bail while the appeal is pending. The two executives must serve time in state prison and most likely time in maximum security prison, which can be a dangerous environment.

"For these two former executives, even several years in a state prison will be a very long stretch of time," said Robert Mintz, attorney at McCarter & English, and former federal prosecutor.

Tyco also is still under Mr Kozlowski's shadow. Mr Heimer told the court he believed that SEC investigators had recommended bringing $1bn accounting fraud charges against Tyco. The company said talks continued with the SEC on settling an investigation into accounting from 1996-2002 under Mr Kozlowski's watch, but it "would not require Tyco to restate any of its financial statements".

Even in jail, Mr Kozlowski's legal troubles continue. The judge tentatively set October 21 to potentially begin a case alleging he evaded sales tax on art purchases.

Ex-Tyco Officers Get 8 To 25 Years (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former chief executive of Tyco International who was convicted of looting the company of $150 million, was sentenced yesterday to 81/3 to 25 years in a New York State prison, the latest corporate figure to be handed a lengthy prison term in a corruption case.

Mark H. Swartz, his chief lieutenant, received the same sentence for his role in the thefts and fraud. The two men were convicted in June after a four-month retrial.

Judge Michael J. Obus of State Supreme Court in Manhattan also ordered Mr. Kozlowski to pay $167 million in restitution and fines. Mr. Swartz was ordered to pay $72 million in fines and restitution.

The sentencing follows a parade of other substantial terms imposed on former chief executives convicted of white-collar crimes, most notably Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom, who received a prison term of 25 years, and John J. Rigas of the cable operator Adelphia Communications, who was sentenced to 15 years. Those sentences - in federal courts - were seen as sending a message to deter huge corporate frauds in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0006741

The Tyco sentencing may be the last high-profile corporate misconduct before the most prominent one of them all: the trial next year of Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling of Enron.

Handing down the sentence in a packed courtroom, Judge Obus said yesterday: "The crimes at issue here were violations of the defendants' positions of trust and their fiduciary duty on a grand scale. They caused damage to Tyco and to others, including the shareholders who are Tyco's owners and who, like the investing public, generally should be able to rely on the integrity of the management of publicly traded companies."

Mr. Kozlowski, 58, became a symbol of corporate greed for a $6,000 shower curtain, as well as a $2 million birthday party in Sardinia for his wife that was partly paid for by the company. He stared straight ahead, overwhelmed, as the sentence was read aloud. Mr. Swartz, 45, looked down at the floor.

The two men, both dressed in gray suits and starched-white shirts, were then handcuffed behind their backs and led away by court officers. Mr. Swartz wistfully winked at his wife and parents. Mr. Kozlowski's wife, wearing sunglasses, wiped away tears that had run down her face as his two daughters, also crying, consoled each other.

Lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz said they planned to seek bail pending appeal from an appellate court today or tomorrow. The two men spent last night in the Bernard B. Kerik Complex near the courthouse. If their lawyers are unsuccessful, the two men will be transferred to Rikers Island by the end of the week to be processed and will most likely serve their time in a maximum-security state prison like Attica.

The State Department of Correctional Services will determine where they serve their time. Other former executives recently convicted in federal courts - including Mr. Ebbers - remain free pending their appeals.

Most legal specialists said yesterday that the sentence imposed by Judge Obus on Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz was measured but fair.

"It would be a mistake to confuse this with leniency," said Robert A. Mintz, a former federal prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English. "For these two former executives, even several years in a state prison will be a very long stretch of time."

The two men will be eligible for parole after eight years and four months, and could be put in a work-release program after serving at least six years, according to State Department of Correctional Services guidelines.

Still, they may yet fare worse than their white-collar counterparts in federal prisons because New York generally requires that criminals with sentences longer than six years go to maximum-security prisons, to be mixed among men convicted of murder and other violent crimes.

An assistant Manhattan district attorney, Owen E. Heimer, had asked the judge to impose the maximum of 15 to 30 years, contending that Mr. Kozlowski "should not be shown any leniency," as Mr. Heimer compared Tyco to Enron.

In perhaps the most dramatic moment of the hearing, Mr. Heimer read aloud from a letter Mr. Kozlowski had written in 1995 to a Houston judge overseeing the sentencing of a Tyco employee who had been convicted of stealing from the company; Mr. Kozlowski urged that a maximum sentence be imposed. Mr. Heimer said of Mr. Kozlowski, "What the defendant said on that occasion applies on this occasion."

But Judge Obus rejected the harshest sentence and explicitly tried to distance this case from corporate corruption cases against executives at Enron and WorldCom. Unlike Tyco, a conglomerate whose products include security systems and medical devices, those two companies were forced to file for bankruptcy as a result of the accounting frauds.

"It is worth repeating, as the jury panel was instructed at the outset, that this is not about any other case," Judge Obus said. "This is not a matter in which the fraudulent distortion of the records reflecting the financial health of the company have been shown to have been so distorted as to precipitate the company's collapse. That apparently is some other case, perhaps more than one other case, but that is not the case that was before us here."

Before being sentenced, Mr. Kozlowski asked the judge for mercy, pointing to more than 130 letters submitted on his behalf by friends and family.

In explaining why he did not give the maximum sentence, Judge Obus cited the letters and said: "I think the letters are genuinely sincere and they show aspects of the defendants' lives that are at odds with the conduct which has brought them before this court. They certainly make it all the more difficult to fully grasp, even with hindsight, how the defendants, with all they had going for them, managed to get themselves into this disastrous position, but that is what they have done."

While the two men's sentences are lower than Mr. Ebbers's, they are still much higher than those of many of the high-profile executives convicted of white-collar crimes in the 1980's. Michael R. Milken of Drexel Burnham Lambert, for instance, was sentenced to three and a half years and served less than two years for securities fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0006742

"The concern that too many executives were misbehaving has caused prosecutors and judges to want to send a much stronger warning signal than they felt the need to send before," said Jennifer H. Arlen, a law professor and expert in business crime at New York University.

Mr. Kozlowski still faces charges of evading more than $1 million in state sales taxes on artwork. Judge Obus scheduled a hearing for Oct. 21. It is unclear whether prosecutors will continue to pursue that case.

The men also face a barrage of civil suits, claiming billions of dollars in damages, from Tyco and shareholders. The men made hundreds of millions of dollars while at Tyco, but it is unclear how much money either Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz will have left after paying restitution and fines.

In the two years before his fall in 2001, Mr. Kozlowski made more than $330 million in profits from exercising stock options and selling stock grants, in addition to his salary and bonus of about $5 million a year. But his lawyers have suggested that after the civil litigation, on top of the fines and restitution ordered yesterday, he could be bankrupt.

There is also a civil dispute between Mr. Kozlowski and Tyco over whether tens of millions of dollars of deferred compensation should still be paid.

The first case against Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz was declared a mistrial in April 2004, when a juror holding out for an acquittal made what appeared to be an "O.K." signal to the defense and subsequently received a threatening letter from a stranger, upending the trial.

Yesterday, as the gallery of courtroom spectators spilled into the hallway, that juror, Ruth B. Jordan, shuffled out. She said she had come to watch the sentencing. "It's not as bad as he could have done," she said, "but I still think it's unduly harsh."

Ex-Tyco Chiefs Whisked Off To Prison (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK — Former Tyco executives Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz were sentenced to 81/3 to 25 years in prison Monday for looting nearly $600 million from their firm in a scheme that came to symbolize corporate greed during the bull market of the 1990s.

New York Supreme Court Justice Michael Obus also ordered the two to pay more than $134 million in restitution, and imposed fines of $70 million on Kozlowski and $35 million on Swartz.

Kozlowski and Swartz asked Obus for leniency. But the judge ordered them imprisoned immediately, despite arguments from defense lawyers, who said they would seek bail pending an appeal.

Kozlowski, 58, and Swartz, 45, both dressed in dark gray suits, were led away in handcuffs as some relatives cried quietly.

Swartz managed a quick, reassuring glance over his shoulder at his wife, Karen, as he was led away.

The former executives were taken to the jail adjoining the courthouse for initial processing, said Thomas Antenen, a spokesman for the New York City Department of Correction.

Obus called the grand larceny and other charges underlying the convictions “extremely serious,” but distinguished the Tyco case from other white-collar crime cases, such as WorldCom.

The prison terms Obus imposed fell short of the 15-year-to-30 year maximum sought by prosecutors, but far higher than the one-year-to-three-year minimum sought by the defense. John Coffee, a securities law expert at Columbia University Law School, said the two would have fared worse in federal court.

“They will serve far less time,” Coffee said, “but it will probably be more painful time. There is no Club Fed in the New York State Correctional system.”

Under New York law, Kozlowski, who is Tyco's former CEO, and Swartz, the company's former CFO, must serve a minimum of six years and 11 months before release, said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Correctional Services.

The sentencing capped a case etched in the national consciousness by Kozlowski's $6,000 shower curtain and $2 million birthday bash for his wife.

In a final legal twist, Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer said that the Securities and Exchange Commission's staff is recommending an accounting fraud case against Tyco for actions taken under Kozlowski and Swartz.

Tyco spokesman David Polk said the firm recently took a $50 million charge to cover a potential SEC settlement.

Ex-Tyco Officers Sentenced (WP)

By Ben White

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006743

NEW YORK, Sept. 19 -- A state judge on Monday sentenced former Tyco International Ltd. executives L. Dennis Kozlowski and Mark H. Swartz to 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison for looting the company of hundreds of millions of dollars to pay for lavish parties, luxurious homes and extravagances such as a $6,000 shower curtain.

In a case that came to symbolize corporate greed, state Supreme Court Judge Michael J. Obus also ordered Kozlowski and Swartz to pay nearly $240 million in fines and restitution. Kozlowski and Swartz were immediately taken into custody and led from a packed courtroom in handcuffs as family members of both men sobbed. The men are likely to serve at least part of their sentences in one of New York's 16 maximum-security state prisons.

The sentences for Kozlowski and Swartz follow lengthy terms meted out to other white-collar defendants convicted in a wave of criminal cases that followed the collapse of the Internet bubble and multibillion-dollar frauds at companies such as WorldCom Inc. and Enron Corp.

Former WorldCom chairman Bernard J. Ebbers, 64, was sentenced to 25 years in prison for orchestrating an $11 billion accounting fraud at his company. Because of Ebbers's age, that could amount to a life sentence. John J. Rigas, the 80-year-old founder of Adelphia Communications Corp., received 15 years in prison for stealing millions from the cable company for personal extravagances, hiding more than $2.3 billion in debt and lying to investors. Rigas's son and former Adelphia chief financial officer Timothy J. Rigas was given 20 years in prison for his role in the scheme.

Prosecutors and many shareholder groups say long sentences are necessary to deter future abuses and restore investor confidence. But some defense lawyers question the extent to which a few high-profile cases will deter bad behavior at smaller public companies that present less tempting targets for prosecutors. "Officers and directors of major corporations, multinational corporations, clearly get the message," said defense attorney Jacob S. Frenkel. "The question is whether the message has been conveyed thoroughly to officers and directors at small and mid-size companies."

Kozlowski and Swartz will be able to cut one-sixth off of their 8 1/3 -year minimum sentence if they behave well and take part in prison programs, said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Correctional Services. That would reduce the point at which they can be paroled to six years and 11 months. Inmates are eligible to apply for work release two years before their first possible parole date, and parole officials will decide how much of the 8 1/3 to 25 years the former executives must serve. Several legal experts said it was unlikely either man would serve more than 10 years in total.

There is no parole in the federal system, under which many other white-collar defendants have been tried and sentenced.

Though their sentences may be cut shorter than other executives', the time Kozlowski and Swartz spend behind bars may be in a harsher environment. Obus did not specify where the two former executives will serve their terms. He said that decision would be made by state corrections officials. But he said he did not view either man as a security risk, indicating he would not object if they are sent to a lower-security facility.

Former prosecutor David Gourevitch, however, said there were no facilities in the state system comparable to federal minimum-security prisons such as the one where entrepreneur Martha Stewart spent her five-month sentence.

"In the federal system, outside of maximum-security places, generally people are physically safe. I don't think anybody would say that about New York state prison," Gourevitch said. "And from a state perspective, this is one of the longest sentences in a corporate fraud case that I can recall."

Foglia said that in most cases, defendants sentenced to more than six years are sent to maximum-security prisons. She said it would be several weeks before the state decides where to send Kozlowski and Swartz. In the meantime, they will stay at a holding facility known as the Tombs in Lower Manhattan and then be sent to Rikers Island, the temporary jail for New York City inmates before they are sent to state prisons.

In June, a jury found former Tyco chief executive Kozlowski, 58, and former chief financial officer Swartz, 45, guilty of criminal counts of grand larceny, conspiracy, securities fraud and eight of nine counts of falsifying business records.

Obus imposed the same prison sentence on both men. He ordered Kozlowski to pay a $70 million fine and Swartz to pay a $35 million fine. He ordered both men to repay Tyco a combined $134.4 million in restitution of illegal bonuses and other illicit payments.

Kozlowski and Swartz each made brief statements in court Monday, asking Obus to be lenient. Lawyers for each also pleaded with the court to recognize the former executives' charitable works and the scores of letters sent on their behalf by friends and family.

Prosecutors, by contrast, asked Obus to send a message that corporate theft will be treated the same as grand larceny committed with a handgun. They asked for the maximum term of 15 to 30 years for both men.

In imposing the sentence, Obus said, "The heart of this case is basic larceny" and described the charges as "extremely serious." He expressed befuddlement at Kozlowski's and Swartz's plights, at one point asking, "how the defendants, with all they had going for them, managed to get themselves into this disastrous position."

DOJ_NMG_0006744

Attorneys for Kozlowski and Swartz said they would seek to have their clients released on bail pending appeal of their convictions. At the sentencing hearing on Monday, state prosecutors said the Securities and Exchange Commission staff had recommended that the agency bring an accounting fraud case against Tyco. Tyco has said it expects to settle the SEC suit and has set aside $50 million for that purpose. The SEC often simultaneously files and settles accounting cases.

Tyco Figures Will Be Jailed At Least 7 Years (WSJ)

By Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK -- In an ignominious end to their once-glittering careers, Tyco International Ltd.'s two former top executives were led away from a Manhattan courtroom with their hands cuffed behind their backs, after a New York state judge sentenced them to serve 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison for looting their former company.

The lengthy prison sentences, although less than the 15-to-30-year maximum that could have been imposed, are the latest example of relatively harsh punishment being meted out to top executives in the recent wave of corporate-fraud trials. The two men were ordered to pay fines and restitution totaling about $240 million.

L. Dennis Kozlowski, Tyco's former chief executive, and Mark H. Swartz, the company's former finance chief, each were convicted in June of 22 criminal charges related to looting their former employer of more than $150 million. The pair had once been among the most powerful and best-paid executives at an American company, helping build Tyco into a conglomerate with $36 billion in annual revenue. Tyco has been under new management since mid-2002.

Under New York state law, they will have to serve nearly seven years at minimum: specifically, at least six years, 11 months and nine days before being eligible for parole, subject to good behavior and other factors.

Both defendants have said they will appeal. Mr. Kozlowski's lead attorney, Stephen Kaufman, said immediately after the sentencing hearing that he will be applying for bail for his client pending appeal. Charles Stillman, the lead attorney for Mr. Swartz, said he will be "pursuing appropriate remedies for Mark's situation." In New York, defendants can choose to bring bail applications before any judge, and often try to choose judges known for their leniency.

In New York, inmates with more than six years to serve until they are eligible for parole are usually sent to one of the state's maximum-security prisons, which house 22,000 mostly violent offenders, said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the New York State Department of Correctional Services. Prisoners in such facilities are housed in cells, and work six hours a day at tasks like sweeping, painting, or working in the library, she said, adding that inmates generally are paid $1.05 a day.

Separately, Tyco is close to an agreement to pay $50 million to settle Securities and Exchange Commission fraud charges related to accounting misdeeds during the period when Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz were in charge, according to a person familiar with the matter. Lawyers at yesterday's sentencing hearing first revealed the likely SEC charges, with a prosecutor saying the SEC staff was recommending that Tyco be charged with inflating its income by about $1 billion.

During two high-profile criminal trials -- the first ended in 2004 in a mistrial -- prosecutors showed how Tyco had spent more than $30 million on a New York apartment for Mr. Kozlowski, and helped foot the bill for a lavish birthday party for the former Tyco chief's wife on the Italian island of Sardinia.

Although the defendants claimed the money taken from Tyco had been authorized by the company's board, prosecutors argued that not a single piece of paper backed up that contention, and the company's directors testified they were kept in the dark.

Mr. Kozlowski, 58 years old, briefly glanced back at his family as he was being led out of the courtroom. Mr. Swartz, 45, smiled wanly at one of the court officers as he was led out.

In imposing the sentences, Justice Michael Obus, of the trial-level New York State Supreme Court, stressed that he wasn't sending a message about corporate fraud in general, and merely was reflecting the appropriate punishment for the serious crimes for which the two former Tyco executives were convicted.

Perhaps mindful that New York prison officials generally house those sentenced to more than six years in maximum-security facilities, Justice Obus said twice yesterday that he didn't view Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz as security risks.

In imposing financial penalties, Justice Obus ordered that Mr. Kozlowski repay about $97 million to Tyco -- the bulk of the money he was convicted of stealing -- and pay an additional $70 million in fines. Mr. Swartz was ordered to repay about $38 million, plus $35 million in fines. He had already repaid $12.5 million to Tyco. Although Justice Obus had the option of holding additional hearings on extra penalties related to the securities-fraud convictions, he opted not to do so, suggesting that civil courts could sort out the issue.

Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz are defendants in civil suits filed by Tyco and in a class-action securities lawsuit by the company's shareholders. The criminal convictions are likely to make it easier for the plaintiffs to win those suits. The defendants' considerable assets, which likely total much more than they were ordered to pay yesterday, have been frozen by the courts for more than three years.

DOJ_NMG_0006745

The sentences were less harsh than those given to some other former chief executives by federal courts. Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom Inc., now MCI Inc., received a 25-year sentence after being convicted of masterminding a massive accounting fraud. Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas, who is 80 years old, was sentenced to 15 years. Both are out on bail while they appeal.

Before sentencing, Mr. Kozlowski addressed the court, asking the judge to be "as lenient as possible" and to consider the more than 130 letters submitted to the court by his supporters as a more "accurate" portrait of his life. Mr. Kozlowski's attorney stressed his charitable works, among other things.

Mr. Swartz, who was derided by prosecutors before sentencing as a perjurer for his testimony during both trials, told the judge that he had "always held myself to a high standard of integrity and honesty" and said every word of his own testimony "was the complete and honest truth." He asked to be returned to his family "as soon as possible" because his family life was a matter of "vital importance."

In asking for the maximum sentence, Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer said Mr. Kozlowski was found guilty of theft and securities fraud on an "unprecedented scale," and made Tyco into a "symbol of kleptocratic management." He quoted extensively from a letter sent some years ago by Mr. Kozlowski to a Texas court, recommending a "maximum sentence" for a low-level Tyco employee convicted of embezzling less than $1 million from the company.

Ann Donnelly, another prosecutor, urged the judge to impose a harsh sentence on Mr. Swartz, whom she said was "in large part the architect of this conspiracy" and had "lied to the investing public ... over and over again just so he could enrich himself."

Ms. Foglia said prisoners generally spend several weeks in temporary facilities, and are assigned to prisons based on a number of factors, including length of term, age, health and whether they request protective custody. She said New York has a maximum-security facility near the Canadian border that houses about 250 prisoners, including a former judge, who "are unable to be incarcerated in a general population."

A Tyco spokesman, David Polk, said the company had been discussing a proposed accounting settlement with the SEC for some time. The "proposed allegations relate to Tyco's historical accounting," Mr. Polk said. "Tyco's current financial statements are not at issue." The company restated its results in 2003 going back a number of years, and has previously taken a $50 million charge to cover penalties that might result from the SEC's investigation. The company said a further restatement wasn't part of its talks with the SEC.

Ex-Tyco Execs Face $1-a-day Pay But Could Get Bail For Appeals (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK — Before their convictions, former Tyco executives Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz were known for reaping multimillion-dollar corporate salaries.

Within weeks, they'll have to get used to earning $1.05 a day in a maximum-security state prison.

“They will be assigned a job, and that's what they'll earn,” said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the New York State Department of Correctional Services.

“Every prisoner must work, in the laundry, in the kitchen or somewhere else.”

Lawyers for Kozlowski and Swartz hope to avoid that outcome for at least a while by seeking bail pending appeals of their clients' convictions.

They have a low chance of succeeding, because New York appeals courts generally “are less willing to let individuals stay out,” said Ronald Blum, a former Manhattan prosecutor who is now a partner at the law firm Manatt Phelps & Phillips.

Unless defense lawyers prevail, the former executives would be transferred within 10 days from city custody — where they were to spend Monday night — to the state correction system. Foglia said Kozlowski and Swartz would likely first be sent to the Downstate Correctional Facility, roughly 60 miles north of New York City, for four to six weeks of processing and classification.

There, corrections officials would assess medical and other needs before choosing the prison where they would spend most of their sentences.

“Their notoriety is going to play a factor in this as well. We have to take into account their safety in prison,” Foglia said.

One possibility, she said, would be to assign Kozlowski and Swartz to the Clinton Correctional Facility, an Upstate New York prison that has a special 250-man unit for prisoners whose personal safety could be in jeopardy behind bars. Convicted police officers, judges and similar defendants have served time in the unit, Foglia said.

DOJ_NMG_0006746

Once housed in their assigned prison, Kozlowski and Swartz would be eligible for daily visits. But their days would be subject to a narrowly restricted regimen.

"You're going to be awakened. You're going to work a day, and then your evenings are your own personal time," Foglia said.

The two would be eligible for transfer to a lower-security facility within roughly two years, Foglia said. In about three years, they could seek assignment to a work-release program. Good behavior is a prerequisite for either type of transfer, Foglia said.

The sentences imposed on Kozlowski and Swartz are shorter than the 25-year term recently received by former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers, another well-known white-collar convict.

But the prospect of state prison time will likely "serve as a very, very significant deterrent to anyone who would be tempted to similar actions," said Marcel Kahan, a corporate law specialist at New York University School of Law.

Charles Stillman, Swartz's lead defense lawyer, said he gave his client optimistic advice to help deal with the prospect of years behind bars.

"It's the first day of the rest of his life," Stillman said.

Tyco Endgame (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

There aren't any $6,000 shower curtains in New York state prisons, where Tyco felons Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz will be enjoying all or part of the next 25 years. The former CEO and CFO were sentenced yesterday for their roles in looting $600 million from their company and paying off one or more directors to avert their eyes. They won't become eligible for parole until about seven years.

Thus concludes one of the sorrier chapters in U.S. business history. And while it took a while -- the first Tyco trial ended in mistrial -- the outcome strikes us as just. Not because of their greed -- there's no law against lavish living yet -- but because of their crimes. Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz were convicted in June on 22 counts of grand larceny and conspiracy. The verdicts were a victory for Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, who last week survived a tough primary challenge.

Of all the fin de siècle corporate scandals, the Tyco heist has always seemed the most audacious, a case of stealing money in plain sight. If you want to liven up the conversation at a business lunch, mention former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling and Chairman Ken Lay and whether they were complicit in the fraud for which several former executives have been convicted. There are still those who believe former WorldCom CEO Bernard Ebbers was unaware of the fraud that was taking place under his nose, despite his conviction. The Tyco scandal didn't inspire such ambiguities.

Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz aren't headed for Club Fed by the way; under New York correctional policy, criminals with their sentences usually serve their time in maximum-security prisons. In addition, they were ordered to pay restitution and fines of $175 million. A case of justice in plain sight.

The Crime And The Time (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

The cries for blood have certainly quieted since the recent corporate crime spree first made headlines with the disasters at Enron and WorldCom. Some cried foul when Bernard Ebbers of WorldCom and John Rigas of Adelphia Communications got sentences that meant those white-haired white-collar criminals would probably die in prison. Tomorrow night, Martha Stewart's version of the reality show "The Apprentice" will have its premiere amid her burst of postprison popularity.

In this morning-after atmosphere, when tempers have cooled, comes the news that the former Tyco chief executive, Dennis Kozlowski, and the ex-chief financial officer, Mark H. Swartz, have been sentenced to a minimum of 81/3 years and a maximum of 25 years in prison plus millions in fines and restitution. This is no cause for celebration. Their lives ruined, they face hard jail time. But that does not change one fact: they deserve it and they should serve it.

There always was a hint of buffoonery to the Kozlowski proceedings, with the $6,000 shower curtain and the $2 million birthday party for his wife, that diverted attention from very serious crimes. Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz were charged with stealing $150 million and earning $430 million in sneaky sales of falsely pumped-up stock. They were convicted on 22 counts of grand larceny, conspiracy, falsifying business records and securities fraud.

Lenient commentators were quick to point out that there are no "Club Fed"-style prisons in New York. Well, any small-time embezzler convicted in New York State faces the same horror of bunking with violent criminals. A car thief convicted of 10,000 counts of grand theft auto - and those would have to be luxury cars even to come close to the crimes committed at Tyco - would be pleased with a probable sentence of 10 to 12 years.

The persistent myth that a robber in a suit and tie instead of jeans and a T-shirt deserves a prison with better amenities should be put to rest for good.

DOJ_NMG_0006747

In Bermuda, AIG Helped Shape A Legendary Corporate Haven (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson and Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

HAMILTON, Bermuda -- When insurance tycoon Cornelius Vander Starr came ashore just after World War II to set up the overseas operation of the company now known as American International Group Inc., this British colony 900 miles off South Carolina was a remote trading post primarily inhabited by descendants of colonists, slaves and shipwreck survivors.

Over the next half-century, AIG executives helped island officials shape a legal landscape that made Bermuda what it boasts is "the risk capital of world." Some of these laws and regulations have helped AIG in particular; others have favored insurers generally. Together they transformed the 21-square-mile island into the global center of the offshore-insurance industry, claiming more than $200 billion in assets.

AIG has profited handsomely in its custom-built corporate haven. Now the question is whether the company, even after helping to create a business nirvana, crossed the line of legality to obscure its activities there.

In May, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer sued AIG and its former chairman, Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, alleging that for many years, the giant insurer improperly used affiliates in Bermuda to burnish its financial results -- either by hiding losses with the affiliates or claiming their gains as its own. In some instances, the suit alleges, AIG failed to disclose its relationships with Bermuda companies, as required by American law.

AIG is in preliminary settlement talks with Mr. Spitzer's office, people familiar with the situation said. Mr. Greenberg's lawyers have said that he has done nothing wrong and will fight the civil allegations. The most prominent figure in his industry, Mr. Greenberg, 80 years old, was forced out of AIG in March amid regulatory inquiries that go far beyond the company's activities in Bermuda.

Also at the center of the Bermuda storm is a Greenberg subordinate named L. Michael Murphy. A former lawyer for the Internal Revenue Service, Mr. Murphy used to reach his AIG office in Hamilton by rowing a small boat from his elegant home across the turquoise waters of a narrow harbor. Since the 1970s, he had helped write local laws and lobbied for Bermuda in Washington -- all to AIG's advantage.

But in March, the New York-based company fired Mr. Murphy for allegedly refusing to cooperate with AIG lawyers gathering information for investigators from New York and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In his suit, filed in a New York state court, Attorney General Spitzer says that Mr. Murphy tried to destroy evidence in Bermuda potentially relevant to a pending investigation of the company's accounting.

Mr. Murphy, 62, wasn't named as a defendant in the New York suit. In an interview earlier this year, his attorney denied the document-destruction allegation and said Mr. Murphy has done nothing wrong.

The history of AIG's Bermuda operation illuminates how entwined the island is with the insurer's broader accounting troubles. This history also raises questions about whether the lightly regulated offshore-insurance industry facilitates abuses. Both state and federal regulators are looking at whether other insurers, as well as AIG, have misstated relationships with offshore affiliates.

An analysis by The Wall Street Journal of thousands of pages of regulatory filings shows that from 1995 through 2004, at least $2.48 billion flowed back and forth between AIG and eight of its offshore affiliates either domiciled in or run from Bermuda.

In many instances, AIG disclosed its involvement on both sides of deals. But in other cases, AIG's connections to the affiliates were obscure, potentially misleading both regulators and investors. Federal securities laws and state insurance statutes require detailed disclosure of any transactions involving "related parties." That requirement aims at preventing companies from hiding financial problems by means of contrived deals.

AIG has acknowledged that it accounted improperly for certain relationships with Bermuda affiliates. In May, in response to state and federal inquiries and investor lawsuits, the company restated five years of financial results, in part to correct this accounting.

AIG said that, beyond the items it has restated, its activity in Bermuda has been accounted for properly. Its operations in Bermuda reflect its dominant role in the world insurance market, and its transactions with the eight Bermuda companies are a small fraction of its total business, a company spokesman said in a statement. "Our offshore capabilities have helped us provide cost-effective insurance coverage to our customers and manage AIG's own risk retention efficiently," the spokesman added.

AIG Act

The arrival in Bermuda of a big U.S. company was unprecedented and required passage of a special law: the American International Co. Ltd. Act of 1947. The act created an exception to Bermuda's local-ownership requirement and exempted AIG from taxes on income that came from outside Bermuda. Two years later, Bermuda extended the benefits to other foreign companies.

DOJ_NMG_0006748

AIG swiftly became one of the island's biggest employers, hiring scores of workers. In a further accommodation, Bermuda's parliament passed another law in 1951 making the insurer the first foreign company allowed to purchase island real estate.

Mr. Murphy joined AIG's Bermuda operations in 1972. A tall, athletic man who in his youth knocked around South America playing rugby, he typically wore expensive but rumpled suits, according to friends. Before coming to the insurer, he had worked at the IRS, helping to write intricate rules that sought to bolster domestic U.S. investment by imposing higher taxes on interest Americans received from foreign bonds.

Mr. Murphy put his knowledge of international tax law to use for his new employer. In 1973, he was named corporate secretary of one of AIG's oldest and most important island operations: Starr International Co. AIG's top executives have used the Panamanian corporation operated from Bermuda to control a deferred-compensation plan for the most senior company managers.

In the mid-1970s, Mr. Murphy helped island politicians draft a new insurance law for Bermuda that made the colony even more attractive to U.S. companies and insurers, according to David Gibbons, a former Bermuda premier, and Mansfield "James" Brock, a former financial secretary. "He gave us a lot of advice on not so much the insurance act itself but on how Bermuda's insurance regulation compared with and related to that of the United States," Mr. Brock said. Mr. Murphy advised the government on the standards it would need to attract business from the U.S. and avoid antagonizing American regulators, the former officials said.

The Bermuda Insurance Act of 1978 gave insurers broad discretion when investing income from premiums. It did little to regulate insurance rates or companies' conduct, and it set minimal requirements for the capital insurers had to have on hand. In all of these regards, Bermuda made itself a much less demanding host than American states, which regulate U.S. carriers.

Still, American regulators and investors tacitly accepted the looser Bermuda standards, in part because the island did require that insurers document their solvency annually. Bermuda's use of familiar British law also reassured Americans. Insurance-industry executives point out that Bermuda's permissiveness and lack of bureaucracy allow AIG and other carriers to respond more quickly to American businesses squeezed by price increases or limited coverage -- especially after disasters such as the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "Bermuda has a strong, longstanding relationship and tradition of cooperation with U.S. regulatory bodies," said Cheryl-Ann Lister, chairman of the Bermuda Monetary Authority, a government agency.

Bermuda's 1978 act also created the Insurance Advisory Committee, a private-sector body that works with the government and has the effective clout to prevent any further regulation opposed by the industry. The panel was set up "to avoid government developing a bureaucracy," a former AIG executive named Brian Hall explained in a speech in 1985 quoted in the book "Held Captive: A History of International Insurance in Bermuda."

From 1980 through 2001, one member of the advisory committee was Joseph C.H. Johnson, another veteran AIG executive. The grandson of a local farmer, he joined the company in 1954 as a 17-year-old accounting trainee. For much of the 1980s, one of his duties at the committee was to help oversee which companies received government permission to form new insurers on the island -- an area of great interest to AIG, which was the sponsor of a number of new firms. Mr. Johnson, 67, received the Bermuda Insurance Institute's Lifetime Achievement Award in 2004. He couldn't be reached for comment.

Another role Mr. Murphy played beginning in the mid-1970s was shuttling to Washington to protect AIG's interests there. Longtime lawyers and lobbyists in Washington said that Mr. Murphy helped persuade members of Congress and their aides to establish a new rule for determining which jurisdiction's taxes applied to underwriting income. The old approach involved a complicated multifactor test. The new one established that premiums were taxed based on where the insured asset was. Included in tax-reform legislation in 1976, the change provided international insurers with clarity they strongly desired.

Competitive Threat

In 1986, Bermuda faced a competitive threat when Barbados signed a treaty with the U.S. exempting from American taxes all premiums paid by American companies to insurers in Barbados. Bermuda's then-premier, John Swan, recruited AIG to help secure a similar privilege. The company's Messrs. Murphy and Johnson served as official, though unpaid, representatives of the Bermuda government during negotiations in Washington that in 1988 produced the treaty Mr. Swan sought.

In behind-the-scenes lobbying, Mr. Murphy offered suggestions on treaty language, one lawyer familiar with the negotiations recalled. "Mike knows a lot of players in Washington," Mr. Swan said. "If you had to ask who was the person outside myself who really got involved, it would be Mike Murphy."

In addition to matching Barbados on the excise-tax exemption, the 1988 treaty contained a provision sought by AIG that turned out to be more important after Congress later repealed the excise exemption for both islands. The second provision laid out rules allowing Bermuda insurers to do business in the U.S. without incurring American income-tax liability. This advantage provides the economic foundation for most of the Bermuda insurance industry.

DOJ_NMG_0006749

AIG began launching small affiliates in Barbados in the late 1970s, most of which Messrs. Murphy and Johnson helped run. Many of these affiliates sold reinsurance: policies that insurance companies themselves buy to lessen their potential expenditures when they have to make payments to customers.

AIG often bought reinsurance from Bermuda companies that it had helped set up. Properly disclosed, reinsurance is considered a legitimate financial arrangement. An AIG spokesman said that "as the world's largest commercial insurer, AIG is understandably the world's largest reinsurance buyer." The bulk of the Bermuda companies AIG helped set up were established to cover potential liabilities related to particular AIG clients, the spokesman said.

Operating the network of offshore affiliates sometimes entailed AIG executives flying from New York to Bermuda and Barbados for a series of airport board meetings on a single day, one former AIG official recalled.

In 1978, AIG established Inter-Hemispheric Insurance Co., a $50 million joint venture with reinsurer Munich Re AG. Inter-Hemispheric was one of the first firms to offer a form of reinsurance known as finite-risk insurance. Purchasers of these customized policies can use a favorable insurance-accounting method to record proceeds from the policies. But regulators suspect that some finite-risk policies are little more than disguised loans, which allow purchasers to prettify their books temporarily, without transferring real risk to the reinsurer. AIG and almost all other big insurance companies are currently under regulatory scrutiny in connection with potentially improper finite-risk policies.

In 1986, Inter-Hemispheric was rechristened Richmond Insurance Co. Ltd. AIG's Bermuda office is on Richmond Road in Hamilton. Mr. Murphy was named Richmond's corporate secretary and an alternate director; Mr. Johnson was the president. Among the company's first customers was AIG.

By 1995, AIG was paying Richmond more than $200 million a year in premiums, according to the Journal analysis of AIG's state-regulatory filings. AIG stood to collect over a period of years more than $900 million in reinsurance payments from Richmond and its subsidiaries, the analysis shows. The net effect of all these transfers was that AIG shifted hundreds of millions of dollars of liabilities to Richmond. AIG nevertheless continued to tell New York state regulators that Richmond was an independent company, according to the New York lawsuit.

AIG told New York insurance regulators in the late 1990s that it owned just 19.99% of the offshore company and didn't control it. In 1999, the company filed with the New York State Department of Insurance a form known as a disclaimer of control related to Richmond, according to department records. Mr. Murphy signed the disclaimer.

New York's Mr. Spitzer, along with the state's insurance commissioner, Howard Mills, allege in the suit that the disclaimer omitted critical facts: An AIG unit managed key Richmond operations, and Richmond's purportedly independent outside investors -- Munich Re and others -- were guaranteed against losses by an AIG unit. The AIG filing caused skeptical New York regulators to back away from inquiries about the company's relationship with Richmond, the suit claims.

Under pressure from regulators, AIG acknowledged in March that it should have accounted for Richmond as a company it could control. AIG said it would fold into its financial statements the operations of Richmond, a move AIG said would have only a small financial impact.

Unusual Twist

There is an unusual twist to the Richmond matter: According to two people familiar with the situation, Mr. Murphy drafted and signed a second version of the New York-state filing that described accurately AIG's ties to Richmond. It was AIG lawyers in New York who chose which version to file with regulators, according to the two people. AIG declined to comment.

For Mr. Murphy, a particularly sensitive aspect of the Richmond arrangement was the guarantee AIG gave outside investors that it would buy them out if necessary. That meant AIG could be on the hook for Richmond's losses -- an indication that the larger company effectively controlled the smaller one. This guarantee was among the subjects of the minutes of a March 2005 meeting of Richmond's directors. New York alleges in its suit that Mr. Murphy tried to destroy the minutes.

Another Bermuda reinsurer, Union Excess Reinsurance Co., owed AIG nearly $500 million in reinsurance obligations by 2003, according to records of state regulators. Union Excess' owners were largely protected from an investment loss, thanks to an option to sell back their shares to the reinsurer. That option was guaranteed by a subsidiary of Starr International, the closely held firm run by AIG executives. Mr. Murphy signed the Dec. 20, 1993, agreement with Union Excess' investors on behalf of Starr International and its subsidiary.

Earlier this year, AIG said it had accounted for Union Excess improperly. Because of the guarantee against losses, among other factors, AIG said it should have treated Union Excess as if AIG controlled it, consolidating the smaller company's results into its own. Union Excess accounted for the single biggest hit to AIG's net worth -- $951 million -- in a $2.26 billion restatement that the company made in May. The restatement cut its net worth, or shareholders' equity, to $80.6 billion as of Dec. 31, 2004.

Mr. Greenberg's attorneys have argued that AIG didn't control Union Excess and so shouldn't have made the restatement.

DOJ_NMG_0006750

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ex-White House Aide Charged In Corruption Case (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - A senior White House budget official who resigned abruptly last week was arrested Monday on charges of lying to investigators and obstructing a federal inquiry involving Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist who has been under scrutiny by the Justice Department for more than a year.

The arrest of the official, David H. Safavian, head of procurement policy at the Office of Management and Budget, was the first to result from the wide-ranging corruption investigation of Mr. Abramoff, once among the most powerful and best-paid lobbyists in Washington and a close friend of Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader.

According to court papers, Mr. Safavian, 38, is accused of lying about assistance that he gave Mr. Abramoff in his earlier work at the General Services Administration, where he was chief of staff from 2002 to 2004, and about an expensive golf trip he took with the lobbyist to Scotland in August 2002.

Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner of Mr. Safavian, was indicted last month in Florida on unrelated federal fraud charges. He is not identified by name in the court papers involving Mr. Safavian's arrest. But "Lobbyist A" in an F.B.I. affidavit could only be Mr. Abramoff based on descriptive details in the documents filed in the Federal District Court here.

The Justice Department said Mr. Safavian had been specifically charged with making false statements to investigators about his efforts at the General Services Administration in 2002 to help Mr. Abramoff acquire two large pieces of government-owned property in the Washington area, including the historic Old Post Office Building on Pennsylvania Avenue.

The department said Mr. Safavian had also lied to ethics officials at the agency, which manages federal property, when he sought approval to accept free transportation from Mr. Abramoff for the golf trip to Scotland that summer. According to court documents, Mr. Safavian told the ethics office that Mr. Abramoff had no business with the agency at the time, an assertion that was repeated in a separate interview this May with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. DeLay, who has asked the House ethics committee to review his ties to Mr. Abramoff, has come under criticism from Congressional Democrats and ethics watchdog groups for taking a similar golf trip to Scotland with Mr. Abramoff in 2000, including rounds of golf on the fabled course at St. Andrews.

The Justice Department made no accusation in its court papers of any tie between Mr. DeLay and Mr. Safavian nor of any involvement by Mr. DeLay in Mr. Abramoff's effort to buy government property. A spokesman for Mr. Abramoff had no comment on the arrest of Mr. Safavian. Phone calls to Mr. Safavian's home in the Virginia suburbs of Washington were not returned.

The White House said in a statement that Mr. Safavian had resigned on Friday and that "we, of course, will cooperate fully with the Justice Department in this investigation." A spokesman said the White House would have no further comment on the arrest.

Mr. Safavian had recently been working on developing contracting policies for the multibillion-dollar relief effort after Hurricane Katrina.

The Justice Department did not reveal details of Mr. Safavian's arrest, including where it occurred. The department also did not say why the criminal charges were brought directly by prosecutors, rather than by the Washington grand jury investigating Mr. Abramoff. The Justice Department often bypasses a grand jury when a criminal case is brought together hurriedly or when there is fear that a defendant may try to flee.

The F.B.I. affidavit, which was dated Friday and made public on Monday, said that Mr. Safavian had provided extensive, secret assistance to Mr. Abramoff in 2002, when the lobbyist wanted help on behalf of a client to arrange a lease on favorable terms for the Old Post Office Building, which was controlled by the General Services Administration. The affidavit said the client was one of several Indian tribes that Mr. Abramoff has represented.

The court papers said Mr. Abramoff had also sought Mr. Safavian's help in buying 40 acres at the Naval Surface Warfare Center in the Maryland suburbs of Washington to be the new home of a Jewish children's school that Mr. Abramoff had founded. That property was also under the control of the General Services Administration.

Local real estate records suggest that neither property was acquired by Mr. Abramoff or his clients, despite his repeated requests for help in e-mail messages sent to a private account maintained by Mr. Safavian.

The Justice Department affidavit said that even as Mr. Safavian was trying to help Mr. Abramoff in acquiring the government property in 2002, he was eagerly planning his summer golf trip with the lobbyist to Scotland. The F.B.I. affidavit also suggested Mr. Abramoff's motivation in inviting Mr. Safavian was clear. In an e-mail message, a lobbyist colleagues asked: "Why dave? I like him but didn't know u did as much. Business angle?"

DOJ_NMG_0006751

According to the court papers, Mr. Abramoff replied with another e-mail message: "Total business angle. He is new COS of GSA."

Like Mr. Abramoff, Mr. Safavian, a former Congressional aide, has extensive ties to prominent Republicans on Capitol Hill, throughout the executive branch and among the city's lobbying firms.

He helped start Janus-Merritt Strategies, a consulting firm, with Grover G. Norquist, the head of the conservative advocacy group Americans for Tax Reform and a close political ally of the Bush administration.

Mr. Safavian worked with Mr. Abramoff in the Washington lobbying offices of Preston Gates & Ellis, a Seattle-based firm. According to lobbying records, Mr. Safavian shared at least one client with Mr. Abramoff, the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, and also represented Microsoft, the Port of Seattle and the Dredging Contractors of America.

His wife, Jennifer Safavian, is chief counsel for oversight and investigations on the House Government Reform Committee, which is responsible for overseeing government procurement and is, among other things, expected to conduct the Congressional investigation into missteps after Hurricane Katrina.

Both Mr. Safavian and his wife graduated from Detroit College of Law at Michigan State University. They have a daughter.

According to his former colleagues in the Bush administration and interviews he gave, Mr. Safavian considered encouraging "competitive sourcing" or outsourcing government work to private contractors to be a primary goal in his job at the Office of Management and Budget.

He did not oversee specific contracts, but instead managed overall guidelines for government purchasing, associates said. In an interview in June with Federal Times, a newspaper that focuses on the workings of the federal government, Mr. Safavian described his work for the office and said that "the best advice I've gotten was from my grandfather and that advice is that you've got to have ethics and integrity in everything you do, especially here in D.C."

Bush Official Arrested In Corruption Probe (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The Bush administration's top federal procurement official resigned Friday and was arrested yesterday, accused of lying and obstructing a criminal investigation into Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings with the federal government. It was the first criminal complaint filed against a government official in the ongoing corruption probe related to Abramoff's activities in Washington.

The complaint, filed by the FBI, alleges that David H. Safavian, 38, a White House procurement official involved until last week in Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, made repeated false statements to government officials and investigators about a golf trip with Abramoff to Scotland in 2002.

It also contends that he concealed his efforts to help Abramoff acquire control of two federally managed properties in the Washington area. Abramoff is the person identified as "Lobbyist A" in a 13-page affidavit unsealed in court, according to sources knowledgeable about the probe.

Until his resignation on the day the criminal complaint against him was signed, Safavian was the top administrator at the federal procurement office in the White House Office of Management and Budget, where he set purchasing policy for the entire government.

The arrest occurred at his home in Alexandria. A man who answered the phone there yesterday hung up when a reporter asked to speak to Safavian.

Abramoff was indicted by federal prosecutors in Miami last month on unrelated charges of wire fraud and conspiracy. He remains the linchpin of an 18-month probe by a federal task force that includes the Internal Revenue Service, the Interior Department and the Justice Department's fraud and public integrity units. His lawyer did not respond to phone calls seeking comment.

Abramoff's allegedly improper dealings with Indian tribes -- which netted him and an associate at least $82 million in fees -- prompted the federal probe. But investigators have found that his documents and e-mails contain a trove of information about his aggressive efforts to seek favors for clients from members of Congress and senior bureaucrats.

Accompanying Safavian and Abramoff on the 2002 trip to Scotland, for example, were Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Administration Committee, lobbyist and former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed and Neil Volz, a lobbyist with Abramoff at the Washington office of Greenburg Traurig.

DOJ_NMG_0006752

Like Abramoff, Safavian is a veteran Washington player. He is a former lobbying partner of anti-tax crusader Grover Norquist and previously worked with Abramoff at another firm. Both he and Abramoff have represented gambling clients and Indian tribes with gambling interests.

At the time of the golf trip, Safavian was chief of staff at the General Services Administration, where ethics rules flatly prohibited the receipt of a gift from any person seeking an official action by the agency. When Safavian asked GSA ethics officers for permission to go on the trip, he assured them in writing that Abramoff "has no business before GSA," according to the affidavit signed by FBI special agent Jeffrey A. Reising.

Reising alleged, however, that Abramoff had by then already secretly enlisted Safavian in an effort to buy 40 acres of land that GSA managed in Silver Spring for use as the campus of a Hebrew school Abramoff founded. Safavian also allegedly tried to help Abramoff lease space for Abramoff's clients in an old post office building downtown.

On July 22, 2002, Abramoff sent Safavian an e-mail with a proposed draft letter that "at least two members of Congress" could send to GSA supporting the lease, according to the affidavit. "Does this work, or do you want it to be longer?" Abramoff asked.

Three days later, Safavian forwarded Abramoff an e-mail describing how an employee at OMB was resisting Abramoff's plan to lease space at the post office. "I suspect we'll end up having to bring some Hill pressure to bear on OMB," Safavian messaged Abramoff.

On the same day Safavian discussed the golf trip with the ethics office, he sent an e-mail to Abramoff from his home computer, advising him how to "lay out a case for this lease." Abramoff subsequently wrote in an e-mail to his wife and two officials of the school that Safavian had shown him a map of the property at his GSA office but had cautioned that Abramoff should not visit again "given my high profile politically."

Safavian nonetheless arranged a meeting for Abramoff's wife and business partner with officials at GSA on the day before he departed for Scotland aboard Abramoff's chartered jet. The trip cost more than $120,000 and was paid for mostly by a charity founded and run by Abramoff, the Capital Athletic Foundation.

When Safavian was questioned by The Washington Post about the trip in January, he said he paid his share of the expenses and took unpaid leave. "The trip was exclusively personal; I did no business there. . . . Jack is an old friend of mine," Safavian said.

But the complaint alleges that Safavian lied about his contacts with Abramoff on three occasions after his initial false pledge to the GSA ethics officer. The first was during a 2003 investigation by GSA's inspector general, who was responding to an anonymous tipster's hotline complaint; the second was in a March 17, 2005, letter to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs; and the third was during an FBI interview on May 26, 2005.

Former White House Official Arrested (AJC/AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — A former Bush administration official was arrested Monday on charges he made false statements and obstructed a federal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff, according to court documents and government officials.

David Safavian, then-chief of staff of the General Services Administration and a former Abramoff lobbying associate, concealed from federal investigators that Abramoff was seeking to do business with GSA when Safavian joined him on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to an FBI affidavit and the officials.

At the time, FBI agent Jeffrey A. Reising said in the affidavit, a lobbyist — identified separately as Abramoff — had enlisted Safavian's help in trying to gain control of 40 acres of land at the Federal Research Center at White Oak in Silver Spring, Md., for a private high school that Abramoff helped establish and supported.

For his part, Safavian edited a letter the lobbyist was preparing to send to GSA, and arranged and attended a meeting involving a GSA official, the lobbyist's wife and others to discuss leasing the property, the affidavit said.

Abramoff told his wife to use her maiden name at the meeting because Safavian sought to play down Abramoff's involvement, the affidavit said, citing an e-mail from Abramoff.

Safavian was given clearance to go on the August 2002 golf trip after telling GSA's ethics officer that the lobbyist "has no business before GSA," the affidavit said.

Nine people, including Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, made the trip and played golf on the fabled Old Course at St. Andrews. Safavian paid $3,100 for the travel, "in the exercise of discretion," he said, as quoted in the affidavit. The total cost was more than $100,000, the affidavit said.

DOJ_NMG_0006753

Safavian moved to the Office of Management and Budget last year, becoming the administration's top procurement official. He resigned that post, effective Friday, OMB spokesman Alex Conant said.

No one answered the phone at a listing for Safavian in Alexandria, Va.

Safavian worked with Abramoff on the team at the Preston, Gates & Ellis law firm that was lobbying to keep the Northern Mariana Islands free from certain U.S. labor and immigration laws during the last half of the 1990s.

Abramoff is not named in the affidavit, but two government officials confirmed he is the person referred to in the affidavit as Lobbyist A. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is still under way.

In addition, Safavian was asked in February for information about the golf trip by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Both the Senate panel and a federal grand jury are investigating deals in which Abramoff and an associate received at least $66 million from six Indian tribes to lobby for their casinos and other interests. The tribes question whether the charges were excessive.

Congressional Democrats have raised questions about Abramoff's ties to House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas. The congressman has asked the House Ethics Committee to review allegations that Abramoff or his clients paid some of DeLay's overseas travel expenses. DeLay has denied knowing that the expenses were paid by the lobbyist.

Separately, Abramoff has pleaded innocent to a six-count federal fraud and conspiracy indictment stemming from his role in the 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats in Florida.

Former White House Budget Official Arrested (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt And G. Robert Hillman

The Dallas Morning News, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON – A former high-ranking Bush administration budget official was arrested Monday on charges of lying and obstructing a federal investigation into his business dealings with a lobbyist identified as Jack Abramoff.

David Safavian resigned Friday as top procurement officer for the White House budget office, the day the FBI filed a criminal complaint charging he made false statements to the General Services Administration's ethics office and inspector general.

An FBI affidavit alleges that Mr. Safavian, while the GSA's chief of staff, helped a lobbyist in his attempts to acquire GSA-controlled property in the Washington area. In 2002, the affidavit says, the lobbyist took Mr. Safavian and others on a golf outing to Scotland.

While the 13-page affidavit refers only to "Lobbyist A," a government official, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that Mr. Abramoff is the lobbyist.

"Before and after the August 2002 golf trip, Safavian advised and assisted Lobbyist A in his efforts to conduct the aforementioned business with GSA," FBI Agent Jeffrey Reising wrote in the affidavit.

Mr. Safavian did not return a call to his home Monday.

Mr. Abramoff, who once had close ties to House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, has been indicted on federal fraud charges for his role in the purchase of a company that operates casino ships in Florida. He has pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Abramoff's attorney, Abbe Lowell, offered no immediate comment on the latest twist in the federal investigation of his client's dealings, which previously focused on the casino and his dealings with Indian tribes.

The filing clearly points to Mr. Abramoff – saying he represented Indian tribal clients, had worked with Mr. Safavian at a Washington law firm and established a private high school. Also, Mr. Safavian accompanied Mr. Abramoff on an August 2002 golf trip to Scotland, along with Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, the Republican chairman of the House Administration Committee, and lobbyist Ralph Reed, among others.

In a June 15, 2002, e-mail to a colleague, according to the affidavit, the lobbyist explained why he'd invited Mr. Safavian on the golfing trip: "Total business angle. He is new [chief of staff] of GSA."

From May 2002, when Mr. Safavian was the GSA's chief of staff, through the August golf trip, the affidavit says, the lobbyist sought to acquire as a site for his high school some 40 acres at the Naval Surface Warfare Center-White Oak, which was controlled by the GSA. The FBI affidavit also says the lobbyist also sought changes in regulations for another GSA-controlled building in Washington, the Old Post Office, in ways that could have benefited his Indian tribal clients seeking to lease and develop the building.

E-mail excerpts quoted in the affidavit suggest Mr. Safavian offered advice to the lobbyist on how to approach the GSA and lobby Congress to secure the land. He forwarded internal communications to the lobbyist, the affidavit says. And Mr. Safavian counseled the lobbyist's wife not to use her marital name during a meeting with GSA officials to discuss providing land for the school.

DOJ_NMG_0006754

In a July 21, 2002, e-mail to a colleague, the lobbyist wrote that Mr. Safavian was "totally supportive" of the efforts to acquire the White Oak land for his school, the affidavit said.

At the White House budget office, spokesman Alex Conant said that Mr. Safavian had resigned Friday and the office was cooperating in the investigation.

Jack Lebo, a spokesman for the GSA's inspector general, didn't immediately return phone calls.

GSA spokeswoman Mary Alice Johnson declined to comment, saying, "The matter is part of an ongoing investigation. The agency is cooperating fully, and the U.S. Department of Justice has asked us to direct all questions to them."

Mr. Safavian, who once was an Abramoff colleague at a Washington law firm, was tapped by President Bush for the White House budget post in November 2003 and was confirmed by the Senate nearly a year later.

Official, Abramoff Associate Arrested (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 20, 2005

David Hossein Safavian, the Bush administration's top federal procurement officer in the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), was arrested yesterday based on a three-count criminal complaint filed in federal court, according to a Justice Department statement.

The government alleges that Safavian, as chief of staff at the General Services Administration (GSA), helped an unnamed lobbyist acquire GSA-controlled property in and around Washington, D.C.

Sources say the lobbyist is likely Jack Abramoff, who has been indicted by a grand jury in Florida. Safavian and Abramoff worked together at Preston, Gates and the two traveled with Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and others on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002.

Safavian allegedly told a GSA ethics officer and GSA's inspector general that the lobbyist had no business with GSA before the August 2002 golf trip, the Justice Department statement said.

A spokesperson for Abramoff declined to comment.

Government Executive magazine reported that Safavian resigned last Friday as the head of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy at OMB.

Bush Appointee Is Arrested In Obstruction Case (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr. And Chuck Neubauer, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — A top federal procurement appointee of President Bush was arrested Monday on charges that he made false statements and obstructed a federal probe when he was questioned about a Scotland golfing junket arranged by lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In a three-count criminal complaint made public Monday, David H. Safavian was accused of lying to an ethics officer in the General Services Administration regarding his dealings with the lobbyist, who flew him to Scotland in August 2002.

Safavian, former chief of staff of the GSA, also is accused of obstructing an inspector general's investigation into whether he improperly accepted favors from the lobbyist.

Safavian, 38, was with the GSA when he traveled to Scotland.

He was confirmed as the chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget in November 2004.

He resigned Friday, according to Alex Conant, an OMB spokesman.

Safavian could not be reached for comment. Abramoff, through a spokesman, declined to answer questions.

Safavian, while working at the GSA, allegedly aided Abramoff's attempts to acquire GSA-controlled property for a school that the lobbyist had established in the Washington area.

Although the 14-page affidavit refers to Abramoff only as "Lobbyist A," Safavian previously named Abramoff as the person who arranged the 2002 trip.

A federal investigator, speaking on condition of anonymity, also confirmed that Abramoff was the unidentified lobbyist cited in the complaint.

According to the affidavit made public Monday, Safavian assisted the lobbyist in trying to acquire 40 acres of land controlled by the GSA for the school.

Abramoff also sought Safavian's assistance for a private client who was trying to lease a Washington office building from the GSA.

The inside help predated the golf junket and continued afterward, the document said.

Nonetheless, Safavian told an ethics official that the lobbyist "had no business before GSA and did all of his work on Capitol Hill."

The former GSA chief of staff "also omitted the fact that [Abramoff] was actively seeking assistance from the GSA and that Safavian was aiding in that effort," the affidavit said.

The affidavit, signed by an FBI agent, cites e-mails from Abramoff.

In one e-mail to Safavian, for example, Abramoff asked whether the GSA had control of property in Silver Springs, Md., that he sought for the private Jewish school he founded.

Safavian responded with his own e-mail on July 2, 2002, giving details of the property's status and suggesting that the two of them discuss the matter.

Abramoff later bragged to a colleague that Safavian was helping with the effort to secure the property.

Abramoff also sent his wife to a meeting at the GSA, according to another e-mail, because he didn't want to attract attention due to his own "high profile politically." Safavian attended the meeting, according to the complaint.

The complaint states that Safavian gave Abramoff specific advice on the drafting of a letter to the GSA regarding the property.

Abramoff has been indicted in Florida on charges of fraud relating to the purchase of a fleet of gambling boats.

Separately, he is the subject of a wide-ranging federal probe of his lobbying efforts for Indian tribes operating or seeking to operate casinos.

In his e-mail to a GSA ethics officer, Safavian described the 2002 trip that he would be taking and added that it was being arranged by a former colleague. Safavian had worked with Abramoff at a Washington law firm a decade ago.

"He is paying the cost of the aircraft regardless of whether I go or not.

"In fact, none of the other guests will be paying a proportional share of the aircraft costs," Safavian wrote.

After the trip, Safavian showed the inspector general a copy of his $3,100 check to Abramoff, indicating that he had paid his own way.

Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, also went on the trip but a spokesman said Monday that the congressman had not been questioned about it. Ney has said he had been told that the trip was paid for by the National Center for Public Policy Research. That group, however, has denied financing the junket to the famous St. Andrews golf course.

According to the complaint, "Indian tribal funds" paid for the trip.

Ex-OMB Official Hit With Charges (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

The Justice Department on Monday filed criminal charges against David Hossein Safavian, who until last week was a top official at the Office of Management and Budget, for making false statements and obstructing a federal investigation into efforts by former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff to acquire federally owned property in the Washington, D.C., area for an Orthodox Jewish school that Abramoff had founded.

Safavian also allegedly tried to help Abramoff gain control of the Old Post Office Pavilion in downtown Washington for one of his American-Indian clients.

The criminal complaint filed Monday stems from activities surrounding a now-infamous golfing junket to Scotland in August 2002 that included Abramoff, House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (R-Ohio), several Ney aides and Ralph Reed, former executive director of the Christian Coalition and an old Abramoff friend.

Safavian, a former chief of staff to Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), worked with Abramoff at the law and lobbying firm Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds in 1995, and at the time of the golfing trip had just been promoted to chief of staff at the General Services Administration. GSA oversees thousands of buildings owned or leased by the federal government.

According to an affidavit released by the Justice Department on Monday night in support of the criminal charges against Safavian, the FBI, GSA and Interior Department have been “examining allegations concerning an August 2002 Scotland golf trip that Safavian took with a Washington, D.C., lobbyist (‘Lobbyist A’) and Safavian’s statement regarding Lobbyist A’s dealing with GSA at the time that Safavian accompanied Lobbyist A on that trip.”

Abramoff is not mentioned by name in the affidavit, although his participation in the August 2002 Scotland trip has been well established by federal investigators and the news media.

Beginning in May 2002 until after the August 2002 trip, Abramoff reportedly tried to “acquire approximately 40 acres of land controlled by GSA” at the Naval Surface Warfare Center-White Oak, a federal facility located in Silver Spring, Md., for Abramoff’s school, according to the affidavit.

In addition, Abramoff sought "changes in the regulations governing the development" of the Old Post Office building on Pennsylvania Avenue. "GSA controlled the building and was considering ways to develop the OPO," states the affidavit.

Abramoff reportedly sought "contracting preferences that could have given some of Lobbyist A's tribal clients a competitive advantage in efforts to lease and develop the building," the affidavit said.

Safavian, who resigned last Friday as administrator of federal procurement policy at OMB, allegedly provided Abramoff with advice on how to proceed in getting GSA approval for both projects.

Safavian was co-founder of the lobbying shop Janus-Merritt Strategies along with GOP activist Grover Norquist, an Abramoff ally who has also attracted Senate scrutiny over his financial dealings with the former lobbyist. One of the clients Safavian lobbied for at Janus-Merritt was the National Indian Gaming Association.

Abramoff and a business associate were indicted in Miami last month on wire and mail fraud charges related to his attempt to purchase a Florida-based casino cruise company in 2000.

Brian Walsh, a spokesman for Ney, said the Ohio Republican had no comment on Safavian's indictment other than to say that Ney himself has not been contacted himself by any of the handful of federal agencies or grand juries that are looking into Abramoff's business dealings.

"No federal investigators have contacted the Congressman on this or any other matter connected to Jack Abramoff," said Walsh.

In travel disclosure documents filed with the House, Ney stated that the National Center for Public Policy Research paid for the Scotland trip, although that organization has now said it did not. The Capital Athletic Foundation, a non-profit controlled by Abramoff, chartered a private jet for the trip, and overall expenses for the junket were well in excess of $100,000, according to The Washington Post.

House Democrats immediately pounced on this latest indictment as further evidence that Ney needs to be voted out of office in November 2006.

"With two of his golf partners arrested in one month's time, Congressman Bob Ney must be worried about the integrity of his four-some," said John Lapp, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in a statement. "Every arrest and indictment is a reminder to the American people that this special interest Congress is more concerned with protecting their cronies than fighting for middle class families."

On July 25, 2002, Safavian sought clearance from a GSA ethics officer about taking part in the Scotland golf trip scheduled for the following month. But Justice Department documents say Safavian "omitted the fact" that Abramoff had business before GSA and that he was helping Abramoff.

On March 26, 2003, an anonymous tipster made a complaint to a hotline run by the Office of Inspector General at GSA "regarding Savafian's participation in an 'international golfing trip provided by lobbyists.'"

Safavian was questioned by a GSA official in March and April 2003, but he "falsely represented to the GSA-OIG that Lobbyist A had no business with GSA prior to the August 2002 golf trip, and Safavian omitted the fact that he was aiding Lobbyist A in Lobbyist A's attempts to do business with GSA and seek official action from GSA."

In late February 2005, the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which has been looking into Abramoff's dealings with a half-dozen Indian tribes, contacted Safavian seeking information on the 2002 junket.

According to the Justice Department affidavit, Safavian again "falsely represented" to the Indian Affairs Committee and its chairman, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), that Abramoff had no business before GSA at the time of the August 2002 trip.

The DOJ affidavit also included information gleaned from numerous e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff, including one from May 24, 2002, shortly after Safavian was invited on the Scotland trip, "asking if GSA had property available for a school."

Abramoff "solicited Safavian's assistance and guidance" on the two projects, including having Safavian review a "draft letter purportedly to be sent by at least two members of Congress to the Administrator of GSA" asking for "special consideration" for minority businesses, such as Indian tribes. The Members assisting Abramoff in this action were not named in the DOJ affidavit.

On July 30, 2002, Abramoff sent his wife and two other representatives of his school to met with GSA officials about acquiring land for his school. Abramoff, according to the Justice Department affidavit, "cautioned his wife to avoid using their marital name" during that meeting because of his "high profile politically."

In May 2005, when interviewed by the FBI at the Old Executive Office Building, Safavian again said that Abramoff did not seek to acquire property from GSA until "significantly well after" the August 2002 trip.

Safavian, whose wife serves as a top aide to Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), on the House Government Reform Committee, did not return several calls seeking comment at press time.

A spokesman for Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, declined to comment on the charges against Safavian.

Top Federal Procurement Official Arrested (FEDTIMES)

By CHRIS GOSIER

Federal Times, September 20, 2005

The Bush administration's top procurement policy official was arrested Sept. 19 on charges that he made false statements to investigators examining whether he improperly aided a lobbyist trying to acquire federal property in and around Washington.

The federal investigation also is looking into whether the official, David Safavian, improperly accompanied the lobbyist on a golf trip to Scotland in August 2002. Safavian is administrator of federal procurement policy at the Office of Management and Budget. Safavian resigned his post on Friday, Sept. 16.

Safavian is accused of obstructing an investigation by the inspector general at the General Services Administration, authorities said Sept. 19. Safavian had previously served as chief of staff at GSA before taking the post at OMB.

The three-count complaint filed Sept. 16 in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. accuses Safavian of making false statements to a GSA ethics officer as well as the GSA inspector general while serving as the agency's chief of staff from May 2002 to January 2004.

Safavian was arrested Monday, the Justice Department said in a release. Deputy OFPP Administrator Robert Burton is serving as interim administrator, said Alex Conant, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, OFPP's parent agency.

Safavian did not return a call to comment by press time.

Key OMB Official Arrested (GOVEXEC)

By Kimberly Palmer

Government Executive, September 20, 2005

David Safavian, who was chief of procurement policy in the Bush administration's Office of Management and Budget until late last week, was arrested Monday on charges of making false statements and obstructing a federal investigation.

Safavian is charged with making false statements to a General Services Administration ethics officer and the GSA inspector general's office. Safavian served as chief of staff at GSA before moving to OMB.

Safavian resigned as head of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy effective Friday, an OMB spokesman said. Robert Burton, associate administrator of OFPP, will head the office on an interim basis, the spokesman said.

The Justice Department announced that Safavian "allegedly aided a Washington, D.C., lobbyist in the lobbyist's attempts to acquire GSA-controlled property in and around Washington, D.C.," and that Safavian joined the lobbyist on a Scotland golf trip.

Safavian allegedly misled GSA officials when he said the lobbyist "had no business" with GSA prior to the golf trip, when in fact Safavian had helped the lobbyist "in his attempts to do business with GSA," Justice said.

The lobbyist, though not named in the Justice announcement, is likely Jack Abramoff, a Washington lobbyist who has been the subject of a long-running federal investigation. In August 2002, Safavian joined Abramoff, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed and others on a trip to St. Andrews, Scotland.

The Washington Post reported last year that the expenses for the chartered jet that ferried the group to Scotland were paid by the Capital Athletic Foundation, a charity run by Abramoff and his wife.

OMB referred all questions about Safavian to Justice officials.

Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at OMB, convened a meeting Monday morning to inform agency employees of Safavian's arrest, according to a government source who asked to remain anonymous. Johnson told staff members to support Safavian's family, and cautioned them against responding to him should he attempt to contact them, the source said.

During his confirmation hearings for his position as OFPP chief, Safavian said he worked as a lobbyist and consultant for a variety of organizations, including the Embassy of Pakistan, Microsoft and several Native American groups.

Safavian also has strong ties to Capitol Hill. Before joining GSA, he served as chief of staff to Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, and also has worked for former Michigan House members William Schuette and Robert Davis, both Republicans.

Amelia Gruber contributed to this report.

Recruits Sought For Porn Squad (WP)

By Barton Gellman

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The FBI is joining the Bush administration's War on Porn. And it's looking for a few good agents.

Early last month, the bureau's Washington Field Office began recruiting for a new anti-obscenity squad. Attached to the job posting was a July 29 Electronic Communication from FBI headquarters to all 56 field offices, describing the initiative as "one of the top priorities" of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and, by extension, of "the Director." That would be FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III.

Mischievous commentary began propagating around the water coolers at 601 Fourth St. NW and its satellites, where the FBI's second-largest field office concentrates on national security, high-technology crimes and public corruption.

The new squad will divert eight agents, a supervisor and assorted support staff to gather evidence against "manufacturers and purveyors" of pornography -- not the kind exploiting children, but the kind that depicts, and is marketed to, consenting adults.

"I guess this means we've won the war on terror," said one exasperated FBI agent, speaking on the condition of anonymity because poking fun at headquarters is not regarded as career-enhancing. "We must not need any more resources for espionage."

Among friends and trusted colleagues, an experienced national security analyst said, "it's a running joke for us."

A few of the printable samples:

"Things I Don't Want On My Résumé, Volume Four."

"I already gave at home."

"Honestly, most of the guys would have to recuse themselves."

Federal obscenity prosecutions, which have been out of style since Attorney General Edwin Meese III in the Reagan administration made pornography a signature issue in the 1980s, do "encounter many legal issues, including First Amendment claims," the FBI headquarters memo noted.

Applicants for the porn squad should therefore have a stomach for the kind of material that tends to be most offensive to local juries. Community standards -- along with a prurient purpose and absence of artistic merit -- define criminal obscenity under current Supreme Court doctrine.

"Based on a review of past successful cases in a variety of jurisdictions," the memo said, the best odds of conviction come with pornography that "includes bestiality, urination, defecation, as well as sadistic and masochistic behavior." No word on the universe of other kinks that helps make porn a multibillion-dollar industry.

Popular acceptance of hard-core pornography has come a long way, with some of its stars becoming mainstream celebrities and their products -- once confined to seedy shops and theaters -- being "purveyed" by upscale hotels and most home cable and satellite television systems. Explicit sexual entertainment is a profit center for companies including General Motors Corp. and Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. (the two major owners of DirecTV), Time Warner Inc. and the Sheraton, Hilton, Marriott and Hyatt hotel chains.

But Gonzales endorses the rationale of predecessor Meese: that adult pornography is a threat to families and children. Christian conservatives, long skeptical of Gonzales, greeted the pornography initiative with what the Family Research Council called "a growing sense of confidence in our new attorney general."

Congress began funding the obscenity initiative in fiscal 2005 and specified that the FBI must devote 10 agents to adult pornography. The bureau decided to create a dedicated squad only in the Washington Field Office. "All other field offices may investigate obscenity cases pursuant to this initiative if resources are available," the directive from headquarters said. "Field offices should not, however, divert resources from higher priority matters, such as public corruption."

Public corruption, officially, is fourth on the FBI's priority list, after protecting the United States from terrorist attack, foreign espionage and cyber-based attacks. Just below those priorities are civil rights, organized crime, white-collar crime and "significant violent crime." The guidance from headquarters does not mention where pornography fits in.

"The Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation's top priority remains fighting the war on terrorism," said Justice Department press secretary Brian Roehrkasse. "However, it is not our sole priority. In fact, Congress has directed the department to focus on other priorities, such as obscenity."

At the FBI's field office, spokeswoman Debra Weierman expressed disappointment that some of her colleagues find grist for humor in the new campaign. "The adult obscenity squad . . . stems from an attorney general mandate, funded by Congress," she said. "The personnel assigned to this initiative take the responsibility of this assignment very seriously and are dedicated to the success of this program."

U.S. Jury Signals Possible Deadlock In John A. `Junior' Gotti Mafia Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 20, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-A federal jury deliberating the case of John A. "Junior" Gotti, the scion of the Gambino crime family charged with attacking a radio show host, indicated Monday that it was deadlocked on a racketeering charge against the son of the late mob boss.

DOJ_NMG_0006759

In a note to U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin on the seventh day of deliberations, jurors asked what they should do if they were deadlocked over the question of Gotti's so-called withdrawal defense.

Gotti, 41, claims he quit the Gambino organized crime family before July 22, 1999, meaning the five-year statute of limitations would have expired on racketeering charges.

The judge told lawyers she planned to read the jurors a charge that would encourage them to keep deliberating until they reached an unanimous verdict.

Prosecutors allege Gotti ordered his Gambino crew to give radio personality Curtis Sliwa a severe beating in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air rants against his father, John Gotti.

A masked hit man shot Sliwa, an outspoken founder of the Guardian Angels crime-fighting group, during a struggle in a taxi. Sliwa survived, and he testified last month against Gotti, as did admitted mobsters who pleaded guilty and became government cooperators.

The defense told jurors that Gotti had nothing to do with the Sliwa attack and said he retired from the Gambinos following an unrelated racketeering conviction in 1999. Prosecutors dismissed the claim, saying Gotti used his name to rise in the crime organization and gave orders and collected kickbacks beyond 1999.

Gotti faces a sentence of up to 30 years in prison if convicted of multiple racketeering charges. His father was sentenced to life in prison in 1992 and died there 10 years later.

Three Arrested In Army Kickback Scheme (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 20, 2005

A civilian Army employee and two business owners were arrested in a kickback scheme to supply furnishings at a new Pentagon-run hotel in the Bavarian Alps that is used by troops on leave from Afghanistan and Iraq, the Justice Department said Monday.

Steven G. Potoski, 45, former contracting director at the Edelweiss Lodge and Resort in Garmisch, Germany, accepted more than $350,000 in bribes in cash, home renovations, trips, computers and tickets to such events as Oktoberfest and the Indianapolis 500, assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said.

Potoski, who lives in Garmisch, was arrested Friday, along with Alvan Vance McQueen, 56, of Shelbyville, Ind., and Ellis Abramson, 39, of Merrick, N.Y.

McQueen, owner of Flat Rock Furniture in Waldron, Ind., paid Potoski $45,000 in cash and other items as part of an agreement to inflate the cost of furniture for the hotel and split the extra money, according to a criminal complaint filed against McQueen in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis.

Abramson, president of Bramson House Inc., had a similar arrangement with Potoski for draperies and guest room bedspreads, according to a criminal complaint filed against Abramson in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Potoski also accepted bribes from 12 German and one British contractor, Fisher said.

If convicted, the three men face up to 35 years in prison.

The 330-room Edelweiss hotel opened last year, serving active-duty and retired U.S. military personnel. The hotel offers special packages for soldiers who are on leave from duty in Afghanistan and Iraq. The military has run hotel and recreation programs in the Alps since the end of World War II.

___

On the Net:

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Three More Sentenced For Corruption (TTNJ)

By KRYSTAL KNAPP, Staff Writer

The Times (NJ), September 20, 2005

A former Mercer County official and two local businessmen were sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to 23 months by a federal judge yesterday for their roles in schemes to defraud the Mercer County Improvement Authority and bribe a local government official.

U.S. District Judge Garrett E. Brown Jr. sentenced former MCIA Executive Director James R. Lambert Sr., 44, and Washington Township businessman Alex J. Abdalla, 52, to five months in federal prison, five months of house arrest with electronic monitoring, three years of probation and $6,000 in fines each for their guilty pleas to charges of mail fraud and conspiring to bribe former Ewing Mayor Alfred W. Bridges to use his influence to steer a private demolition contract in the township.

DOJ_NMG_0006760

Hamilton businessman and contractor Michael Maurio, 69, was sentenced to 23 months in federal prison and three years of probation for his part in the conspiracy to defraud the MCIA by submitting false statements in connection with the performance of a demolition project contract in Trenton. Maurio also failed to submit tax returns from 1992 to 1998 for taxes owed totaling $155,028.

Abdalla and Maurio jointly must pay a total of $100,000 in restitution to the MCIA for the overbilling on the demolition project that sources say involved the Sovereign Bank Arena.

All three men declined to talk to reporters after they were sentenced. They have 30 days to turn themselves in to authorities before they serve their time in federal prison. There is no parole in the federal prison system.

Their sentencing nearly brings to a close a federal investigation that has lasted more than three years.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie yesterday praised local FBI agents, special agents of the Internal Revenue Service criminal investigation unit and Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Bocian and Jeffrey S. Chiesa for their work in the case while deploring the corruption of defendants in the probe.

"These individuals and their co-conspirators demonstrated an appalling willingness to corruptly use government coffers for their own financial gain," Christie said.

-- -- --

According to the terms of their plea agreements, Lambert, Abdalla and Maurio agreed to cooperate with the government in its investigation of Mercer County public corruption.

They are the three latest figures to be sentenced in connection with the federal probe. Harry G. Parkin, the chief of staff to former Mercer County Executive Robert D. Prunetti, was sentenced last month to 7 1/2 years in federal prison for using his position to foster a secret financial interest in the county's recycling hauler.

Two more people with ties to the probe are scheduled to be sentenced: Abdalla's business partner John Ruddy and businessman Jim Wells, who pleaded guilty Friday to charges he attempted to bribe a local official.

Lambert, Abdalla and Maurio were sentenced separately yesterday, their hearings spread throughout the day in Brown's courtroom.

Of the three, Lambert was the only one to show any emotion, his voice quavering, his comments interspersed with sniffles as he told the judge how sorry he was. "I apologize to you, the public and my family. I'm ashamed of my actions. I'm truly sorry for what I have done."

His lawyer, Paul H. Zoubek of Haddonfield, argued that Lambert's sentence should be reduced or that he should be placed under house arrest because of his cooperation in the federal probe that included the tape-recording of more than 100 conversations over a three-year period. "He fully cooperated with the FBI from the beginning," Zoubek said. "He not only talked about remorse, but he moved forward to make amends and took full responsibility for his actions."

-- -- --

Lawyers for the federal government acknowledged Lambert helped tremendously from the time he was first contacted and without his help they could not have gotten to the heart of the scheme Parkin tried to keep secret.

But Brown said it was his obligation to weigh both the seriousness of the crimes and the crucial assistance Lambert gave to the government.

"He had no prior criminal record or criminal involvement, but when he got involved, he really got involved," Brown said. "He had a history of public service, but then he attacked the very structure he worked for.

"This is the sort of crime that is really very corrosive to government. . . . As I've said to a number of people who have come before me, what message do we have to send (to public officials)? If we go back 30-plus years ago, in this same courthouse we were sending the same message, but it doesn't seem to have been received yet. I will say it again and again until it is received."

As Brown sentenced Lambert, his wife Kate, a former Hamilton school board president, sat in the first row of the courtroom, her eyes welling with tears. She and Lambert left the room hand-in-hand and said nothing.

About a half-dozen family members and friends attended Abdalla's sentencing in which lawyer Lawrence S. Grossman asked that he be allowed to serve his sentence at home.

"He's been of substantial assistance to the government both in the scope and quality of the investigation," Grossman said. "He recorded hundreds of tapes. He did whatever he was asked to do. He admitted his guilt from the start and agreed to cooperate. . . . I can assure you he will never be back in this or any other courtroom."

Brown noted that Abdalla held back some of the money he was supposed to turn over from the business. Grossman said he did so because he had to support himself and later returned the money.

"I never downplayed anything, was never bitter, I tried to make right by the government, which I did," Abdalla said. "I blame no one else. I apologize to the court, county, and city for any wrongdoing and to my family, friends, and fiancee Victoria. When this earthquake hit, she gave me a foundation to lean on and turned the negative into positive."

DOJ_NMG_0006761

-- -- --

Abdalla's fiancee began to cry during his comments and continued to sob as Brown spoke, saying he considered both the cooperation and the offenses in determining the sentence.

"He cooperated because he himself was caught red-handed in a scheme to bribe a public official," Brown said. "Mail fraud conspiracy, falsifying federal tax returns, this conduct has a corrosive effect on government."

Maurio received the toughest sentence of all three, 23 months, for his part in jacking up the cost of the demolition project and collecting an extra $25,000 from the deal. The lawyers for the federal government said he was of no assistance to the government. He acknowledged his own conduct but did not offer any cooperation that was of any value, lawyers said.

His lawyer, Paul M. Donini of Hamilton, said he was "the least involved" in seeing the scheme to its fruition and was unaware of other schemes. "Prior to this, he was a law-abiding citizen," Donini said. "The last 2 1/2 years have been a living hell for him. He and his family have suffered."

Donini argued that Maurio did not provide other information because he had no further knowledge to give the government. He argued for house arrest in lieu of a prison term so Maurio could meet his financial obligations to his family and because Maurio has a heart problem.

"He would be a prisoner in own home," Donini said. "He used to be the man about town. That lifestyle has ended out of necessity. This is an aberration in his life. He is remorseful, and this is a hardship to the family that loves him."

Maurio, who sat quietly throughout most of the proceedings and only turned his head to gaze back at the three women family members in the courtroom every few minutes, said he took full responsibility for his actions.

"There is nothing other than that to say except that I am sorry for the county, myself and my family," he said, adding that if he were placed under house arrest he could complete several pending deals to pay his restitution and back taxes.

The judge said the sentencing guidelines were reasonable for someone who has taken part in two serious offenses - corruption and tax evasion.

He said Maurio would be sent to the a federal prison with an appropriate medical facility. "You can't whitewash political corruption," Brown said, noting that Maurio gave himself an extra commission from the demolition deal.

"The message has to be sent to people who evade taxes and take part in corruption," Brown said. "It is certainly unfortunate that Mr. Maurio has put his family in this unfortunate situation. It is not the court, not the government who has done this. Mr. Maurio has done this."

Probe Cost County $107,000 For Lawyers (APP)

By NINA RIZZO, FREEHOLD BUREAU

Asbury Park Press, September 20, 2005

Monmouth County Board of Freeholders spent $107,000 for lawyers to represent nine members of the Prosecutor's Office in a federal grand jury investigation that went nowhere, according to the county counsel.

Malcolm V. Carton said Monday that he concluded — after talking to the lawyers who were hired to represent two assistant prosecutors and seven county investigators — that the grand jury probe into whether the prosecutor's office interfered with an FBI bribery sting fizzled out in June.

"It went no place," Carton said. "There was no indictment, just a lot of threats."

The Prosecutor's Office on Feb. 28 was first served with subpoenas seeking to interview five county investigators and examine documents relating to a federal corruption probe that netted 11 local officials on Feb. 22. The subpoenas were delivered a week after sources said the office "blew" the yearlong undercover sting operation into government corruption in several Monmouth County towns.

The sting, dubbed Operation Bid Rig, also brought bribery charges down on the late Freeholder Director Harry Larrison Jr. and a local developer who allegedly paid the county's longtime Republican Party boss at least $8,500 in bribes. Two local businessmen with lucrative county contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

DOJ_NMG_0006762

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

contracts were accused of money laundering as well.

More subpoenas were later handed out at the Prosecutor's Office and, according to legal bills, testimony was given before the grand jury in March, April and May.

Those who were called to appear are Assistant Prosecutors Richard E. Incremona and Kenneth Keller, Chief of Detectives Edward Kirschenbaum, Deputy Chief Guy McCormick and five detectives: Lt. Thomas Wenzel, Jason C. Clark, Barry DuBrosky, Stephen A. Kondrup and Eric M. Singer.

Kirschenbaum and Keller have since retired.

Prosecutor Luis A. Valentin said he didn't know the outcome of the grand jury probe and referred questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said his office does not confirm or deny the existence of a grand jury investigation as a matter of policy.

Robert G. Stahl, the Westfield lawyer who represented Wenzel, said the grand jury investigation didn't result in any charges against his client. Stahl, who was paid more than $20,000, said Christie's office aggressively pursued the matter but the outcome was different than expected.

John C. Whipple, a Morristown lawyer who represented the Prosecutor's Office, confirmed that there has been no grand jury activity in this matter since May, but cautioned that that doesn't mean the case is concluded.

It may seem like a done deal, he said, but federal investigators may still be reviewing documents or interviewing witnesses. And even if this jury is dismissed, Christie can impanel a new one and present new evidence.

"They are always free to investigate as long as the statute of limitations allows," Whipple said. "It's a strange process."

Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made.

Kaye, who retired in June after nearly 22 years in office, has maintained his office never intentionally interfered with the federal case.

The freeholder board agreed to pay the legal bills associated with grand jury testimony earlier this year even after Carton informed them that state officials said they wouldn't reimburse the county. Carton, however, insisted there was legal precedent for reimbursement and said he would fight for the money.

Earlier this month, Carton directed James J. Cleary, a special county counsel, to take action against the state to get reimbursement. Paul Loriquet, a spokesman for state Department of Law and Public Safety, reiterated Monday that the state will not pay the county's legal bills in this matter.

New Mexico Treasurer Pleads Not Guilty (AP)

By Felicia Fonseca

AP, September 20, 2005

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. - The New Mexico state treasurer and his predecessor pleaded not guilty Monday to federal racketeering charges involving kickbacks of cash, cars and expensive tickets to political fundraisers.

Robert Vigil and former Treasurer Michael Montoya, both Democrats, are accused of steering state business to an investment adviser in exchange for nearly $700,000.

If convicted, each faces a maximum sentence of 20 years on each of two counts.

"Mr. Vigil, from day one, has attempted to clean up this office, and that's what he has done," said Vigil's attorney, Sam Bregman, who blamed the allegations on disgruntled former employees.

Vigil, flanked by more than a dozen family members and other supporters, asked the public to be patient as the case proceeds. Montoya left the brief hearing without speaking to reporters.

Prosecutors say Montoya was paid about $632,000 while Vigil received about $54,000 from a financial adviser hired to help invest state funds.

But an FBI affidavit describes a wider scheme and says Vigil accepted an envelope stuffed with cash as recently as last month.

Kickbacks to Vigil allegedly included expensive tickets to political fund-raisers, wood and supplies and donations to charities in which Vigil's wife participates.

A witness said he bought Montoya sports memorabilia, cars and other items using proceeds from the kickbacks, the affidavit said.

Both Vigil and Montoya were arrested Friday at their homes after a two-year FBI investigation.

Vigil, elected to a four-year term in 2002, was asked to step aside Sunday by Gov. Bill Richardson.

On Monday, Lt. Gov. Diane Denish urged Vigil to immediately take administrative leave while the case is pending.

"Mr. Vigil has the right to due process, but the pending charges make it impossible for him to conduct the business of the state with full public confidence," she said.

Vigil has not made a decision on whether to step down, but Bregman said his client will consider all options. Last week, Vigil said he plans to continue to serve as state treasurer. He was not at work Monday.

Vigil served as deputy treasurer under Montoya, who was treasurer from 1995 to 2002. When Vigil was auditor, he hired Montoya in 1992 as head of the agency's Medicaid fraud unit.

Abu Ghraib Guard To Fight Abuse Charges (WP)

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

SAN ANTONIO -- Army Pfc. Lynndie England will abandon her earlier courtroom strategy and will fight charges that she was a key participant in detainee abuse by guards at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, her lawyer said.

England, 22, a reservist, appears in photos taken inside Abu Ghraib. She was to go on trial Tuesday at Fort Hood, Tex., on seven counts of mistreating prisoners.

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0006766

· MONTGOMERY, Ala. -- Waste Management canceled plans to develop a landfill along a historic trail that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery Voting Rights March. Civil rights activists and neighbors had sued to block the landfill near where civil rights worker Viola Liuzzo was gunned down after the march.

· INEZ, Ky. -- People who live in a community deluged with more than 300 million gallons of gooey black coal sludge five years ago reached an out-of-court settlement for an undisclosed sum with Martin County Coal. Ned Pillersdorf, a Prestonsburg, Ky., attorney representing 12 of the people who lived in the sludged area, criticized the U.S. Mine Safety and Health Administration. He said federal inspectors should have known the impoundment was unsafe and should have forced the company to stop using it.

· NEW YORK -- The threat of a Democratic mayoral runoff evaporated when city election officials announced that Fernando Ferrer had captured 727 more votes than the 40 percent he needed in last week's primary to become the nominee challenging Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

· ALBUQUERQUE -- New Mexico Treasurer Robert Vigil and former treasurer Michael Montoya pleaded not guilty to federal racketeering charges. They are accused of receiving kickbacks of cash, cars and expensive tickets to political fundraisers in exchange for allegedly steering state business to an investment adviser.

· DECATUR, Ga. -- Colvin "Butch" Hinton, 44, was convicted of murdering Shannon Melendi, 19, 11 years ago. Her body was never found.

· REMINGTON, Ind. -- A man shot and killed two women working at a convenience store, and police were seeking a man who also was suspected of killing a teenage girl in Ohio. Melvin M. Keeling, 43, of Deerfield Township, Ohio, was identified from images captured by a camera in the store where Liza Kendall, 29, and Kendora Furr, 38, were killed. Keeling was wanted for questioning in the shooting death of Katelind Caudill, 13, near Cincinnati earlier Monday, police said.

Oswego Mayor Allowed To Go Home, To Work While Sex Case Pending (AP)

By WILLIAM KATES, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2005

SYRACUSE, N.Y. (AP) Although a judge accused him of having ``deviant sexual urges," Oswego Mayor John Gosek was released Monday with a set of conditions that include electronic monitoring, a curfew and other restrictions.

Gosek, 58, was arrested Friday at a Syracuse hotel on a charge that he used a cell phone to solicit sex from a minor.

U.S. Magistrate George Lowe said while he was concerned Gosek was ``unable to control his deviant sexual urges, he is not irrational," and rejected a request by prosecutors to keep Gosek in jail as a threat to the community and a flight danger.

Lowe ordered Gosek to post $10,000 bond. The judge also prohibited Gosek from using cell phones and ordered him not to have contact with any minors. Gosek also must undergo counseling a condition Gosek requested, said his attorney James Eby.

Gosek appeared at Monday's hour-long hearing with his wife and two adult sons, who sat in the front row consoling each other. They left the courthouse without comment.

Eby said the mayor adamantly denies have sexual relations with a minor.

``He's somewhat in a state of shock. It's just starting to sink in now," Eby said. ``He feels he's done a good job as mayor. Obviously, he's sad that this day is here."

Gosek was ``actively reviewing" his political future and would likely make a decision within days, Eby said.

Oswego City Council President William Dunsmoor said ``it would be the right choice" for Gosek to resign after his arrest.

``I've spoken with the majority of the other councilors ... and they agree it would be in the best interests of the city," said Dunsmoor, who is serving as acting mayor.

The council scheduled an emergency meeting Monday night to discuss the scandal, Dunsmoor said.

The conditions set by Lowe allow Gosek to leave his house between 7 a.m. and 9 p.m., which would allow the mayor to continue his duties.

According to court papers, Gosek was arrested after paying a confidential informant $250 to introduce him to two 15-year-old girls at a Syracuse hotel. The federal charge carries a sentence of five to 30 years in prison, said officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office.

State police began an investigation of Gosek in November 2004, recording conversations of Gosek offering money or drugs in exchange for sex, court documents said. The FBI joined the investigation in April and put a wiretap on Gosek's city-owned cell phone.

``It's not just talk on a telephone. There's a pattern of him using the cell phone for illicit sexual activities," said Assistant U.S. Attorney John Katko.

DOJ_NMG_0006767

Gosek, a Republican, is in his second term as mayor of Oswego, a city of about 17,900 along Lake Ontario, 34 miles north of Syracuse. In recent months, Gosek's administration has become a magnet for controversy.

In March, a former city employee was caught doing 88 mph on a local highway in a city-owned vehicle assigned to Gosek. The woman told state police she was Gosek's girlfriend. Gosek said she was an acquaintance 19, 2005 I am hereby resigning my office as Senator of the 23rd Senatorial District of the state of Connecticut."

A copy of the letter was to be delivered to Gov. M. Jodi Rell on Monday. Rell has 10 days to file a writ for a special election. Once that writ is filed, the election must be held in 45 days.

Bysiewicz said her office requested that Rell not to pick Nov. 8, the date of this year's municipal elections. According to state law, both elections cannot be held on the same day, she said.

``There will be too much conflict in the polling places," she said.

Officials are also barred from holding a special election on weekends and Nov. 11, which is Veterans Day. That leaves only five possible days: Nov. 4, 7, 9, 10 and 14.

George Comer, the Republican registrar of voters in Bridgeport, said he prefers Nov. 14, but has not yet discussed a date with the Democratic registrar. Comer said the city has 125 machines and will use around 95 or so during the municipal election.

Newton's district includes mostly Bridgeport and a section of Stratford.

Since the voting machines will be unavailable several days before and two weeks after the special election, Bysiewicz said municipalities may have to borrow lever voting machines from towns with May elections, use its backup machines, use paper ballots or rent optical scan machines.

Comer said mechanics are now looking at all of the city's backup machines.

``We'll do everything reasonable to avoid using paper ballots," he said.

Prominent Imam Sentenced To 87 Months (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 2005

Imam Shamsud-din Ali, convicted earlier this year of racketeering charges that were part of a broader City Hall corruption probe, was sentenced today to 87 months in prison.

Ali, 67, showed no reaction as U.S. District Court Judge Bruce W. Kauffman leveled the sentence after a two-hour hearing attended by hundreds of the imam's supporters.

Considered one of the most influential Muslim leaders in the city, Ali declined to make any comment during the hearing or as he emerged from the courthouse later in the day. He will remain free on bail pending an appeal.

Ali was convicted of racketeering, racketeering conspiracy and assorted mail fraud, bank fraud and extortion charges by a federal district court jury in June.

During the eight-week trial, prosecutors alleged the charismatic leader of the Philadelphia Masjid used his mosque, a school he and his wife operated and a business they controlled in a series "money for nothing schemes" that generated tens of thousands of dollars in illegal income.

During the sentencing hearing, Assistant U.S. Attorney Frank Labor, the lead prosecutor in the case, said Ali had "used his standing as a civic leader to profit for himself."

Labor said Ali had shown "disdain for the law" and embodied how a system of corruption based on access and influence worked in City Hall.

Ali's lawyer, James Binns, declined to comment about specifics of the case, but reiterated earlier arguments that the jury had been prejudicially tainted by improper references to Ali's alleged ties to drug dealers.

In all, Ali was convicted of 22 of the 34 counts he faced in a racketeering indictment that grew out of a broader political corruption probe of City Hall.

Philly Cleric Sentenced For Corruption (AP)

By Joann Loviglio

AP, September 20, 2005

PHILADELPHIA - A prominent Muslim cleric on Monday was sentenced to more than seven years in prison on racketeering and other charges, the latest in a string of convictions stemming from the FBI's sweeping probe of municipal corruption.

Prosecutors said that Shamsud-din Ali, 67, used his political connections to obtain dubious loans, donations and city contracts. In addition to his 87-month sentence, Ali was ordered to pay restitution. He was released pending an appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0006768

The investigation of the so-called "pay to play" culture in Philadelphia's city government has led to the convictions and guilty pleas for more than a dozen people, including a former city treasurer, two bank executives and several business owners seeking city contracts.

The probe became public when police discovered an FBI bug in Mayor John F. Street's office. The mayor has denied any wrongdoing and has not been charged.

Ali, the leader of a west Philadelphia mosque, was charged with 34 counts. After six days of deliberations, jurors convicted him in June of 22 counts, including racketeering.

According to prosecutors, he and his wife, Faridah, used the Muslim school they ran as a private piggy bank, soliciting donations and public education funds for adult education classes that were never held. The Alis had at least five family members on the payroll, including two adult children who lived out of state.

Faridah Ali was convicted and sentenced to a year of house arrest on related charges.

ALI RECEIVES 7-YEAR JAIL SENTENCE (PHI)

By Kitty Caparella

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 2005

MUSLIM CLERIC Shamsud-din Ali "has one more year to con people out here," said a disgusted Muslim, upset that Ali is out on bail.

"It's a travesty. If there's any fairness, he will win on appeal," said Ali loyalist, Asim Abdul Rashid, head of the Majlis Ash'Shura, a regional body of imams.

That was the diverse reaction in the Muslim community and elsewhere to the once prestigious imam's sentencing by U.S. District Judge Bruce Kauffman yesterday.

The judge allowed about 100 of Ali's supporters to cram into the tense courtroom. They sat on the floor and stood in the aisles.

Calling the offenses "serious," Kauffman sentenced Ali, a friend of the mayor, the governor and other pols, to an 87-month prison term on racketeering and related charges, and a 60-month concurrent term on multiple frauds and interstate travel in the aid of racketeering.

Mayor Street declined to comment.

Kauffman ordered Ali, 67, of Melrose Park, to pay restitution of $365,000 to four victims of fraud and extortion, and to forfeit $286,646, a total of more than $650,000.

He also must pay $2,600 in court costs.

The sentence was based on seven illegal moneymaking schemes, involving schools, a bank, and private companies.

On June 14, Ali was found guilty of 22 counts of racketeering, racketeering conspiracy, multiple frauds, extortion and interstate travel in the aid of racketeering. He admitted to four counts of tax evasion.

The judge, however, suspended the stiff jail term while Ali's lawyer, James Binns, appeals the use of drug dealers' testimony and their wiretapped conversations in the nearly six-week racketeering trial.

The appeal, to be filed within 10 days, could take up to a year.

Binns has passionately argued about the drug issue before, during and after the trial, even though Kauffman didn't think Binns had a prayer of a chance on appeal, and said as much yesterday and in a 14-page opinion last month.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Frank Labor has argued the drug evidence supported the racketeering count and was one of the uncharged moneymaking schemes.

The usually talkative Ali appeared stoic throughout the two-hour sentencing and did not speak.

For months, Ali predicted that he wouldn't go to jail. And yesterday, many Muslim believers said they figured "he'd walk."

"I'm relieved," said Binns later.

"Mr. Ali will remain free for the resolution of the appeal.

"The government is pleased with the sentence," said Labor, who prosecuted the federal case with Anthony Wzoreck and Zane D. Memeger, of the U.S. Organized Crime Strike Force.

"It sends a clear message that law enforcement can and will protect the citizens of Philadelphia from criminals like Shamsud-din Ali," said Labor.

"While he was posing as an upstanding member of the community, he was out in the real world making himself rich with a life of crime... defrauding public institutions, private banks and cheating on his taxes," he added.

At the same time, he added, the children at Sister Clara Muhammad School were "wearing overcoats because he hadn't paid the bills, or fixed the heat and water."

DOJ_NMG_0006769

The judge ordered Ali to relinguish his position as director of the school, which the jury found he used to run his "criminal enterprise" to rip off his victims.

Labor could not persuade the judge to order an electronic monitoring device for Ali, just as his wife, Faridah, wears on her ankle during her 12-month sentence of house arrest, appealed by the government.

Last October, she was convicted of defrauding Community College of Philadelphia in an adult basic education program.

The CCP scheme was also part of her husband's trial; she faces the same federal charges, as her husband, at a Nov. 14 trial.

The four-year case was investigated by the FBI, Internal Revenue Service, and the U.S. Department of Education's inspector general's office.

Kauffman ordered the couple to repay the college $170,000.

Ali and co-defendants, who were involved in other fraud and extortion schemes, must also repay the City of Philadelphia $60,595, the amount Ali's firm, Keystone and Information Service, received for a bogus real estate tax collection scheme; a $100,000 line of credit to Commerce Bank; and $25,000 that Ali and a co-defendant extorted from Waste Management and Processors, Inc., of Pottsville.

Because Ali is out on appeal, said Labor, the government can begin collecting its $650,000 in restitution and forfeiture costs.

The judge had given Ali a $1,000-a-month payment schedule after completing his prison term.

Ali also faces five years of supervised release.

Ali remains resident imam at the Philadelphia masjid, his only source of income since ATT Communications, Inc. stopped paying the minority businessman almost $2,000 a month in August for helping to arrange for cellphone towers at the Philadelphia International airport.

"It's a disgrace that the judge left him loose like that," said a Muslim member of Ali's mosque, which is the same building as the school, at 47th Street and Wyalusing Avenue.

"He cheated the school. That money given to the school was supposed to give community people an education," he added.

"What kind of leader do you call that?"

Task Force Takes War On Gangs To County (TAMPTRIB)

By KEITH MORELLI

Tampa Tribune, September 20, 2005

TOWN - 'N COUNTRY A sustained assault on street gangs in northwest Hillsborough County by a task force made up of federal agents and county deputies resulted in the arrest of more than 100 suspected gang members and the seizure of nearly $1 million in property.

They didn't get everyone, though.

As Sheriff David Gee announced the results of the sweeping six-month investigation Monday afternoon, workers at Morgan Woods Elementary School scrubbed bright orange gang graffiti off the walls and sidewalks.

Undaunted by the graffiti -- which may have been an attempt to recruit young members or the marking of turf -- Gee said the sweep was a big blow to the street gangs in northwest Hillsborough because many of those arrested were leaders.

"This will put a significant dent in gang activities," he said during a news conference at Jackson Springs Park.

The gang task force included Hillsborough sheriff's deputies, FBI agents and U.S. attorney's office investigators, as well as an undercover Pasco County sheriff's detective who infiltrated one gang.

Information from some sources was so reliable, in one instance a planned home invasion was thwarted and waiting deputies arrested the would-be assailants as they pulled up to the home.

In all, 105 suspected gang members were arrested, 52 of whom had confirmed gang affiliations. They faced a total of 325 criminal charges, some of which are federal. Deputies seized about $700,000 in illegal drugs, $36,600 in stolen property, $85,000 in vehicles and $9,500 in firearms.

Charges included attempted murder, robbery, theft, home invasion, drug possession and trafficking, assault and battery. Some were juveniles, but most were in their mid- to late teens and 20s.

Most of those named on warrants have been arrested, the sheriff said. Some were illegal immigrants and may be deported, he added.

Gee said some larger communities across the nation have let the gang problem get out of hand and it has overtaken them.

The number of members fluctuates because of the turnover, he said. Recruitment remains a concern, he said, with gangs appealing to disaffected youths, offering them acceptance and companionship.

"We're seeing some as young as 13 years old," Gee said. "When you're seeing members this young, it's a serious problem for our country."

Gang membership is up across the country, he said.

"We've gone after it here," he said. "We're trying to get in front of the issue before it gets any worse ... before it becomes unmanageable."

Mostly, local gangs deal in illegal drugs or robbery, and many of the assaults are on members of opposing gangs, such as an incident this month when four members of the Norte 14 gang attacked a rival gang's house, abducted a pregnant woman and raped her.

That attack was motivated by revenge, Gee said.

In all, deputies suspect about 500 members of more than 35 recognized gangs are in Hillsborough County, ranging from the ultraviolent MS 13 to the Dover Locos to Norte 14.

The inclusion of the federal authorities is a welcome ally in the gang battle, Gee said, and may prove to be a deterrent for would-be gang members.

"We're seeing some as young as 13 years old.

When you're seeing members this young, it's a serious problem for our country."

European Art Thieves Busted With FBI's Help (PHI)

By Ramona Smith

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 2005

It was a helluva heist - and a helluva sting that recovered a stolen Rembrandt painting worth $36 million.

But the FBI says we'll have to wait a couple weeks to learn exactly what role one of its Philadelphia-based agents may have played in the end to one of history's most sensational art thefts.

The heist happened in Stockholm, in 2000, when three men brandishing machine guns toted off three art works, including the Rembrandt, from Sweden's National Museum. They escaped by boat while two cars exploded as a diversion nearby.

The party ended Thursday in Denmark, after an undercover agent - possibly from the Philly FBI - posed as a wannabe buyer and tricked four members of an alleged stolen art ring into a sale at a Copenhagen hotel. The suspects showed up with the Dutch master Rembrandt van Rijn's "Self Portrait," painted about 1630, and were arrested.

"The Philly connection has to do with the sting," local FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said yesterday, teasing an Oct. 4 press session when reporters will be able to get the whole story. "Let's just say maybe somebody here was involved in it, and they can talk about it."

The FBI in Los Angeles - where an organized crime task force this year recovered an Auguste Renoir painting taken from the Swedish museum at the same time - said the suspects had tried to peddle the stolen Rembrandt in both Sweden and L.A.

"The task force was able to introduce an FBI undercover agent with substantial knowledge of art to pose as the buyer/broker for the stolen Rembrandt," the FBI's Los Angeles field office said.

Federal investigators at Philly are known for expertise in stolen art and cultural artifacts. They hosted a new national FBI task force on stolen art this year.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Bob Goldman, one of two federal prosecutors in that FBI group, declined to comment yesterday on the sting in Copenhagen.

The sting ended with four men - a 29-year-old Swede, two Iraqi brothers aged 24 and 29, and a 24-year-old Gambian - in jail in Denmark and awaiting extradition to Sweden. All four denied handling stolen goods.

Danish police said the suspects agreed to accept only $100,000 for a hot painting worth $36 million. The Rembrandt, which was not harmed, will be returned to the museum.

In all, thieves got away with three paintings worth $45 million when they blew up parked cars, threw spikes on the road to deter police and escaped from the museum in December 2000.

Los Angeles investigators recovered the Renoir, titled "Young Parisian" earlier this year, but the FBI kept the recovery secret until Friday to aid the recovery of the Rembrandt. Police in Stockholm recovered Renoir's "Conversation" in 2001.

Four Face Extradition In Rembrandt Case (WP)

By JAN M. OLSEN, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

COPENHAGEN, Denmark -- Four suspects arrested in connection with the recovery of a stolen painting by Dutch master Rembrandt van Rijn will soon be extradited to Sweden where they will be prosecuted, officials said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0006771

Two Iraqis, a Swede and a Gambian were arrested Thursday in a downtown Copenhagen hotel when trying to sell the painting that was stolen from Sweden's National Museum nearly five years ago, police said.

"We are working on getting them extradited to Sweden as soon as possible," Copenhagen police Chief Superintendent Per Larsen said.

The Rembrandt, a self-portrait from 1630, is estimated to be worth 250 million Danish kroner (euro34 million; US$42 million). It was stolen from the museum in Stockholm by three armed robbers in December 2000, together with two other paintings by French painter Auguste Renoir.

The painting, which Larsen said was unharmed, is expected to be returned to the National Museum.

The arrests last week were the result of a multinational operation that included several U.S. law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Posing as an art buyer, an unnamed FBI agent met the suspects in a downtown Copenhagen hotel. They offered to sell him the stolen Rembrandt for only US$100,000 (euro82,000), police said.

The 24-year-old Gambian, a 29-year-old Swede and two Iraqi brothers aged 24 and 29 have all pleaded innocent to preliminary charges of handling stolen goods.

In Sweden, Prosecutor Ronnie Jacobsson said he hoped the men would be handed over this week.

"All four agree to be handed over to Sweden and be prosecuted here," Jacobsson told Swedish news agency TT.

Larsen said the Copenhagen operation was linked to a probe that led to the recovery of Renoir's "Young Parisian" about six months ago in an undisclosed location in Los Angeles.

The FBI kept the recovery of that painting secret until Friday to aid the recovery of the Rembrandt.

The other Renoir was recovered in 2001.

Pair Pleads Guilty In Scams (KNOXNS)

By JAMIE SATTERFIELD

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), September 20, 2005

GREENEVILLE - A Morristown couple pleaded guilty Monday to bilking dozens of people, many of them elderly, in a multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme.

Gary Lee Von Oesen, 61, and girlfriend Geneva Retha Houston, 59, admitted their respective roles in a host of financial crimes spanning 1996 to 2003 at a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greeneville before federal Judge J. Ronnie Greer.

Advertisement

Von Oesen, the mastermind behind the Ponzi scheme dubbed World Money Club, struck a deal with federal prosecutors in which he confessed to two of the 97 crimes of which he was accused.

Houston, who served as the bookkeeper for Von Oesen's investment schemes and profited from them, pleaded guilty to a single charge.

As part of the deal, the couple has agreed to pay back "all victims" cited in the indictment lodged against the pair. That indictment numbered victims at more than 35.

The couple also admitted in the deal with Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil Smith that their financial crimes cost their victims "more than $2.5 million but not more than $7 million."

The actual amount of loss to investors, many of whom Smith has termed "vulnerable" because of their age, has been estimated to be as high as $12 million.

Smith wrote that the deal was struck, in part, to allow "the numerous victims, several of whom are now elderly and/or in poor health, to avoid being required to appear and testify."

Von Oesen and Houston were nabbed last year after a probe led by FBI Agent Lane P. Rushing into allegations including mail fraud, securities fraud and money laundering.

The biggest scam alleged in indictments involved a Ponzi scheme, which is an investment swindle in which early investors are paid off with money put up by later ones to encourage others to join in.

Von Oesen set up a limited partnership he called World Money Club and billed it as a firm engaging in commodity futures. He recruited some investors through First Fitness, a "multilevel marketing program for the sale of fitness products in which Houston was a dealer and participant," Smith wrote.

The scheme promised investors a payoff as large as 25 percent, but the real monetary prize went to Von Oesen and Houston, who used investors' money to line their own pockets, pay their mortgage and buy timeshare units in Florida.

Greer set a Jan. 9 sentencing date for the pair.

On that day, Houston will also be sentenced for her December conviction for lying to federal Magistrate Judge Dennis Inman when he quizzed her about her ability to hire an attorney in the fraud case.

She claimed she had no disposable cash, but the $15,000 ring she wore to her August arraignment made the judge suspicious. An investigation later showed she had more than $5,700 stashed in a bank account at the time.

Houston faces a maximum five-year prison term, but her sentence likely will be far less, court records show. Although Von Oesen faces a 10-year maximum prison term, prosecutors have agreed to a penalty range of 41 to 51 months.

MAN PLEADS GUILTY TO EXTORTION CHARGES (TMT)

By CASEY KNAUPP, Staff Writer

Tyler Morning Telegraph, September 20, 2005

A 34-year-old Tyler man pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to attempting to extort $120,000 from a local woman.

Kirkpatrick Lenord Moore admitted to receiving proceeds of extortion on Dec. 29 after he had left several threatening notes and phone calls to the woman.

Moore faces up to three years in prison and will probably be placed in the sentencing guideline range of 15 to 18 months, considering his criminal history and acceptance of responsibility, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Middleton told U.S. District Judge William Steger.

Moore is currently on parole for an aggravated robbery conviction in Sulphur Springs and faces additional prison time.

Defense attorney Clifton Roberson said Moore has been jailed for the federal charge since December and could be released soon after his sentencing hearing, depending on what punishment Steger assesses.

Moore admitted in court Monday that on Dec. 10, he left a note at the woman's apartment, threatening to turn information he had about her to authorities if she did not pay him $120,000. The threats, which began once Moore found out she had funds in a retirement account, continued for weeks.

FBI officials said they believe the woman had information regarding a felony suspect wanted in Smith County. Moore threatened to inform the FBI of the woman's knowledge and to accuse her of committing an offense regarding the information, according to a FBI affidavit.

After the FBI had gotten involved in the extortion case, Moore told the victim to drop off a bag of money in a trash can at a car wash on Shiloh Road. After he retrieved the cash and a short chase, authorities caught him.

In his pickup, authorities found the victim's phone number, a semi-automatic handgun and a device used to modify his voice when he called the victim. They found the paper bag containing $200 and his cell phone, which he dropped as he ran from authorities.

Casey Knaupp covers county, state and federal courts. She can be reached at 903.596.6289. e-mail: news@tylerpaper.com

Lil' Kim Reports To Detention Center In Philadelphia (AP)

By KATHY MATHESON, The Associated Press

AP, September 19, 2005

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Rapper Lil' Kim began serving a 366-day prison sentence at a federal detention center Monday for perjury and conspiracy stemming from a 2001 shootout outside a Manhattan radio station.

The 30-year-old entertainer, whose real name is Kimberly Jones, was whisked into the center past a throng of media, fans and passers-by at about 4:45 p.m.

Earlier, she had issued a statement saying she had "unfortunately" been assigned to the concrete, high-rise Philadelphia facility instead of to a prison camp "as discussed," and added, "I am not certain that this constitutes fair and equal treatment."

Her lawyer, L. Londell McMillan, said a celebrity of his client's magnitude could be in danger in such a detention center, which he said was mainly designed as a temporary holding facility for inmates awaiting permanent assignment to a prison.

"Why should a female hip-hop artist have to spend time in an urban concrete jungle while other female prisoners are assigned to rural, suburban-type prison camps?" said McMillan, adding that he would seek to have his client reassigned.

Calls to the federal Bureau of Prisons and the U.S. Marshals Service were not returned Monday.

The 4-foot-11 rapper, who was convicted of lying about the gun battle to a federal grand jury and in the subsequent trial, brought about 20 to 25 people down to Philadelphia with her in a caravan of two RVs. Her mother, brother and lawyer were allowed to accompany her briefly into the detention center to say goodbye, McMillan said.

"She was upbeat, smiling," he said. "She told her mom not to cry and to stay strong."

Lil' Kim will be assigned to a female work cadre at the coed prison, McMillan said, noting that she could be out in nine months with good behavior.

"Today begins a new saga in my life which I expect to strengthen me and allow me time for reflection," Lil' Kim said in her statement. "I plan to write music while in prison, read and pray regularly and will come out a stronger, more confident woman."

DOJ_NMG_0006773

The case stemmed from a gun battle that erupted outside WQHT-FM, known as Hot 97, when Lil' Kim's entourage crossed paths with a rival rap group, Capone-N-Noreaga.

Lil' Kim's group confronted the others about the Capone-N-Noreaga song "Bang, Bang," which contained an insult to Lil' Kim from rival Foxy Brown. One man was hurt in the shootout that followed.

Before the grand jury and at the trial, the rapper maintained that she had not noticed two of her close friends at the scene of the shootout — her manager, Daemon Butler, and Sufi Jackson. Both have pleaded guilty to gun charges.

Jurors at Lil' Kim's trial saw radio station security photos that depicted Butler opening a door for the rap star, and two witnesses who once made records with Lil' Kim said they saw her at the station with Butler and Jackson.

Though several high-profile rappers — including Beanie Siege and Tupac Shaker — have done time in jail, Lil' Kim is the first prominent female artist to serve a prison sentence.

Lil' Kim's fourth album, "The Naked Truth," is due out next week. She won a Grammy in 2001 for her part in the hit remake of "Lady Marmalade."

At last month's MTV Video Music Awards, MTV personality Sway delicately asked if she had anything to say to fans who "might not see you for a while."

"You can write me letters," Lil' Kim said.

Psychologist Endorses Overnights Visits For Hinckley (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

A psychologist yesterday testified that John W. Hinckley Jr.'s mental state has improved since he shot President Reagan and that the would-be assassin should be allowed to visit his parents and stay overnight with them in their home in Williamsburg.

"I believe with a reasonable degree of psychiatric certainty ... that Mr. Hinckley poses a low risk," Paul Montalbano said during daylong testimony in federal court.

Hinckley, 50, has been confined at St. Elizabeths Hospital since he was acquitted in 1982 of wounding Mr. Reagan and four others. He showed no emotion yesterday as his attorneys sought permission for him to progressively spend up to eight days and seven nights at his parents' home and sometimes with his brother, sister and in-laws.

Hearing on whether Hinckley should be allowed to visit his parents overnight will continue today in U.S. District Court.

Hinckley's parents have visited the District several times in the past year to accompany their son on unsupervised trips to parks, museums, shopping centers and restaurants. Routinely, he is allowed to wander about the 2,900-acre grounds of the mental hospital unsupervised.

Mr. Montalbano said Hinckley abides by rules and regulations. His rehabilitation would be increased if he were allowed to walk through the vast community around his parents' home, which includes six golf courses, shopping centers, a school and historical sites, the hospital psychologist testified.

"Isolation is not a good thing," Mr. Montalbano said. "In his case, it is a potential problem. He is intensely self-absorbed."

Hinckley shot Mr. Reagan in 1981, saying he was trying to impress actress Jodie Foster.

Since entering St. Elizabeths, he has shown interest in a female chaplain, a psychiatric intern and former patient Leslie deVeau, Mr. Montalbano said. It was a good sign when Hinckley ended his relationship with Miss deVeau in January because she would not discuss their relationship with his treatment team, he said.

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman asked about the effect of reintegrating Hinckley into society where he would have contact with women.

Mr. Montalbano said it has been many years since Hinckley has suffered from the symptoms that led him to four suicide attempts and the shooting of the president.

The Secret Service has Hinckley under surveillance during his trips.

Hinckley Wants Girlfriend, Psychologist Says In Court (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Presidential assailant John W. Hinckley Jr., who is petitioning the court for more freedom, is lonely and longing for a close relationship like the one he had for many years with a former psychiatric patient, a psychologist testified yesterday.

"He wants to have a girlfriend. He wants intimate contact with a female," Paul Montalbano, chief of pretrial services at St. Elizabeths, the Southeast Washington mental hospital, testified yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0006774

The psychologist said such a desire is natural for a man who has ended a long relationship, as Hinckley did this year. Hinckley, 50, cut his ties to Leslie deVeau after the relationship came under scrutiny during hearings to decide whether he was ready for expanded freedoms.

For a time, Hinckley was escorting a young hospital intern to her car and offering to sing to her. But after his doctors became aware of his special interest in the woman, Hinckley was told that he was crossing a line between staff and patient and had to stop, which he did, Montalbano said.

The underlying question at a hearing yesterday appeared to be how Hinckley would handle courtship and respond to rejection out in the world, away from the structure and support of a hospital.

Hinckley would like to eventually be released from St. Elizabeths, where the staff has found his depression and psychotic disorder to be in remission. He has been confined to the hospital in Southeast Washington since 1982, when a federal jury found him not guilty by reason of insanity in the shootings of President Ronald Reagan and three others.

In the meantime, he wants the court's permission to make a series of overnight visits to his parents' residence in Williamsburg, and this week a federal judge is hearing his petition and the government's opposition to it.

Hinckley's interest in women, viewed as natural by the psychologist, is disconcerting to the Justice Department's attorneys, who oppose any expansion of Hinckley's freedoms and who note that it was Hinckley's obsession with actress Jodie Foster that spurred him to open fire on Reagan in 1981.

On the hearing's first day, the questions and answers centered on how Hinckley handled his breakup with deVeau and how he has acted toward women since then. Hinckley met deVeau when both were confined at St. Elizabeths. She was found not guilty by reason of insanity in the 1982 shooting death of her 10-year-old daughter and was released from the hospital eight years later.

Saddened by the breakup, Hinckley did not spiral into depression, Montalbano testified. His longing for a new female companion has been obvious to those who treat him, the psychologist said.

The intern was apparently not his only romantic interest. Smitten with a hospital chaplain, he scheduled an appointment with her. But when asked about it by his doctors, Hinckley admitted that the appointment was mostly a chance to see a "pretty lady" and agreed to cancel it, Montalbano said.

Over the past two years, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman has allowed Hinckley to leave St. Elizabeths for excursions in the Washington area, including some with his parents. Initially the family was accompanied by hospital chaperons. But more recently, Friedman has permitted the family to go without such supervision and has allowed overnight visits in the area.

Even as the hospital supervisions have fallen away, the Secret Service has continued to track Hinckley.

During yesterday's hearing, Hinckley's parents sat in the first row of the gallery on the same side of the courtroom as their son, who was wearing a blue jacket, white shirt and red tie.

Seated at a table with his attorneys, Hinckley seemed to follow the testimony intently, rarely focusing his gaze anywhere but the witness stand as Montalbano answered questions from Hinckley attorney Barry Wm. Levine; the government's lawyer, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas E. Zeno; and Friedman.

Hinckley's parents live in a 2,900-acre gated community in Williamsburg that has golf courses, a pool, a clubhouse and a shopping center, and that is where he would stay during the proposed series of six visits -- the longest of which would last just over a week.

Montalbano said that the process needs to be gradual and must be monitored but that visits with his family have been an important part of his treatment and should continue to be.

He said that, just as many people rely on their partners for support, Hinckley could be well served by the sort of relationship he craves. But Montalbano also said that given the scrutiny such a partner would endure, Hinckley may face a hard road to romance: "Mr. Hinckley remains optimistic, but perhaps naively optimistic."

Jury Selection Begins In Ex-Illinois Gov's Trial (REU-Y2)

By Andrew Stern

Reuters, September 20, 2005

Jury selection began on Monday in the public corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, a Republican known for commuting the sentences of the state's death row inmates who now may have to save himself.

Ryan, 71, is charged with steering state contracts to friends in exchange for free gifts, vacations, cash and loans to himself and his family while governor and, before that, during eight years as Illinois' secretary of state.

He is accused of racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud, tax fraud and lying to investigators.

Ryan's friend, lobbyist Larry Warner, is also a defendant in what is likely to be a four-month trial, participants said.

DOJ_NMG_0006775

After a 40-year career in Illinois politics, Ryan retired after a single term as governor in 2003 with a $191,300 yearly pension, with many Republicans blaming him for leaving the state party in shambles.

In recent interviews he has denied any wrong-doing.

"I feel, without question, that I'm going to be exonerated," he said on Chicagoland's Television.

Ryan, who is expected to testify, is perhaps best-known for adopting a strong stance against the death penalty, a move some critics say was a cynical attempt to distract from the gathering clouds of scandal.

Ryan speaks frequently to audiences about what brought him to declare a moratorium on executions in 2001 and to one of his final acts in office: commuting the sentences of all 167 Illinois death row inmates. He said the death penalty system was "broken," citing numerous exonerations of condemned inmates.

But Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer has ruled Ryan's actions on behalf of the condemned will not be allowed in trial. Still in question is whether the judge will allow evidence about a horrific 1994 highway crash that killed six children -- blamed on a truck driver who bought his license with a bribe -- which launched the Operation Safe Road investigation.

The decade-old probe that grew out of the licenses-for-bribes scandal cast a wider net over public corruption and has resulted in 73 convictions. Among them is Ryan's former chief of staff, Scott Fawell, who is serving a 6-1/2-year sentence and will testify for the prosecution.

"The defense is going to turn on Ryan's image as a big-picture manager who was not involved in day-to-day operations," said University of Chicago law professor Bernard Harcourt.

"It's going to turn on whether he takes the stand and how he does on direct and cross-examination," Harcourt said. "It's going to be up to him."

Racketeering And Fraud Trial Begins For Illinois Ex-Governor (NYT)

By Jodi Wilgoren

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

CHICAGO, Sept. 19 - All the potential jurors recognized the defendant - the white hair, the big glasses, the gruff face. One admired his moratorium on executions in the state. Another expressed disdain for any politician who uses a position for personal gain. A third said he found the defendant "forgetful and unprepared."

"He referred to Dick Butkus as Mike Ditka," the third juror recalled of seeing the defendant botch an award presentation at a football banquet. "The times when he would be on television, whatever I read in the newspapers, it would seem to me he was unprepared."

So went the opening day of jury selection in the criminal corruption trial of George Ryan, the former governor of Illinois who became an international star for his challenge of capital punishment even as scandal eroded his popularity at home to cause him to leave office after a single term.

Mr. Ryan, 71, faces 22 counts of racketeering, mail and tax fraud and lying to federal agents. The charges could add up to 95 years in prison for a man whose legacy as he left office in 2003 was clearing Death Row with a blanket commutation for 160 condemned inmates. Federal prosecutors contend that Mr. Ryan and his relatives received cash, luxury vacations and other gifts worth at least $167,000 in exchange for state contracts and political favors in the dozen years in which he was governor or secretary of state.

Mr. Ryan, a pharmacist from downstate Kankakee who became a deal-making moderate Republican, declined comment on Monday, and his lawyer, Dan K. Webb, said little beyond expressing confidence that his client would be acquitted. Friends of Mr. Ryan, who has spent the past two years on the lecture circuit preaching against the death penalty, say he has been looking forward to his day in court after years of being dogged by accusations and innuendo.

"George truly believes he didn't do anything wrong," said Tony Leone, a friend of 30 years who was a staple of Mr. Ryan's kitchen cabinet and said he spoke to him over the weekend. "He said, 'I want to get it over with.' He says it's time, we need to get this resolved. He's even going to testify; I mean, what does that tell you about a guy?"

The trial caps a seven-year federal investigation that has led to 79 indictments and 73 convictions and is known as Operation Safe Road because of its roots exposing a scheme in which government employees traded commercial driver's licenses for bribes. Mr. Ryan's co-defendant is Lawrence K. Warner, a longtime lobbyist and close confidant.

It comes as a cloud of corruption charges hovers over this city and state, whose political history are rife with similar scandals. Mayor Richard M. Daley of Chicago was questioned last month in a separate federal investigation into political influence on hiring at City Hall, and Gov. Rod R. Blagojevich spent last week fending off speculation that he was the mysterious "Public Official A" accused in a court document of engineering kickbacks involving state pension investments.

"To have a former governor on trial is a big deal even for Illinois," said Kent Redfield, a political scientist at the University of Illinois, noting that another former governor, Otto Kerner Jr., was on the federal bench when he was indicted - and convicted - in the 1970's of accepting bribes. "It just reinforces what is a very cynical attitude among Illinois citizens about politics and politicians. Our expectations and our standards are pretty low. Our politicians try very hard to live up to those low standards."

DOJ_NMG_0006776

Perhaps it should not have been a surprise, then, when the third potential juror questioned Monday morning, a woman who works part time at a Jewel supermarket, said she was disgusted when she read about the charges against Mr. Ryan.

"No one should use their position to get favors," she said. "I was just disappointed that if it was happening, it really shouldn't, and why does it keep going on and on?"

The woman was one of 310 potential jurors who filled out 32-page questionnaires last week that asked what radio and television stations they listened to; whether they consider themselves liberal, conservative or "middle-of-the-road"; if they have ever sought the assistance of public officials; and what their impressions or opinions are of Mr. Ryan.

"Do not like him," wrote Juror No. 19, who also expressed strong negative views of politicians generally ("they steal and lie") and lobbyists ("they take money and don't do anything"). Juror No. 18 said he had heard Mr. Ryan's office "was corrupt and he should have done a better job."

Questioned one by one in the courtroom, some for as long as 40 minutes, most of the first dozen potential jurors were more circumspect, saying they had vague recollections of reading something about the case, but would nonetheless approach evidence with open minds. One said he had got his job at the city's 911 dispatch center through political connections; another said he had a vanity license plate, seemingly unaware that such coveted plates are among the items Mr. Ryan's secretary of state's office is said to have traded for political favors.

"Of course you get those feelings," one candidate said when asked whether publicity about corruption cases left him seeing all politicians as crooks. "But none of it would keep me from judging fairly as a juror."

No jurors were selected Monday, though five were dismissed because of biases revealed in the questionnaires, and four others were excused for hardships they would incur in a trial expected to stretch over four months.

Just picking the panel of 12 jurors and 6 alternates may take three days or more. That is likely to be followed by some three weeks of testimony by the prosecution's star witness, Scott Fawell, a former Ryan chief of staff who is serving a six-and- a-half-year prison sentence himself and agreed to cooperate with the government in exchange for leniency for his fiancée.

"I am hopeful that this sends some serious signals to our politicians throughout the state that business as usual is no defense for corruption," said Cindi Canary, director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform, a corruption watchdog. "It's been a really slow, kind of painful process, starting at the bottom. I think it's important that we see that it has worked its way up to the top, and Ryan is the top. It's as high as it gets here."

Ryan Trial Off To Slow Start As Potential Jurors Are Grilled About Bias (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, September 20, 2005

CHICAGO - Jury selection for former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering trial got off to a slow start Monday with questions from defense attorneys focusing on possible bias resulting from media coverage of the scandal that has dominated state politics for seven years.

"Because he was governor this is a highly unusual case," Ryan attorney Dan Webb told the court. "We should not end up with a jury that has people on it with biases against George Ryan."

Webb urged federal Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer not to put time limits on the questioning and she said she would wait until noon Tuesday before doing so to see if the pace picks up.

But she said it was necessary to get going.

After one day of jury selection, 14 of some 300 potential jurors had been interviewed and eight were placed in a pool for later consideration. Eleven of the 300 were dismissed for reasons ranging from health problems to job conflicts to blatant bias against the former governor.

Ryan, 71, is charged with racketeering, lying to federal agents and tax fraud.

The 22-count indictment says he gave lobbyist Larry Warner, now his co-defendant, free reign to steer big-money state contracts and leases to clients when Ryan was secretary of state.

He also is accused of doling out favors ranging from state leases to low-digit license plates to his friends while enjoying free vacations in Jamaica and other benefits.

Ryan and Warner insist they have done nothing wrong.

The case is an outgrowth of the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road, which began as an inquiry into bribes paid for drivers licenses and mushroomed into a full-scale investigation of corruption during Ryan's tenure as secretary of state and governor.

Ryan, who declined to comment on the trial, greeted reporters in a hearty voice as he entered the courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0006777

"Good morning, good morning," he said. "You had to get up early this morning - all of you."

He seemed as calm and confident as ever as he chatted with reporters, chortling that he has not visited a favorite Chicago eatery "for a long time, although it looks like I have."

Webb declined to comment when reporters asked him whether an unidentified woman in a striped suit who sat beside the former governor's wife, Lura Lynn Ryan, was a jury consultant.

Such consultants are sometimes used as lawyers decide which potential jurors are most likely to be emotionally sympathetic to the defense and which to the prosecution.

Pallmeyer intends to create a pool of 50 to 60 potential jurors who have survived the first round of selection. Attorneys will whittle that number down by using so-called peremptory challenges, which allow them to dismiss a certain number of jurors without giving a reason.

The defense has 18 peremptory challenges and the prosecution has 10. The panel of 12 jurors and six alternates will be selected from the survivors of that round.

Several jurors acknowledged they had heard about Ryan and corruption in the secretary of state's office. But most of them seemed fairly hazy about the details.

One woman said there were two Ryans involved in scandals. She appeared to have George Ryan mixed up with Jim Ryan, the former Illinois attorney general defeated for governor in 2002.

Jim Ryan was not involved in any scandal. But he did grumble during the campaign that voters were getting him mixed up with George Ryan and that was hurting his chances of getting elected.

In the final hour of jury selection, Pallmeyer threw out a man who told the court that he took a dim view of sending elderly people to prison. The same man, a university computer supervisor, said he knew that political corruption was commonplace throughout state government.

Webb fought in vain to keep him in the pool, describing him as "the apex of honesty."

Webb succeeded in getting another potential juror bounced who said he was troubled by news he had heard about corruption in the secretary of state's office under Ryan.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Zachary Fardon battled to keep the man in the pool, telling Pallmeyer that "when all is said and done he indicated that he could be fair."

Pallmeyer agreed to wait until later to rule on a prosecution motion to oust a potential juror who said that his mother was an acquaintance of Webb and that he had met Webb himself.

The man testified that his mother had told him that Webb was a highly skilled lawyer.

Prosecutors argued that such a relationship would be unfair, while Webb protested that he barely knew the mother and didn't remember meeting the man.

D.C. Killing Was 'Face-to-Face,' Police Say (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber And Nia-malika Henderson

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

A man who was fatally shot while walking his dog in Northwest Washington was killed in a "face-to-face" encounter with his assailant, police said yesterday.

Investigators said they had no motive or suspect in the slaying of Gregory C. Shipe, 34, a financial analyst for a large public relations firm downtown. He was shot in the face about 10:40 p.m. Saturday in a crime that one top D.C. police official yesterday called "bizarre."

"There was no rhyme or reason for this," said Capt. C.V. Morris, supervisor of the department's violent crimes division. "The motive in this is a mystery. . . . This was a face-to-face confrontation. Of what type? We don't know."

Shipe was walking his dog, Otis, in the 1700 block of Irving Street NW, in the city's Mount Pleasant section, when he was approached by at least one person, police said. He was shot in the face at close range and died at the scene. His dog, a 50-pound mixed-breed, wandered back to Shipe's residence in a nearby apartment complex, where he was discovered by neighbors.

Although none of Shipe's possessions, including his wallet, was missing, investigators speculated that he most likely was the victim of a botched robbery, authorities said. Police and neighbors said several robberies have taken place in the area recently.

Shipe worked as a financial analyst in the Washington office of Ogilvy Public Relations. He started in May on a temporary basis but soon was hired full time, said Robert Mathias, managing director of the 100-employee office.

Mathias said employees were devastated by the death of a charming colleague who quickly solved problems.

DOJ_NMG_0006778

"There was always just good cheer about him," Mathias said. "He was just a very positive part of our work culture. . . . Nobody deserves this. But of all the people who don't deserve this, Greg is at the front of that line."

Shipe grew up in Waynesburg, Pa., a small community about 50 miles from Pittsburgh. He graduated from the University of Kentucky with a bachelor's degree in business administration.

From 1998 through 2002, he lived in Washington and worked as an analyst for Lockheed Martin Corp. and as a consultant for Booz Allen Hamilton, according to a résumé supplied by Ogilvy.

He attended Owen Graduate School of Management at Vanderbilt University and graduated with an MBA in finance last year.

Business school classmates said that Shipe was a hard-working student and that he co-chaired the gift committee for his 2004 class. The committee raised $118,000 to help refurbish a classroom, shattering fundraising records for class gifts, said Clint Liebenberg, a friend and the former class president.

"He was selfless," Liebenberg said. "He worked really tirelessly on his own time to make sure he achieved his own goals. . . . He was just friendly with everybody and had a really positive outlook on life."

Shipe had been living with friends in Columbia Heights until several weeks ago, when he moved into an apartment in the 1600 block of Kenyon Street NW, police and friends said.

A bouquet of red and yellow flowers and two cards were outside Shipe's apartment door yesterday. Vanessa White, a neighbor, gave Shipe the keys to his apartment about three weeks ago and said she had been looking forward to getting to know him better.

"It's tragic. He was such a nice guy," White said. "The fact that you saw someone in the hall one day and then the next day they are murdered a block away, it shakes you up. . . . When we found out, we kept on saying that could have been any of us. We're always out walking around that late or later. This will make all of us be much more cautious about returning to the building after dark."

Keisha Barkley, who lives in the 1700 block of Irving, said she was surprised to hear that someone was killed in her neighborhood.

"There's no drug activity. It's just a pretty quiet, nice residential neighborhood," she said. "There have been a couple of robberies, car break-ins, that's the only thing that happens in this neighborhood."

A candlelight vigil for Shipe is scheduled to begin at 8:45 tonight outside the Mount Pleasant Neighborhood Library at 3160 16th St. NW. Mourners will walk to the 1700 block of Irving Street NW, where Shipe was slain, organizers said.

Police urged anyone with information to call 202-727-9099. They are offering a reward of up to $25,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of a suspect.

Missing Girl's Car Offers Leads (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

Richmond Police investigating the disappearance of a 17-year-old college freshman spent yesterday investigating leads they got from an examination of the girl's car.

Taylor Marie Behl, a freshman at Virginia Commonwealth University, was last seen by her roommate in her dorm room at about 10 p.m. Sept. 5. Taylor is from Vienna, Va.

An off-duty police officer found Taylor's 1997 Ford Escort on Saturday in Richmond, about a mile and a half from her dorm.

Police said that there were Ohio license plates on the car and that the original Virginia tags were missing. The missing tags were Virginia JPC2848.

The car was turned over to the FBI for forensics processing.

The Richmond Times-Dispatch reported yesterday that Taylor's scent was one of two that a police dog detected in the car and that the discovery is leading police to think that she might have been abducted.

Police have questioned the girl's family and friends, including a 38-year-old amateur photographer who took pictures of her during a campus visit in April. He posted the pictures on a Web site that displays artwork.

The photographs have been removed since Taylor disappeared.

Police executed search warrants on the home of Taylor's mother in Vienna, Va., and the photographer's home in Richmond.

Taylor was last seen wearing a black hooded sweatshirt and blue jeans. She was thought to be carrying her student identification card, a cell phone and a small amount of cash.

Richmond Police Chief Rodney D. Monroe on Thursday upgraded the case from a missing person to a criminal investigation and convened a task force that includes VCU campus police, Virginia State Police and the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0006779

Richmond police have set up a tip line at 804/514-8477.

CIVIL LAW:

Office Depot, Feds Settle False Claims Case (FCW)

By Michael Hardy

Federal Computer Week, September 20, 2005

Office Depot has paid a $4.75 million settlement to the United States over allegations that the company sold products to government agencies in violation of the Trade Agreements Act.

The Justice Department, in announcing the settlement today, said Office Depot sold products from China, Taiwan and other countries that do not have reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, in violation of a provision of the company's General Services Administration schedule contract.

"Federal contractors will be held accountable for their billing practices," said Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general at Justice's Civil Division, in a written statement. "This settlement is an example of the department's determination to ensure that federal funds are protected from fraud and abuse."

The case was originally filed in January 2003 under whistleblower provisions of the False Claims Act by a company called Safina Office Products and two of its executives, Edward Wilder and Robert Hsi Chou Lee. The two executives and the company will get a a total of $712,500 of the settlement as their award under the law.

In May 2005, Justice reached a $9.8 million settlement with Office Max for similar allegations.

Office Depot Pays $4.75 Mln To Settle Claims Case (REU)

Reuters, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept 19 (Reuters) - Office Depot Inc. has paid $4.75 million to resolve allegations that it broke the law by selling office supplies from certain countries to the U.S. government, the Justice Department said on Monday.

The company was accused of violating false claims laws by selling the government supplies made in countries that do not have reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, like China and Taiwan, the Justice Department said.

"Federal contractors will be held accountable for their billing practices," Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general for the Department of Justice's Civil Division," said in a statement.

Earlier this year OfficeMax Inc. agreed to pay $9.8 million to settle similar allegations.

Office Depot shares were down 36 cents to $29.36 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

FEC Sues Pro-Republican Political Group (WP/AP)

By Sharon Theimer, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Federal election officials on Monday sued a political group to try to force it to comply with campaign finance limits, the first lawsuit of its kind to arise from controversial big-money fundraising during the 2004 elections.

The Federal Election Commission filed a complaint in U.S. District Court in Washington against the Club for Growth. The pro-Republican group spent at least $21 million in the 2003-04 election cycle.

The FEC contends the Club spent enough in federal races to require it to file with the commission as a political committee and abide by contribution and spending limits. It wants the court to fine the group and to order it to comply with campaign finance rules.

Club for Growth President Pat Toomey called the FEC lawsuit "a bizarre interpretation of the Club's mission, the Constitution, the laws adopted by Congress and their own regulations governing nonprofit organizations."

"The Club's principal purpose is to advocate for and defend pro-growth policies," Toomey said in a written statement. "We have consulted with counsel every step of the way and have followed the law and regulations that govern our work."

FEC Vice Chairman Michael Toner called the case "one of the most important suits the commission has brought in recent years."

"At stake is whether Club for Growth will be able to continue raising and spending millions of dollars in soft money for activities influencing federal elections," said Toner, a Republican.

The lawsuit is the first to result from several complaints filed against pro-Republican and pro-Democratic "soft money groups," and could serve as a test case to see if the commission can rein in the groups without new congressional legislation or FEC rules.

DOJ_NMG_0006780

Campaign finance watchdogs contend the groups spent millions of dollars in corporate, union and unlimited contributions in the 2004 election despite a law banning the use of such money in presidential and congressional races.

The FEC investigated Club for Growth fundraising and spending after the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee complained to the commission about it.

The DSCC complaint stemmed from an ad the Club ran in the 2003-04 election cycle against then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., over his opposition to a tax-cut proposal. Daschle lost to a Republican in last November's election.

President Bush's re-election campaign and the sponsors of the 2002 campaign finance law sued the FEC last year, accusing it of failing to enforce the law and crack down on soft money spending, particularly in the presidential race. Those cases are pending in federal court.

The 2004 election saw the emergence of several partisan groups created by political activists to continue spending five- and even six- and seven-figure contributions after the law imposed tough donation limits on national party committees and congressional and presidential candidates.

Under the law, the national parties and federal candidates can no longer raise corporate and union donations in any amount or unlimited donations from any source. Such money isn't supposed to be used by anyone trying to influence a federal race.

The commission's lawsuit accuses the Club for Growth of failing to comply with federal fundraising and spending rules as far back as 2000.

The complaint says the group told prospective donors their money would be used to help elect or defeat specific candidates, and that it raised more than $4 million last year alone from donors who exceeded the $5,000 federal contribution limit. Of that, roughly $3 million came from just 14 donors.

The group spent more than $1 million in the past three elections on ads targeting specific campaigns, often going so far as urging voters to elect or defeat candidates, and raised more than $9 million during that time that exceeded federal limits, the lawsuit says.

The lawsuit could be the first in a parade of cases brought against soft money groups by the FEC, said Larry Noble, head of the Center for Responsive Politics campaign watchdog group and a former commission general counsel.

"We've all been waiting to see what they do with those complaints, and I think it's positive that they have brought suit," Noble said.

However, the lawsuit seems to focus on spending that urged voters to elect or defeat candidates, Noble said. That leaves open the question of how the FEC will deal with partisan groups that intended to influence federal races but didn't go quite as far as the Club did, he said.

___

On the Net:

FEC: http://www.fec.gov/

F.E.C. Sues Republican Group Over Political Contributions (NYT)

By Glen Justice

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - The Federal Election Commission filed suit Monday against the Club for Growth, a well-funded Republican group, in an effort to force the organization to comply with limits on political contributions.

The suit is the first major enforcement case to involve a "527 committee," the independent political organizations that both Republicans and Democrats used to raise and spend hundreds of millions of dollars in the 2004 races. Commission officials describe it as a test case that could have a major impact on how future elections are financed.

"This is one of the most important suits the commission has brought in the last decade," said Michael Toner, the commission's Republican vice chairman.

Last year's election was the first conducted under the McCain-Feingold law of 2002, which banned political parties from accepting unlimited contributions known as soft money. However, donors continued to direct six- and seven-figure checks to 527 committees, which argued that they could still legally accept unlimited soft money contributions.

After months of legal wrangling last year, the commission declined to adopt new regulations that would specifically require 527 groups to register with the F.E.C. and submit to contribution limits and other regulations. Donors are allowed to give $5,000 to a political action committee each year.

The commission was left with a list of complaints against specific groups, which are now being investigated. The case against the Club for Growth is the first in line.

DOJ_NMG_0006781

The Club for Growth, which has more than 30,000 members, advocates conservative economic policies and for years has backed candidates who share those views.

The group runs a political action committee, which raised roughly $1.9 million and forwarded another $7.5 million directly to candidates last year, all operating within federal contribution limits, said David Keating, the group's executive director.

The club also operates a 527 committee, which raised about $8.5 million, Mr. Keating said. It was this organization that was the subject of the F.E.C. suit, which was filed in United States District Court here.

The suit alleges that the organization failed to properly register with the commission as a political committee, which would subject the group to contribution limits and other regulations, and that it raised millions in excessive contributions in recent years. Officials at the club said they had done nothing improper.

The case stems from a complaint filed against the group by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in connection with a television advertisement broadcast last year. The commission voted to file the suit Monday after talks between the two parties failed to reach an out-of-court agreement, according to the F.E.C.

The commission is seeking an unspecified fine and a court ruling directing the Club for Growth to submit to F.E.C. regulation. If the commission wins, it could have broad implications for other groups that are similarly structured.

Pat Toomey, a former lawmaker and the president of Club for Growth, called the commission's suit a "war on the First Amendment" that will help protect incumbent politicians.

"The F.E.C.'s claims and legal theories are a bizarre interpretation of the club's mission, the Constitution, the laws adopted by Congress and their own regulations," Mr. Toomey said in a statement.

FEC Sues GOP 527 Group For Violating Finance Laws (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

The Federal Election Commission yesterday filed its first court challenge against so-called "527 groups," suing a powerhouse Republican advocacy group for violating campaign-finance laws from 2000 to 2004.

The FEC charges that the Club for Growth raised and spent at least $4 million more than the limit, and so the group should have had to register as a political committee and abide by donation and spending limits. The suit was filed in U.S. District Court in Washington.

"This litigation is an important test case on when 527 groups are required to register with the FEC and follow hard-dollar restrictions in federal law," said Michael E. Toner, the commission's vice chairman.

The 527 groups, named for the part of tax code that governs them, played a major role in the 2004 election, the first under the campaign finance rules that Congress passed in 2002. Those rules were intended to eliminate so-called "soft money," the large donations that political parties and interest groups used to flood the airwaves with issue ads.

Instead, the parties have to rely on limited "hard dollar" contributions.

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and Progress for America from the conservative side and MoveOn.org and the Media Fund from the liberal side led a host of 527s that advertised during the presidential race.

The groups say they are on sound legal footing.

Club for Growth President Patrick J. Toomey said yesterday's suit was part of a "war on the First Amendment."

He said the FEC's suit was the result of a complaint by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee that said the Club for Growth stepped over the line when it targeted Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat.

"The commission allowed it to lie inactive for nearly a year and a half and then resurrected it as a platform to seek to take away our members' rights and exact a huge civil penalty from the club," Mr. Toomey said.

The Club for Growth's stated purpose is to elect pro-economic growth, limited-government conservatives, often by advertising in Republican primaries.

In the complaint, the FEC said it tried to work out an agreement with the club, but the organization would not agree to a remedy. The FEC is considering action against other 527s.

President Bush's campaign, key lawmakers who helped pass the 2002 changes and other political organizations sued the FEC last year for not enforcing its regulations on 527s. Those cases are pending in federal court.

New State Law May Nix Asbestos Cases (LAW)

By Steven H. Pollak, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 20, 2005

Lawyers are gearing up for a constitutional challenge to a new state law that could remove nearly 3,000 asbestos cases from Fulton County dockets.

DOJ_NMG_0006782

The law was designed to stem the tide of out-of-state asbestos claims being filed in Georgia, said its primary sponsor, Rep. David E. Ralston, R-Blue Ridge.

"We were seeing a huge number of people that were nonresidents of Georgia and that had not been exposed to asbestos or silica in Georgia who were suing in Georgia courts," said Ralston. "That was a trend that was disturbing not only to me, but to others."

The vast majority of asbestos cases in Georgia have been filed in Fulton, with about 2,200 pending in state court before Judge Henry M. Newkirk and about 1,000 pending in superior court before Chief Judge Doris L. Downs, attorneys involved in the cases said. They estimated that out-of-state plaintiffs who were not exposed to asbestos in Georgia filed approximately 90 percent of those cases.

A lawyer defending the asbestos suits, E. Elaine Shofner of Hawkins & Parnell, noted that claims in Georgia courts have originated from Alabama, North Carolina, Wisconsin, Hawaii, Texas, Nebraska and Pennsylvania.

"We became a dumping ground," she said.

One plaintiffs' attorney, David P. Bevon of Motley Rice in Mount Pleasant, S.C., said out-of-state plaintiffs filed in Georgia because the law here was more favorable than in other states for injuries that occurred years or even decades ago. He also noted that some defendants, such as Georgia-Pacific, are based here.

The new law, signed by Gov. Sonny Perdue on April 12 and codified at chapter 51-14 of the Georgia Code, prevents future suits from out-of-state plaintiffs. But because it applies retroactively, the constitutional fight is over the impact the law could have on cases that already have been filed.

The law added a host of new requirements for asbestos claims to survive in the state's courts. Among the new rules, a plaintiff must present "prima facie evidence of physical impairment" that shows "to a reasonable degree of certainty" that exposure to asbestos was "a substantial contributing factor" to the plaintiff's injuries. Plaintiffs' attorneys have until Oct. 19 -- or 180 days from the enactment of the bill -- to file affidavits establishing the prima facie evidence.

The law requires the evidence to come from a "qualified physician," defined as a doctor who spends no more than 10 percent of his professional practice time on litigation and earns no more than 20 percent of his revenue from such work.

Bevon said plaintiffs' attorneys have had little success in establishing prima facie evidence in accordance with the new law, estimating that 98 percent of asbestos cases will not be able to meet the new standard.

"It's just part of the wave of tort reform," he said.

Bevon explained that the "qualified physician" provision of the law is most troublesome to plaintiffs' counsel.

"It's basically limited to a treating doctor," he said. "But a treating doctor, in almost all cases, isn't qualified to give a diagnosis of an asbestos injury and then take the next step of attributing causation to asbestos exposure."

Even among the most serious cases where the plaintiffs developed mesothelioma -- a rare, terminal cancer for which asbestos is the only known cause -- the lawyers are coming up short. Bevon said he had somewhere between 100 and 150 cancer asbestos cases in Fulton, and only four can meet the prima facie requirements.

Another plaintiffs' firm, Baron & Budd of Dallas, has approximately 100 mesothelioma cases pending before Downs and has succeeded in obtaining only 20 affidavits from qualified physicians who were willing to attribute the cancer to asbestos exposure, according to a letter to the judge from Baron & Budd attorney John J. Spillane.

In addition, Baron & Budd represents about 500 clients who developed a noncancerous lung condition known as asbestosis. According to a brief submitted by the firm, "all but a scant handful of those claims will suffer dismissal."

Lawyers came before Newkirk on Sept. 7 on the plaintiffs' motion to declare the prima facie requirement "substantive in nature" -- in that it creates additional obligations for the plaintiffs with pending claims -- and therefore should be inapplicable to cases filed prior to the enactment of the statute. For cases filed by out-of-state plaintiffs, lawyers filed several motions urging the judge to use law from wherever the claims originated.

Newkirk issued his order two days later, finding the law to be "procedural" as opposed to substantive, saying that the legislation "merely sets forth the method by which plaintiffs in asbestos cases may bring or maintain their causes of action in Georgia."

Newkirk added that the law was intended to apply to all asbestos cases in Georgia -- past and future. He also said that interpreting the law differently for out-of-state plaintiffs would "grossly subvert the public policy of this state because it would provide that Georgia residents could be treated differently than non-Georgia residents."

The plaintiffs' counsel in state court and superior court now have filed constitutional challenges in their respective venues seeking to have the pending cases made immune from the new law's requirements. Downs will conduct a hearing on the motion on Sept. 30; Newkirk has not scheduled one yet.

A similar law passed in 2004 in Ohio was declared unconstitutional as it applied to pending asbestos cases, according to a motion filed by Bevon.

Unconstitutional Cartel (WSJ)

By Mark Hillman

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

When politicians take campaign contributions from Big Tobacco, self-proclaimed watchdog groups yelp about impropriety. Yet for the past seven years, the industry has paid tens of billions of dollars to state governments to protect tobacco profits. Until recently, hardly anyone seemed to notice, much less care.

Then, on Aug. 2, the non-profit Competitive Enterprise Institute filed a lawsuit arguing that the 1998 Master Settlement Agreement (MSA) between Big Tobacco and 46 state attorneys-general (AGs) violates the Constitution and establishes a cartel designed to circumvent antitrust law and quash competition. Hallelujah.

I am a state treasurer and this suit could greatly reduce revenue to my state; and still I am enthusiastic. The billions generated by the settlement cloak the pernicious threat that activist AGs pose to the checks and balances on political power that govern our Constitutional system. Regulation and taxation policies are the rightful responsibility of the legislative and executive branches -- not the domain of states' chief law enforcement officers.

* * *

The tangled history of the MSA begins in 1997. Big Tobacco and a group of AGs drafted a settlement agreement that ended the state lawsuits against the tobacco industry. It stipulated payments to states in return for liability protection. The proposal was presented to Congress for ratification, as required by the compact clause of the Constitution; but it died in the Senate, in large part because of its potential to undermine antitrust law.

By November 1998, Big Tobacco had negotiated another deal with several AGs, what became the MSA. This time, rather than seek Congressional ratification, the proposed settlement was presented to the nonparticipating AGs, who were given just seven days to decide whether to play ball. They had little choice but to participate. The MSA enabled the tobacco companies to raise prices on cigarettes nationwide -- not just in participating states -- to finance the deal. All smokers would pay the costs; the only question for AGs was whether their state would collect its share of the benefits.

Other than four states which had negotiated earlier settlements, every state signed on. Each was required to adopt uniform state laws -- with absolutely no amendments -- to enforce the terms of the MSA, including barriers that penalized smaller cigarette companies if their sales cut into those of the Big Four that organized the deal. In short, the states would help protect the majors from competition. "All states have an interest in reducing [small manufacturer] sales in every state," Vermont Attorney-General William H. Sorrell advised his colleagues.

Next, the MSA handed over $50 million and a significant role for enforcement and administration to an unelected entity, the National Association of Attorneys-General. NAAG plays a central role in determining how state AGs interpret and enforce the MSA. States can never opt out of the MSA, which can only be modified with unanimous consent of all states and all participating cigarette manufacturers. States relinquished their right to challenge the MSA in court.

This Faustian bargain locks states into a sleazy partnership with Big Tobacco, enforced by a compact that violates antitrust law and undermines market competition. Federal appellate judge Ralph K. Winter wrote, in a separate lawsuit brought by cigarette importers, that tobacco company executives "would long ago have had depressing conversations with their attorneys about the United States Sentencing Guidelines" had they forged a similar agreement without the complicity of state AGs. To add injustice to insult, the MSA takes money from predominately low- to middle-income smokers and transfers it to wealthy trial lawyers, some of whom reaped fees in excess of $100,000 an hour for their "work." On top of these affronts, the Constitutional objections to the MSA are manifold:

· The Constitution stipulates that "No state shall … enter into any agreement or compact with another state" without the approval of Congress. The MSA has never been so approved.

· The Constitution gives Congress exclusive authority to regulate interstate commerce. The MSA clearly usurps that authority.

· Delegation of inherent state powers to the NAAG undermines the state sovereignty protected by the Tenth Amendment.

The question facing the courts is not whether the MSA is good policy or whether tobacco companies are scoundrels. The larger issue is whether AGs can rightfully evolve into a law unto themselves, usurping the Constitutional roles of state legislators, governors, Congress and, ultimately, the voters themselves.

Mr. Hillman is Colorado state treasurer.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bipartisan Panel Recommends U.S. Election Changes (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 20, 2005

Electronic voting machines should have paper trails to keep track of votes cast and all voters should present photo IDs, a panel recommending ways to restore confidence in the U.S. election system said on Monday.

The bipartisan Commission on Federal Election Reform, led by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker, made 87 recommendations for strengthening the integrity of a process shaken by voting controversies, including the drawn-out 2000 recount saga in Florida.

"At a time when there is growing skepticism with our electoral system, the commission believes that a bold new approach is essential," the report said. Many of the recommendations would require approval by Congress.

The call for paper verification of votes on electronic machines drew praise from election reform advocates, but the call for photo identification was criticized as an invasion of privacy and something that would discourage some voters.

That recommendation would require all prospective voters by the year 2010 to produce a photo ID card at the polling place -- either a driver's license or, for those without driver's licenses, an identification card issued by the state.

The commission called on states to make distribution of the card simple and widespread.

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington legislative office, said the photo ID provision "will disproportionately impact the poor and the elderly, who may not have drivers' licenses or access to a location where they can obtain IDs."

INTENSE DEBATE

Carter said the 21-member commission intensely debated that provision, but he believed a national uniform requirement was better than piecemeal state voter identification laws.

"I personally had, at the beginning, some very serious reservations about this issue," Carter said. "This will be, I think, a move forward in getting more people to vote. It would not restrict people from voting. It will be uniformly applied throughout the country, and it will be nondiscriminatory."

The commission also recommended states, not local jurisdictions, be responsible for the accuracy and quality of voter lists and that state election agencies be nonpartisan.

"Every one of the recommendations in our report, whether they are recommendations to the Congress or recommendations to the states, are designed to improve confidence in our system of federal elections. And there's plenty of room for improvement," Baker, who led President George W. Bush's team during the Florida recount controversy, told reporters.

The 2004 election was also plagued by questions, involving voter fraud and intimidation, long lines at polling places in poor neighborhoods, the integrity of voter registration lists and security against fraud for electronic voting machines.

Bush issued a statement praising the work of the commission. "It is critical to maintain America's trust in our election system, and I look forward to reviewing this report and working with Congress on the recommendations," he said.

Carter said the panel hoped most of its recommendations would be passed by the 2008 presidential election.

Panel Recommends Photo ID For Voters (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

A commission examining national voting practices issued a report to Congress yesterday recommending a uniform photo-identification standard, but opponents say its stringency would disenfranchise millions of voters who might lack the necessary documents to obtain the IDs.

The standard of identification recommended by the Commission on Federal Election Reform is essentially the same as those established by the recently passed federal Real ID Act, which outlines strict rules and procedures for the issuance of driver's licenses by the states.

"The Real ID is a logical vehicle because the National Voter Registration Act established a connection between obtaining a driver's license and registering to vote," said the report drafted by the commission, which is chaired by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. "The Real ID card adds two critical elements for voting -- proof of citizenship and verification by using the full Social Security number."

Mr. Carter and Mr. Baker yesterday defended the recommendations, saying photo-identification already is required to board airplanes, cash checks and enter federal buildings.

But Commissioner Spencer Overton, a George Washington University election law professor, dissented.

"The recommendation will exclude millions of Americans, and the disproportionate numbers of citizens who will be excluded are people of color," he said.

He pointed out, as does the report, that there is no significant "evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting." The report indicated that both occur in federal, state and local elections, but Mr. Overton said the majority of such fraud is related to absentee ballots, which require no identification.

DOJ_NMG_0006785

It is the use of the Social Security number on the face of the Real ID card that has libertarians objecting.

"Beyond the voting rights issues, there is issue of identity fraud with thousands of cases where people are stealing another person's identity using their Social Security number; with these cards the number will be on there," said LaShawn Warren, legislative counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union.

Jonah Goldman, an attorney for the campaign for fair elections for the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights under the Law, said the Real ID law creates an "enormous burden" on citizens to obtain identification. He said a person must prove who he or she is with four types of identification.

"In addition to all of that, when you put it into current context with the devastation in the Gulf Coast region, where many of those places had destruction of public records, people down there cannot even hope to prove some of these things," Mr. Goldman said.

President Bush received the report yesterday, but White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the president has not decided how to move forward.

"We will be reviewing it carefully," Mr. McClellan said. "We want to make sure that we continue to move forward on steps to protect the integrity of the voting systems and things of that nature."

Panel On Elections Proposes Changes (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A commission headed by former President Jimmy Carter and Secretary of State James Baker called for nonpartisan election administration and requiring voters to have photo identification.

Messrs. Carter and Baker presented President Bush with their recommendations, which also included information-sharing to prevent voters from registering in more than one state, use of mobile offices to ease registration, and a national requirement that electronic voting machines include a paper trail that would allow people to check their votes. They said White House support will be critical to moving some portions through the Republican-controlled Congress, and signaled it may come soon.

"Stay tuned, at least through tomorrow," Mr. Baker said. Last night the White House released a statement from the president praising the commission's "excellent work" and pledging to work with Congress on its recommendations.

Congressional action would only be a start in advancing recommendations of the commission, a private body organized by American University here in Washington that seeks to build on voting-law changes enacted after the disputed 2000 election. Most recommendations require action by state legislatures.

Reforming The Vote (WP)

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The report released yesterday by a commission on federal election reform, headed by former president Jimmy Carter and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, contains a number of valuable proposals. But adopting one of the commission's recommendations -- that voters be required to present a government-issued voter ID at the polls -- would, on balance, do more harm than good.

The commission's most useful proposals would address both lingering and new flaws in the current voting system. Five years after the problems exposed by the 2000 presidential election, voter registration rolls remain riddled with inaccurate and outdated information. The commission sensibly called on states to take charge of assembling accurate lists that would help eliminate duplicate registrations while making it easier for citizens to vote in new jurisdictions.

The introduction in 2004 of a requirement that voters who appear at the polls be given provisional ballots if their names aren't on the registration lists created questions about how to judge the legitimacy of such ballots. The commission sensibly recommended that states adopt clear statewide procedures for considering such ballots. The advent of computerized voting systems has provoked anxiety about whether such machines are secure from fraud or malfunction; the commission -- again sensibly, and in contrast to the position of Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- endorsed the need for machines capable of delivering a voter-verifiable paper trail.

The problem recommendation -- which drew a dissent from three of the 20 commission members, including former senator Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.) -- would require voters to present a government photo identification at the polls. This may not sound particularly burdensome in an age when, as the commission noted, such IDs "are needed to board a plane, enter federal buildings, and cash a check." Yet 12 percent of the voting-age population does not have a driver's license, and those without identification tend disproportionately to be minorities, the elderly and the poor. To its credit, the commission urges states to ensure that such IDs are "easily available and issued free of charge." But for those who don't already have identification, the hurdle of assembling the necessary documentation and obtaining the cards could prove a deterrent to voting.

DOJ_NMG_0006786

On the other side of the balance is the risk of elections tainted by fraud or the perception of fraud. The commission found that "there is no evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting, but both occur, and it could affect the outcome of a close election." That's true -- but so could turning away otherwise eligible voters.

Indeed, election administrators agree that absentee ballots pose a bigger risk of fraud, and in that case the commission would guard against fraud by having election officials match a signature on file. As commission member Spencer Overton, an election law expert at George Washington University, asks, why wouldn't the same be sufficient for those who turn up at the polls without ID? Allowing voters to show alternative forms of identification or to sign a sworn affidavit of eligibility could go a significant way toward deterring fraud without imposing the burden of an inflexible photo ID requirement.

Denying Access To The Ballot (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

It has been clear since 2000 that the election system is in serious need of reform. But the commission led by James Baker III and former President Jimmy Carter has come up with a plan that is worse than no reform at all. Its good ideas are outweighed by one very bad idea: a voter identification requirement that would prevent large numbers of poor, black and elderly people from voting.

The commission makes helpful recommendations. It favors requiring electronic voting machines to produce paper records, and opposes partisan activity by state election officials. It fails to address other problems, like not counting provisional ballots cast at the wrong precincts.

But the bombshell recommendation is for the states to require voters to have drivers' licenses or a government-issued photo ID. That would not be a great burden for people who have drivers' licenses, but it would be for those who don't, and they are disproportionately poor, elderly or members of minorities. These voters would have to get special photo ID's and keep them updated. If they didn't have the ID's, their right to vote would be taken away. The commission recommends that the cards be free. But election administration is notoriously underfinanced, and it is not hard to imagine that states would charge for them. Georgia is already charging $20 and more for each of its state voter cards.

There is very little evidence of voters' claiming to be people they are not, and the commission admits that its members are divided about how big a problem it is. But the report goes on to say that even if there is just a small amount of fraud, it should be stopped. True, but if the solution risks disenfranchising hundreds of thousands, or even millions, of voters, it is a very bad reform.

There are more reasonable approaches. The states could require uniform ID's, but allow each voter without one to sign an affidavit attesting to his or her identity, a system some states use now. It is little wonder that a dissent came from the former Democratic leader in the Senate, Tom Daschle, a commission member. He said that "for some, the commission's ID proposal constitutes nothing short of a modern-day poll tax."

The disappointing report made public yesterday was not a complete surprise. There have been red flags waving around the commission for some time; Mr. Baker is remembered by many for his fierce fight to stop the counting of votes in Florida in 2000. There have also been complaints about the commission's process. Spencer Overton, a George Washington University law professor and commission member, complains that he was told he had to limit a dissent on complicated voting issues to just 250 words.

The purpose of election reform should not be making it harder to vote. We all have a duty to make our election system as good as it can be - and not to disenfranchise people in the name of reform.

Suit Slams Voter ID Law Plaintiffs Assail Ga. Requirement As Illegal 'Poll Tax' (AJC)

By Carlos Campos, James Salzer, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

Voting and civil rights groups launched a legal assault Monday on the state's requirement that Georgians show a government-issued photo ID at the polls — a law they call the most restrictive of its kind in the country.

A federal lawsuit filed on behalf of two African-American voters, the American Civil Liberties Union, NAACP, League of Women Voters, black legislators and others calls the new law a "poll tax" that will rob black, elderly and rural people of their right to vote.

Supporters of the new law condemned the suit, arguing that the law will eliminate the likelihood of fraud at the polls. House Speaker Glenn Richardson (R-Hiram) called it a "ludicrous lawsuit."

"This lawsuit is nothing more than liberal special interests using unconscionable scare tactics to frighten Georgia voters," Richardson said.

DOJ_NMG_0006787

While long expected, the suit raises the stakes of a debate that has raged since last winter's session of the Legislature. The suit won't affect today's special elections in Cobb County and elsewhere, but opponents hope a judge throws out the law before elections being held in November in many Georgia cities.

"There is no place for a voter-suppression law," said Tisha Tallman, regional counsel for the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Educational Fund and an attorney for the plaintiffs. "The case against House Bill 244 is strong, and we intend to prevail in court."

The law, which went into effect earlier this year after approval by the Legislature and Gov. Sonny Perdue, requires voters to show one of six forms of government-issued photo identification, such as a driver's license. Previously, Georgians could show one of 17 forms, including a Social Security card or utility bill.

Although Georgia is one of five states requiring voters to show photo IDs, its law has been called the most restrictive because other states allow photo IDs that are not issued by the government, such as work badges.

The U.S. Justice Department, which must review changes to Georgia voting laws to ensure that minority rights are not infringed upon, approved the new law in August. But the suit argues that the law violates the federal Voting Rights Act and Civil Rights Act by placing obstacles to voting.

"The new photo ID requirement ... imposes an unnecessary and undue burden on the exercise of the fundamental right to vote on hundreds of thousands of citizens of Georgia who are fully eligible, registered and qualified to vote, but who do not have Georgia driver's licenses, passports, or employer ID cards or other forms of photographic identification issued by the state or federal government," according to the lawsuit.

The lawsuit contends the requirement's true purpose is to suppress "voting by the poor, the elderly, the infirm, African-American, Hispanic and other minority voters by increasing the difficulty of voting."

The suit cited Secretary of State Cathy Cox's testimony that during her nine years in office, she has not documented a case of voter fraud at the polls by people pretending to be someone they are not.

The lawsuit also alleges that requiring Georgians to pay for a state identification card constitutes a poll tax that is outlawed under the 24th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In addition to the $20 to $35 fee for an ID card, there are also travel costs associated with getting an ID card, since only 56 of Georgia's 159 counties offer them at Department of Driver Services offices.

The new law waives the ID fee charged to indigent voters, and the state is sending a bus around Georgia to issue free IDs to those who need them. But the lawsuit said the definition of indigent is vague and does not take into account travel costs.

Two African-Americans are named as plaintiffs: Tony Watkins of Rome and Clara Williams of Atlanta. The lawsuit states that both do not have a picture ID and "cannot readily obtain a photo ID card." Watkins declined to comment Monday, and Williams could not be reached.

African-American voters are disproportionately affected because census data indicate they generally earn less than whites and are three times less likely to have access to a car, the lawsuit alleges. The lawsuit also notes that the new law allows voters to cast an absentee ballot without showing photo ID.

Rep. Sue Burmeister (R-Augusta), who sponsored the bill, said Georgians have to show photo IDs all the time.

"I don't even see what their argument is," Burmeister said. "It's not about race. It's not about age."

The suit was filed as a federal commission headed by former President Jimmy Carter called for Americans to be required to show a photo ID card to vote by 2010, in part to establish a national standard. Carter called the Georgia statute a "disgrace to democracy."

"If you read the Georgia law that was passed this year, you see that it is highly discriminatory and, in my personal experience, directly designed to deprive older people, African-Americans and poor people of a right to vote," he said.

Staff writers Bill Rankin and Eunice Moscoso contributed to this article.

Rights Groups Challenge Photo ID Law (AP)

By DICK PETTYS, The Associated Press

AP, September 19, 2005

ATLANTA (AP) — Voter and civil rights organizations filed a federal lawsuit Monday challenging Georgia's new law requiring voters to show photo identification at the polls.

The suit was filed the same day a commission co-chaired by former President Carter, a Georgia native, recommended a national requirement that voters show photo IDs.

Opponents of photo IDs for voters say such requirements would disenfranchise minorities and the poor; backers say they're a good way to combat voter fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0006788

"Photographic identification as a requirement for voting is antidemocratic and prevents people from exercising their fundamental right to vote whether proposed by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia or the Carter-Baker commission," said Daniel Levitas of the American Civil Liberties Union's voting rights project.

Plaintiffs in the suit — including Common Cause, the League of Women Voters, the Georgia Legislative Black Caucus and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People — contend the law violates the state and federal constitutions.

The law eliminates formerly accepted forms of voter identification, such as Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills.

Several groups filed objections with the Justice Department before it approved the law last month. Under the Voting Rights Act, Georgia and other states with a history of suppressing minority voting must get federal permission to change their voting laws.

The Republican-backed measure sparked racial tension during the state's legislative session last spring. Most of Georgia's black lawmakers walked out at the state Capitol when it was approved.

Democrats argued the idea was a political move by the GOP to depress voting among minorities, the elderly and the poor — all traditional bases for Democrats.

Dan McLagan, a spokesman for Republican Gov. Sonny Perdue, said the law is intended to deter voter fraud.

"Requiring an ID to vote is common sense and has been instituted in other states," he said. "Under the old system, you could pluck a utility bill out of somebody's trash can and cast a vote."

Nineteen states require voters to show identification, but only five request photo ID, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Those states — Arizona, Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina and South Dakota — allow voters without a photo ID to use other forms of ID or sign an affidavit of identity.

Carter, who chaired an election reform commission along with former Secretary of State James Baker, said in Washington Monday that requiring photo IDs was one of the most important and most difficult of his group's recommendations.

"We addressed this with a great deal of hesitancy," he said, adding that a national approach would prevent states from enacting laws that are discriminatory.

Single-member Districts Divide Osceola's Hispanics (ORS)

By Daphne Sashin, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, September 20, 2005

KISSIMMEE -- The federal voting-rights lawsuit against Osceola County has become a wedge in the Hispanic community, dividing activists and candidates over the best way to gain political power.

Some supporters of the suit, who filed a similar challenge against the city of Kissimmee, contend that single-member districts would give Hispanics a better shot at representation.

Other Hispanics say there's nothing keeping the right candidate from winning under the current at-large system, in which commissioners are elected by all the voters. Often, they say, Hispanic candidates undercut each other's campaigns, fail to get other Hispanics to vote or convey the wrong message.

"Saying we should get this because we're Hispanic is not the answer. . . . There's a lot of people who are sick of it," said Hector Lizasuain, a board member of several community organizations, including Give Kids Safe Shelter.

The Justice Department filed suit against the county in July, alleging Osceola's practice of electing commissioners countywide discriminates against Hispanics because it dilutes their voting strength. The county's Hispanic population has tripled during the past decade. Although they make up 31 percent of registered voters, only one Hispanic has been elected as a county commissioner.

The federal government has suggested that Osceola could create five commission districts, with one made up of mostly Hispanic voters.

Armando Ramirez, who originally complained to the Justice Department and spearheaded the Kissimmee suit, and other activists say a single-member district system is the only way for a minority candidate with little money to get elected.

"It's very expensive when you try to run an election at-large," said Zulma Velez Estrada, who has worked to register Hispanic voters in Central Florida. "You have to put up signs, you have to . . . let everybody know you. You have to market yourself."

Others say the people fighting for single-member districts are a handful of disheartened candidates who want to get elected without proving themselves as leaders.

For more Hispanics to win, they must work harder to get Hispanics to the polls while reaching beyond the Hispanic community for support, said Peter Olivo, who lost two close races for County Commission and plans to run for the School Board.

DOJ_NMG_0006789

"I really don't think single-member districts are going to do any good to anyone," Olivo said. "You're going to get a lot of people running who could easily win because of the number of people they know, but have no idea . . . what it takes to run government."

Domingo Toro, a Kissimmee Utility Authority board member and longtime activist, disagrees. Single-member districts, he said, would give minorities the chance to compete with Anglos on an equal footing. Toro lost a 2004 bid to become a Kissimmee commissioner in a runoff and was passed over for interim mayor in July.

"I'm on three boards right now. People know me, because the only thing I do is serve my community. And still, I did not get the vote," Toro said. "We don't want them to give us anything. We [want to] earn it. . . . We deserve to represent ourselves."

Candidate Carlos Irizarry says he admires Ramirez for challenging the system but doesn't agree with his approach. The obstacles Hispanic candidates have faced are not "the system's fault," he said.

"Example: In 2004, I ran for office. The first person to file against me was a Hispanic . . . knowing that I filed first. Obviously, the Hispanic vote was divided, and that's why I lost," Irizarry said. "I would never run against a Hispanic if he filed first."

After the Justice Department sued the county, Ramirez said he had no immediate plans to run for another election and maintained that his detractors "are afraid to ruffle the feathers of the good-old-boy system."

State Rep. John Quiñones, R-Kissimmee, has suggested that the county try to settle the suit by expanding the County Commission from five to seven members, with three or four district seats and the others elected at-large.

"This is the second-fastest-growing county in the state," Quiñones said of Osceola. "We need to address whether we're doing everything possible to make this community better represented in government."

Even some defenders of the current system say Quiñones has the right idea. They worry that a drawn-out lawsuit will fuel an anti-Hispanic backlash and send the wrong message.

"Fighting it at this point . . . it lacks progressiveness on the part of the county," said Rosa Alvarez, Quiñones' aide and the Republican committeewoman for Celebration. "Rather than spending our money and arguing . . . the time is right to move on."

Daphne Sashin can be reached at dsashin@orlandosentinel.com or 407-931-5944.

Tired Of 'Being Nice,' Disabled Group Storms Hill (RC)

By Scott Hechinger

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

More than 500 disability-rights protesters from across the country, most in wheelchairs, descended on Congressional offices today to call for expanded patient rights under Medicaid and to express frustration with some Members' calls for deep cuts to social programs.

Despite numerous arrests and a heavy Capitol Police presence, the protesters plan to stay on Capitol Hill throughout the week.

"We have been closely monitoring the situation and are now processing those we have arrested," said Capitol Police spokesman Michael Lauer. "We are familiar with this group, however, and are sympathetic to their needs and causes."

Most of those arrested were being held in Room 2128 in the Rayburn House Office Building to be processed, but arrests also were made in the Hart Senate and Cannon House office buildings. No official comment on the number of arrests is yet available.

In addition to general calls for enhancing disability rights, the protesters urged Members of Congress to sponsor and pass the Medicaid Community-Based Attendant Services and Supports Act, as well as the Money Follows the Person Act, both of which were proposed by ADAPT, the disability-rights organization leading Monday's protest and fight on the Hill.

ADAPT argues that these bills would allow the disabled greater control over their health care options under Medicaid, which they say currently forces too many into nursing homes unnecessarily and against their will. The acts have been brought before Congress twice previously, both times unsuccessfully.

"We've tried being nice," said Linda Anthony, an ADAPT spokeswoman. "We've written Congressmen, we've phoned them, we've come to their offices to try to talk, but nothing works. We're done playing nice. We'd rather go to jail then go back to the nursing homes."

Anthony, who was in a wheelchair like most others, was flanked by more than 40 other protesters outside the office of Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) cheering for those either wheeled or carried out of the office by Capitol Police and chanting "No more talk, we need action."

Barton's office was just one of several Congressional offices targeted by the protesters in a coordinated effort that had been planned for months. As chairman of Energy and Commerce, Barton would play a crucial role in helping or hindering both of the acts, Anthony said.

DOJ_NMG_0006790

Barton was in his district Monday, and although the protesters were able to meet with an aide in charge of health and human services, the police eventually were called. According to the Capitol Police, protesters were arrested only after Barton's office requested that they be removed.

"We tried to accommodate them, but they weren't agreeing with what we were saying," said Barton's press secretary Karen Modlin. "It kept escalating to the point where we needed to get the Capitol Police involved."

"Our job is to make Medicaid stronger for the people who need it most. I'm sorry ADAPT disagrees," she added.

Flag Issue May Burn Brightly In '06 Races (HILL)

By Bob Cusack And Kipp Lanham

The Hill, September 20, 2005

The Republican-led Senate is unlikely to vote on a flag-burning amendment this fall, but the measure will almost certainly hit the floor months before next year's elections.

Republicans will use the proposed amendment to the Constitution as political ammunition in 2006. Several targeted Democrats in the upper chamber oppose changing the Constitution to prohibit flag burning, including Sens. Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Robert Byrd (W.Va.).

The fate of a pending flag-burning amendment lies in the hands of a few senators. Because Sen. Orrin Hatch's (R-Utah) amendment would alter the Constitution, it needs 67 votes, two-thirds of the Senate, to pass.

Including Hatch, the amendment has 58 co-sponsors. Based on previous votes, the measure has the likely support of 63 senators — if senators vote the way they have previously.

It is unclear how Sens. Tom Carper (D-Del.) and Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) would vote on the Hatch amendment. As a member of the House, Carper voted for a Hatch-like measure, while Kohl has voted against Hatch's amendment previously but is undecided on how he will vote in this Congress.

Regardless of how these senators vote, it appears that the flag-burning amendment is one or two votes shy of reaching 67.

Democratic senators who are not co-sponsors of the measure but have indicated support for it include Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and Sens. Ben Nelson (Neb.). Bill Nelson (Fla.) and Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.).

Sen. Robert Bennett (R-Utah) has introduced legislation — not a constitutional amendment — that seeks to provide protection for the flag. Sens. Byrd, Conrad and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) are co-sponsors of the legislation.

Others who have expressed support for this approach in lieu of the Hatch resolution are Sens. Cantwell, Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

It is "not likely," Hatch spokesman Adam Elggren said, that Hatch would seek a compromise with Bennett on his flag amendment. "They disagree on the amendment. They agree to disagree."

While the top Senate Democrat backs Hatch's amendment, Assistant Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) opposes it because of First Amendment issues. McConnell is the overwhelming favorite to take over as the top Senate Republican in the 110th Congress.

All five Democratic senators who are said to be considering a presidential run in 2008 — Evan Bayh (Ind.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Clinton, Russ Feingold (Wis.) and John Kerry (Mass.) — oppose Hatch's amendment.

The House earlier this year approved a flag-burning amendment by a wide margin. If the Senate cleared the measure, it would then have to be ratified by 38 states within seven years.

Some on Capitol Hill expected the Senate to vote on the Hatch resolution after the House's vote, but Senate sources say that with the chamber's busy fall schedule, a Senate roll call will probably be pushed back into next year.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee has repeatedly seized on the flag-burning issue and this year has zeroed in on Byrd, running ads on his vote against a constitutional amendment. Byrd fired back, claiming the ad was misleading.

Democrats say that Republicans are just interested in playing politics with the flag, noting that votes on the amendment usually are brought up in election years.

In 1995 and 2000, Hatch introduced similar amendments, which were defeated 63-37 and 63-36, respectively. In 2000, 12 Democrats voted for it.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who faces a potentially difficult reelection campaign next year, plans to vote for Hatch's measure.

The Supreme Court struck down the Flag Protection Act in 1990, ruling in defense of the First Amendment that burning a flag is free speech.

DOJ_NMG_0006791

ANTITRUST:

More States Plan Minimum-service Real Estate Laws (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts, Inman News

Inman News, September 20, 2005

Realtor associations in Wisconsin and Ohio are pushing for laws that establish new service requirements for real estate professionals while making room for real estate companies that offer a lesser range of services for lower fees.

In several other states, Realtor-backed efforts to establish a mandatory range of services for all real estate professionals – effectively banning some limited forms of real estate services – have drawn sharp criticism from antitrust officials at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission.

But the Realtor groups in Wisconsin and Ohio say their proposals recognize and provide some protections for real estate business models that offer fewer services than traditional firms. In both of these states, Realtor associations formed task forces to study the law changes, with representation from limited-service real estate companies.

The Association of Real Estate License Law Officials, a group for real estate regulators, conducted a study that found that Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas and Utah have enacted some form of minimum-service legislation within the past couple of years. And other states, too, have earlier approved or are now pursuing minimum-service measures.

Federal officials opposed the Realtor-backed measures in Alabama, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas, charging that the legislation was anticompetitive and anti-consumer. But legislators and governors in all four states passed the measures despite these objections.

State Realtor associations have been driving the support for these law changes, stating that the laws aim to protect consumers from receiving less services than they expect in a real estate transaction while also preventing situations in which full-service real estate professionals may feel obligated to assist consumers on the other side of a real estate deal who are working with limited-service real estate companies.

But opponents of the measures say that consumers should be able to choose which real estate services they receive in a real estate transaction, and there are not enough complaints against limited-service companies to justify the law changes.

The Ohio Association of Realtors formed a Task Force on Minimum Services for Listings to study possible changes to state law, and the group prepared a report and recommendations. This work did not go unnoticed.

Don Freels, CEO for the state association, said, "It is interesting that the U.S. Department of Justice was very much aware of our progress in developing our report, and I have sent it to them for review." Freels said he hasn't yet received a formal response from the Justice Department on the law changes that the association is seeking, though he doesn't expect any objections.

"I'm extremely pleased with the work product we produced. I think it's going to be very salable to the Ohio Legislature and the Real Estate (Commission) here in Ohio," he said. "Our task force included brokers who offer minimum services. We made a very conscious effort to include representatives of all business models."

Sharon Jebavy, an Ohio Realtor who offers flat-fee property listing services, served on the task force. Jebavy said she would prefer there be no new minimum-services law in the state, though she does not object to the recommendations. "I think we've come up with a real workable plan. I don't really see a need for it, but if you have to have it I think this is a good bill," she said.

Among the task force's findings: "Consumers should have the right to select the level of service they want from a real estate licensee. Regardless of the level of service the consumer chooses, however, there are certain basic fiduciary duties a licensee must always perform to assure the consumer is protected in their real estate transaction. The license law should assure that consumers are making an informed decision regarding the level of service they receive...(and) should not unreasonably restrict or limit emerging business models."

The group's recommendations include a sample "Waiver of Agency Duties" form that allows sellers to waive some of their real estate representative's duties while specifying which duties are required. Among the required list of duties: exercising reasonable skill and care in representing the client; performing the terms of any written agency agreement; following any lawful instructions of the client; being loyal to the interest of the client; advising the client to obtain expert advice related to material matters when necessary or appropriate; and accounting in a timely manner for all moneys and property received in which the client has or may have an interest.

Sellers also can specify which of the following duties they allow their representative to waive: Seek a purchase offer at a price and with terms acceptable to the client; accept delivery of and present any purchase offer to the client in a timely manner; answer the client's questions and provide information to the client regarding any offers and/or counteroffers; assist the client in developing, communicating, negotiating and presenting offers and/or counteroffers; and inform the client of the steps the client must take to fulfill the terms of the contract.

DOJ_NMG_0006792

The Ohio Realtor group's board of directors approved the task force report and recommendations this week, and Freels said he anticipated passage of legislation early next year. The proposed legislation will represent the most significant changes that the group has proposed to real estate law since the mid-1990s, Freels added.

Meanwhile, the Wisconsin Realtors Association has found a sponsor for its version of minimum-service legislation, and Rick Staff, senior staff attorney for the group, said he expects a final draft of the legislation within a couple of weeks.

The Wisconsin proposal is "the product of years of discussion and input," Staff said. "We have every confidence that it will go forward. Our approach on limited service has gotten a number of peoples' attention because we took a fairly unique perspective. We don't think that limited-service brokerage constitutes a risk to consumers such that it needs to be banned under the state's law."

The legislation will be the culmination of the work of a Wisconsin Realtors Association License Law Task Force, formed in 2002. The legislation will create "a duty to provide, upon the client's request, certain types of information and advice and a duty to negotiate on behalf of a client," according to a preliminary draft. "Under the bill, a client may waive the broker's duty to negotiate, but only in writing."

A broker disclosure statement in the preliminary draft of the bill notes that brokers owe certain duties to all parties in a transaction, including: the duty to provide brokerage services fairly and honestly; the duty to exercise reasonable skill and care in providing brokerage services; and the duty to provide accurate information about market conditions within a reasonable time if requested, unless disclosure of the information is prohibited by law, among others.

And when consumers enter into an agency agreement with a broker, "a broker owes additional duties to a client," the preliminary bill states. "The broker will provide, at your request, information and advice on real estate matters that affect your transaction. The broker must provide you with all material facts affecting the transaction. The broker will negotiate for you, unless you release the broker from this duty. The broker will not, unless required by law, give information or advice to other persons who are not the broker's clients, if giving the information or advice is contrary to your interests."

Staff said that essentially the Wisconsin proposal seeks to allow consumers to opt out from receiving negotiation services from a real estate professional, while guaranteeing that they will receive certain services. The legislation defines negotiation as "acting as an intermediary by facilitating or participating in communications between parties related to the parties' interests in a transaction," and "presenting to a party the proposals of other parties to the transaction and giving the party a general explanation of the provisions of the proposal."

The State Bar of Wisconsin had opposed language in the Wisconsin Realtor Association's License Law Task Force report relating to the proposed law changes, as it "would allow brokers, who are not licensed to practice law by the Wisconsin Supreme Court, to provide legal advice (including enhanced abilities to negotiate and draft contracts and explain the consequences of actions taken during transactions," though the lawyers' group has not yet reviewed the preliminary bill text.

Corey Scholtka, BuyHomes.com

Statements in the preliminary bill text note that a "broker or salesperson can answer your questions about brokerage services, but if you need legal advice, tax advice, or a professional home inspection, contact an attorney, tax advisor, or home inspector."

Corey Scholtka, owner of BuyHomes.com, a flat-fee brokerage based in Delafield, Wis., said he is optimistic about the legislative proposal. Scholtka, who was invited to give input to the task force, has been an outspoken advocate of new real estate business models, including limited-service real estate companies.

Scholtka said that there is an important distinction in Wisconsin's minimum-service proposal compared to other states, because Wisconsin allows choices in services rather than mandating a long list of services that real estate professionals must perform.

"I've been assured that it's not going to change my business model," he said. "I'm for choices – this seems to promote choices."

MasterCard Says Millions No-touch Cards To Be Issued (REU)

By James B. Kelleher

Reuters, September 19, 2005

MEMPHIS, Sept 19 (Reuters) - A top executive with Mastercard Inc. (MA.N: Quote, Profile, Research) said on Monday the company, the world's No. 2 credit-card association, expected to have 4 million so-called "pay pass" cards in circulation by year's end.

DOJ_NMG_0006793

Speaking at an industry conference here, Ruth Ann Marshall, Americas president for MasterCard, said that Citibank, HSBC and Key Bank had all begun offering the cards, which are equipped with a radio-frequency chip that allows customers to pay for purchases by simply waving their cards at readers posted near cash registers or gas pumps.

Marshall said the pay-pass cards were "easier to use than cash" and were one of the products MasterCard was counting on to increase revenue and profits as it faces a variety of challenges in the marketplace, including new rivals and regulatory scrutiny.

"It's just one of the ... breakthroughs in technology that we're pursuing in order to increase convenience and boost usage," Marshall said.

MasterCard, owned by more than 1,000 banks, formally revealed its plans last week to go public early next year in an initial public offering.

In addition, to raising money to bolster its balance sheet, MasterCard said it believed the IPO would help quell criticism from merchants and others, who charge that its current structure -- which foes characterize as a cartel of competing banks setting transaction fees in concert -- represents a violation of U.S. antitrust laws.

Marshall said MasterCard was also working with U.S. cellular phone providers to turn mobile phones into "a high-powered payment and sales device." The program was still in the "pre-launch stage" here in the United States, she said, but added its success overseas suggested it would appeal to "young, active consumers."

She acknowledged that the Internet and other technologies were creating "substantial ripples in the personal finance industry."

"Take PayPal, for example," she said. "Ten years ago entering the payment industry from a standing start was nearly impossible. But by providing eBay (EBAY.O: Quote, Profile, Research) customers with a convenient way to move money PayPal quickly became a player in the payments industry and an acquisition target for eBay."

As a result, she said it was conceivable that others would eventually become players in the industry, including Google (GOOG.O: Quote, Profile, Research) , which has signaled it may be interested in getting into payments.

Marshall said MasterCard was taking Google's threat seriously.

"Certainly any company that can develop complex search algorithms has the technological capacity to enter the payments business. And Google certainly has the capital."

She said that Google and others, however, lacked the customer history data that MasterCard and its bank owners have -- and said that that data gave existing industry players a competitive advantage.

"Google, PayPal and other newcomers don't have years worth of data to draw on to structure offerings to particular market segments," Marshall said. "Banks do."

Verizon Wireless, Records Vendor Settle (WP)

By Jonathan Krim

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

A Tennessee company will stop selling personal cell phone records of individuals over the Internet and will provide information on how it acquired such data under an agreement reached last week with Verizon Wireless.

The firm, Source Resources Inc. of Cookeville, Tenn., was among dozens of companies advertising that for fees starting under $100, they would provide records of calls placed to and from any phone user.

Call records frequently are used by law enforcement, which obtains them through court orders. But small data brokers and private investigators have made a business of getting and selling the information online, often acquiring the information using deceptive or illegal practices, according to experts.

Although phone records cannot lead to the type of financial fraud that can result when other types of personal data are stolen, experts said they can be exploited by criminals, such as stalkers or abusive spouses trying to locate their victims.

Wireless carriers say cases of purloined records are rare and that they take measures to safeguard the information. But the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a leading privacy rights group, last month urged the Federal Communications Commission to crack down on carriers for having inadequate security.

Verizon Wireless sued Source Resources in July, after a Verizon Wireless customer complained that his records had been obtained from Source Resources without his permission.

Officials at Source Resources did not return messages seeking comment.

Verizon Wireless spokesman Jeffrey Nelson said that the information was obtained through a commonly used tactic known as pretexting.

DOJ_NMG_0006794

The companies that sell the records impersonate actual customers, using private data provided by the people seeking to buy the information. Nelson said the company is continually updating its procedures and training of call-center employees to guard against pretexting.

And he said Verizon Wireless is looking forward to learning more about the various sources of call records and how they are acquired.

"If you are one of these companies that are stealing people's identities, you better sleep with one eye open," Nelson said.

U.S. Is Close To Approving Deals Altering The Telephone Industry (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz and John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Federal regulators are nearing approval of two deals that would reshape the telephone industry and are in negotiations over likely divestitures and other conditions intended to preserve competition, especially in the huge market for corporate customers.

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin is pressing the FCC staff to deliver as early as tomorrow recommendations to approve Verizon Communications Inc.'s $8.5 billion purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications Inc.'s $16 billion takeover of AT&T Corp., people familiar with the situation say. FCC votes on the deals could come as early as the agency's Oct. 12 meeting.

At the same time, Justice Department investigators have concluded that the merging companies must sell some assets, moves they believe are needed to preserve competition for high-volume business customers, said lawyers close to the government review. Antitrust enforcers are negotiating with SBC and Verizon on the scope of those divestitures, these people said.

That is a concern for SBC and Verizon, since a major goal of their acquisitions was to acquire lucrative corporate customers in order to sell more packages of telecom services.

As a result of both the FCC and Justice Department reviews, regulators are concerned that consolidation will make it more difficult for business customers to get discounts on telecom services.

In particular, regulators are focusing on increasing consumer access to digital subscriber line Internet connections, which consumers are mostly barred from buying unless they also purchase local-phone service; and on so-called special access lines, essentially fiber-optic lines used to provide voice and data to high-volume business customers.

Regulators are considering requiring the merged companies to sell Internet access without requiring consumers -- mostly home users -- to subscribe to phone service. Verizon already allows some customers to do that, but SBC doesn't. Regulators don't appear to be considering price controls.

Patrick Mahoney, an analyst at Yankee Group, said that traditional phone lines are cash cows, so allowing customers buy Internet access without traditional phone service would be costly to telecom providers. Some companies, notably Qwest Communications International Inc., have decided to market DSL-only offerings as customers shed their traditional phone service in favor of Internet-based calling or wireless phones.

In the Justice Department review, SBC and Verizon have argued against the need for divestitures in the high-volume business market. Opponents say the two companies should be required to sell off nearly all local special-access business lines that AT&T or MCI now operate within the Bells' home regions. Under this approach, for example, most big local lines into corporate offices in Manhattan that AT&T operated in competition with Verizon would be sold to a third company to preserve competition.

Qwest, which had earlier bid unsuccessfully for MCI, argues that the deals would create unprecedented market concentration in the crucial business market if the two companies are allowed to buy their closest competitor. To fix this, Qwest wants the Justice Department to order substantial divestitures in SBC and Verizon's home markets -- and is eager to buy those assets, ensuring greater competition.

The FCC is examining overlapping networks from a geographic perspective, according to people familiar with the review. That would favor the Bells' argument that there are limited competitive concerns. Justice Department officials are reviewing similar data on a building-by-building basis, which suggests they are examining possible divestitures in markets where there is significant overlap.

"If you're talking about 50 buildings, that's one thing. If you're talking about 500, that's a problem," said a Bell company executive. Other possible remedies include making some high-capacity business lines available to other carriers at AT&T or MCI pricing -- at least temporarily.

An FCC spokesman declined to comment on the deal reviews.

DOJ_NMG_0006795

The Bells' desire to wrap up the deals by the end of the year has trumped their concerns that the FCC's evenly split board -- thanks to a Republican seat vacated by former Chairman Michael Powell in March that remains unfilled -- will lead to tougher conditions on the deals by regulators. The FCC's two Democrats -- Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein -- may extract significant concessions in approving the deals since Mr. Martin needs at least one of them to vote in favor. Neither have seen details of the staff report nor discussed what conditions they might seek.

The Bells have little choice but to move ahead: The FCC's only other Republican, Kathleen Abernathy, must leave the agency when Congress adjourns this winter and her term expires. Waiting for her successor to arrive could delay the deals.

The FCC's two Democrats "have enormous leverage," said Blair Levin, a telecom analyst with Legg Mason Wood Walker Inc. He predicts the deals will be approved "with light conditions, during the fourth quarter of the year, and then things will get really interesting."

File-Sharing Services Seek Pact With Record Studios (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

At least five online file-sharing companies have started trying to reach an accord with the music industry to convert the free trading of copyrighted music on their networks to paid services, according to several recording industry and file-sharing executives.

The most advanced discussions are between the recording industry and Grokster, a small California company that has been sued by the entertainment industry, recording industry executives said.

Grokster has agreed in principle to be acquired by Mashboxx, a new company backed by Sony that is trying to start a legal file-sharing service, a person involved in the negotiations said. Mashboxx has made overtures to some file-sharing companies including eDonkey, Morpheus and LimeWire, but negotiations are not active, the person said.

The tentative agreement between Grokster and Mashboxx was first reported by The Wall Street Journal. MashBoxx would make a nominal payment for Grokster, but would share future revenue, the person involved in the negotiations said.

"We are looking at a number of acquisitions," said Wayne Rosso, the founder of MashBoxx, "but they have to make sense."

Michael Page, a lawyer for Grokster, did not return calls seeking comment.

Separately, iMesh, a file-sharing service that last year reached an accord with the music industry to convert to a legal paid service, has made overtures to acquire a number of the other file-sharing services, on the condition that they settle their claims with the recording industry, said Robert E. Summer, the executive chairman of iMesh.

"We have initiated discussion with a number of well-known players," Mr. Summer said. He said it was difficult to say which, if any, of those discussions would lead to acquisitions, in part because of the complexity of potential deals with the recording industry.

Mr. Summer declined to say how much money iMesh was offering the other services, but said "I don't think anyone will get rich off these deals." Rather, he thinks that such arrangements offer the owners of those services the ability to avoid litigation.

Such acquisitions, he said, "are good for iMesh and good for the industry." Mr. Summer is the former president of Sony Music International and former president of RCA records. He was hired by the founders of iMesh, which has moved to New York from Israel, to oversee relations with the record industry.

IMesh has agreements with all the major record labels and plans to introduce its service to consumers "imminently," Mr. Summer said.

Mashboxx announced a deal with Sony in June that would allow Mashboxx to sell Sony's music on its network. The company is in talks with other record labels, Mr. Rosso said. He hopes to introduce a public test of the service in December. He served as president of Grokster from 2001 until 2003 and remains close to Daniel Rung, the California entrepreneur who founded and owns Grokster.

The recording industry was handed more legal leverage in June when the Supreme Court ruled, in MGM v. Grokster, that the owners of file-sharing services can be held liable for contributing to the infringement of copyrights under certain circumstances. The case, which has both Grokster and Streamcast Networks, the owner of Morpheus, as defendants, was sent back to a lower court for further action. Last week, the Recording Industry Association of America sent letters to several file-sharing services, including LimeWire, eDonkey, and BearShare. The letters demanded that the companies stop allowing users to trade copyrighted files and invited them to discuss potential settlements in advance of litigation. A majority of the recipients of those letters have initiated at least preliminary settlement discussions, according to a recording industry executive.

Jenni R. Engebretsen, a spokeswoman for the recording association, confirmed that those letters were sent but declined to discuss any negotiations that have resulted.

DOJ_NMG_0006796

Record industry and file-sharing executives say that the recording industry is looking for settlements that resemble its deal with iMesh, which paid $4 million in damages and promised to convert to a paid service that blocked the trading of copyrighted files without the permission of the copyright owner. None of the executives would discuss the amounts that the industry has been asking in the most recent settlement discussions.

"Ever since the Grokster decision, we have been thinking about what our next iteration should be and obviously the letter last week made that process more urgent," said Sam Yagan, the president of MetaMachine, which distributes eDonkey. He said he had talked to both iMesh and MashBoxx but had not decided whether to sell the company, to offer his own legal service, or to continue to fight the record industry.

Mark Gorton, the chief executive of LimeWire, said his company had not decided how to respond to the recording industry's letter. He declined to discuss any prospective acquisition offers. Michael Weiss, the chief executive of StreamCast, declined to comment on potential deals with iMesh or Mashboxx. BearShare executives did not return calls for comment.

While iMesh has taken nearly a year to develop its paid service - allowing free trading of files in the interim - the industry is likely to demand that other services stop free file-trading relatively quickly. That will require complex software development and business negotiations.

File-sharing services allow users to download files from each other's computers. Both iMesh and Mashboxx intend to use technology that examines files being downloaded and compares them with a master list of copyrighted files provided by record companies. If a user tries to download a copyrighted file, the download may simply be blocked or the user may be asked to pay a fee as with services like Apple's iTunes Music Store.

Both iMesh and Mashboxx have developed methods they hope will help lure users accustomed to free music into paying for songs. Mashboxx will allow users to download files free at low quality several times before being forced to pay for the song. Mr. Summer declined to detail iMesh's marketing plan, but music industry executives say it involves offering a long free trial of a subscription service, which allows users to listen to an unlimited number of songs for a fixed monthly fee.

Financier Weighs Visteon's Assets For Parts Venture (WSJ)

By Jeffrey McCracken

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Billionaire Wilbur L. Ross, the New York-based financier who in recent years merged five faltering steel companies to create a steelmaker he later sold for a huge profit, says he has as much as $4.5 billion in capital to bank on his next venture -- buying up troubled auto-parts makers, possibly including unprofitable operations Visteon Corp. is about to jettison.

Mr. Ross's investment group and other funds he is working have already snapped up half the bank debt of automotive supplier Collins & Aikman Corp., which is under Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection, and stakes in smaller suppliers in Europe and Asia. Another potential target he could be interested in includes the 23 plants and other facilities that Visteon is about to transfer back to former parent Ford Motor Co.

"Our vision is to build a very diverse, very large, very international company, which could include potentially" the parts of Visteon that are going back to Ford, he said in an interview. "My understanding is Ford has not yet closed on that transaction, but yes they are sure the kind of thing we'd look at. Visteon is the kind of company we are looking at," said Mr. Ross.

Visteon and Ford last week announced an agreement under which Ford will take over 17 Visteon plants, plus six offices, research centers and other facilities in the U.S. and Mexico on Oct. 1.

The assets, with combined annual sales of more than $7 billion, by themselves would make up the world's 17th largest auto supplier by sales. Ford, which will have to spend between $450 million and $650 million this year and $300 million to $500 million after that for buyouts of hourly workers, has said it hopes to sell the businesses to investors or new owners.

A Visteon spokesman declined to comment on the company's restructuring plans. A Ford spokesman said he wasn't aware of any talks between Mr. Ross and Ford regarding the Visteon plants and declined to comment further.

Mr. Ross said he is interested in the auto-parts business because it is "fragmented with too many companies that are too dependent on one company. The existing companies aren't global or they aren't global enough because they don't have operations in Eastern Europe or Asia, which are two obvious places you should be," he said.

Mr. Ross, who sold International Steel Group Inc. to Mittal Steel Co. earlier this year, said his group has been evaluating the auto-parts sector as a potential investment for two years. Besides owning 50% of Collins & Aikman's bank debt, his investment group has a 25% stake in the French operations of Oxford Automotive, a Michigan supplier that was recently liquidated.

He said he is also keeping an eye on Delphi Corp., the country's largest auto supplier by revenue, to see how it resolves its three-way talks with former parent General Motors Corp. and the United Auto Workers union. His interest in Delphi was reported Friday by the Detroit Free Press.

DOJ_NMG_0006797

Delphi's new chief executive is Robert S. "Steve" Miller. Mr. Miller was running Bethlehem Steel Corp. when Mr. Ross's International Steel purchased the company two years ago. Mr. Miller has threatened to take Delphi into bankruptcy by Oct. 17 unless he can get major concessions from GM and the UAW.

Mr. Ross said he hasn't talked with Mr. Miller about Delphi and feels like the last thing Delphi needs is a third party like his investment group, W.L. Ross & Co., getting involved.

"We would have potential interest in Delphi, but they are involved in complex talks with General Motors and the UAW and the last thing they need is another part. We may be more interested once we see what they can do. I think we will know a lot more by October 17," said Mr. Ross.

He said the capital he has access to is one thing that gives him a significant advantage over other financial players that have tried to make money in the auto-supplier sector. "We are not capital constrained. We have about $4.5 billion in capital equity and our partners also like to co-invest so we have even more," he said.

He said he would also avoid burdening a company's balance sheet with too much debt. He said that was one of the problems that hurt Collins & Aikman, which was built through a series of acquisitions.

"The margins aren't so high at these companies that you can afford to do that," he said.

StarPoint To Buy Acclaim In Joining Of Energy Trusts (WSJ)

By Tamsin Carlisle

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

CALGARY, Alberta -- StarPoint Energy Trust said it agreed to acquire Acclaim Energy Trust in a stock transaction, in an attempt to create one of the biggest entities in Canada's increasingly crowded energy-trust sector, with the financial clout to pursue larger acquisitions.

Under the agreement, StarPoint unitholders would get 53% of the new trust, receiving one unit for each StarPoint unit held. Acclaim unitholders would receive 0.8333 of a new-trust unit for each Acclaim unit held. StarPoint and Acclaim unitholders also would receive shares in a company exploring for oil and natural gas, to be spun off from the combined entity's assets. Based on StarPoint's closing share price, Acclaim shareholders would receive equity valued at about 2.28 billion Canadian dollars (US$1.93 billion).

At a news conference, Acclaim President and Chief Executive J. Paul Charron, who has been named to the same post at the combined trust, said he expects the increase in size to give the trust a competitive edge in pursuing acquisitions in a heated international market for oil and natural-gas assets. "We've been looking for U.S. or international transactions since January," he said. "We felt that was where the market was going, and we like to get ahead of the pack."

Acquisitions are the lifeblood of energy trusts. They don't explore for oil and gas, but instead develop mature properties, paying out much of their cash flow from production to unitholders through monthly distributions. With acquisition opportunities in Canada dwindling because the country's energy trusts have already snapped up most of the conventional oil and gas properties that major oil companies have sought to unload, some of the larger Canadian energy trusts are now seeking transactions in the U.S. and overseas.

Assuming unitholders and regulators approve the proposed merger, which is expected to close in early January, the combined entity would seek a listing for its units on the New York Stock Exchange, joining just a handful of Canadian energy trusts interlisted in the U.S. Mr. Charron said he expects that by joining together, the two Calgary companies will increase access to U.S. capital.

On the Toronto Stock Exchange, StarPoint's units closed at C24.84 Canadian dollars, up C$1.74. Acclaim's units closed at C$20.70, up C$1.15.

Norway's Norsk Hydro To Acquire Spinnaker Of U.S. For $2.45 Billion (WSJ/DJN)

By Ian Talley, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

OSLO -- Norsk Hydro ASA said it will acquire Spinnaker Exploration Co., of the U.S., for $2.45 billion (€2 billion), substantially accelerating the Norwegian company's international production growth and making the Gulf of Mexico a future core production area.

Both Norsk Hydro and analysts said the price is high but that the acquisition is necessary if Norsk Hydro is going to increase the low rate at which it replaces reserves. The Norwegian oil, gas, power and aluminum company said it will pay $65.50 a share for Spinnaker, which has oil and gas assets primarily in the Gulf of Mexico.

"The acquisition ... will significantly raise Norsk Hydro's international oil and gas potential," said Norsk Hydro Chief Executive Eivind Reiten.

DOJ_NMG_0006798

Spinnaker's stock jumped 32% to $64.19 in afternoon trading yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange. In Oslo, Norsk Hydro rose 1% to 736.50 Norwegian kroner (€94.50).

Norsk Hydro's decision is in line with its strategy and that of larger Norwegian rival Statoil ASA to look beyond the North Sea for new energy reserves as output in the North Sea slows.

Norsk Hydro, which gets most of its oil and gas at home, pumped 539,000 barrels of oil equivalent daily in the second quarter, down from 569,000 barrels a year earlier.

Norsk Hydro's international output should rise 40% from 2005 through 2008, following the purchase, Mr. Reiten said.

"It's expensive, but positive because they needed to become more aggressive," said Lars Marius Furu at Fondsfinans in Oslo.

Spinnaker's proven reserves, the amount it reports to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, amount to 62 million barrels of oil equivalent, divided roughly equally between oil and natural gas.

"The main reason behind the transaction is the great potential in exploration," Mr. Reiten said.

Analysts said that, based on the SEC-reported reserves, the cost of the acquisition is higher than $40 a barrel. Based on expected reserves of 129 million barrels of oil equivalent, Norsk Hydro said the deal's cost is about $19 a barrel.

Norsk Hydro said its long-term oil-price assumption -- a measure used to determine the economic soundness of deals -- is about $35 a barrel, up from its previous price assumption of $25 a barrel.

Microsoft Acquires Alacris To Beef Up Software Security (WSJ)

By Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Microsoft Corp. said it bought privately held Alacris Inc., a small maker of software for managing employees' access to corporate computer networks, to help improve the security of Microsoft's programs.

Terms weren't disclosed. Ottawa-based Alacris's software manages smart cards, or plastic cards that store a person's identification data. The purchase is an extension of joint work by the two companies on security software called idNexus for managing smart cards.

Alacris is part of a recent wave of companies that are developing technologies for administrating the electronic "identities" of computer-network users by means such as granting or removing their access. In March, Oracle Corp. bought identity-management software maker Oblix Inc. Other companies in the field include ActivCard Corp. of Fremont, Calif.

By purchasing Alacris, Microsoft intends to make it easier for users of its server software to administer smart cards -- handling tasks such as setting up people with cards and retiring cards when a person leaves a company.

Under increased scrutiny by its customers over the security of its software, Microsoft has bought technologies in the past two years to help it fight Internet-borne attacks such as spyware and viruses.

The Alacris software could complement Microsoft's security plans for Windows Vista, the next version of its operating system, due for release in the second half of next year. Microsoft executives say that Windows Vista will have improved support for smart-card access to computer systems.

Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates has long criticized the use of user names and passwords as an inferior method of securing access to vital corporate computer systems. In response, Microsoft is trying increasingly to promote smart cards and biometric methods -- such as fingerprint readers -- as alternatives to passwords.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

House Bill Would Limit U.S. Power To Protect Species (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - The chairman of the House committee overseeing natural resources introduced a bill Monday that would make it more difficult for the federal government to set aside land it deems crucial to the health of endangered species.

The proposed amendments to the Endangered Species Act also increase the obligation of government agencies to tell landowners quickly if the law limits their development options, and to compensate them.

The measure, which drew quick denunciations from groups like Environmental Defense, Defenders of Wildlife and the Natural Resources Defense Council, was proposed by the House Resources Committee chairman, Representative Richard W.

DOJ_NMG_0006799

Pombo, Republican of California. It was immediately put on a fast track, which is expected to bring it before the full House early next week.

In a news conference Monday, Mr. Pombo said his legislation "will put the focus on recovery where it should be and will eliminate a lot of the conflicts we have had with private property owners."

The proposal was markedly different from draft legislation circulated earlier this summer, which put even greater restrictions on federal agencies that enforce the law, and which would have automatically taken the law off the books in 2015. The new measure abandons the latter goal but creates new hurdles for federal agencies - chiefly the Fish and Wildlife Service - as they take actions to protect species.

The Endangered Species Act has been a flashpoint for landowners, property-rights advocates and state and local governments, most in the West, who see its provisions as onerous and costly, and chafe at the ability of people not directly involved in a dispute to sue the federal government to ensure compliance with the law.

At the same time, the law is credited with preventing the extinction of hundreds of species of insects, plants and animals in the past quarter-century, though only a handful of the more than 1,200 listed species have recovered sufficiently to be removed from the list.

Mr. Pombo's first effort to rewrite the law, in the mid 1990's, failed. Since becoming chairman of the committee, he had made this goal a priority.

An important part of the legislation is a provision that allows the Interior Department, the parent agency of the Fish and Wildlife Service, to provide "conservation grants" to property owners who are deemed to be helping conserve an endangered species. The legislation also requires that property owners be paid "fair market value" if, in the view of federal biologists, their development plans would violate the law.

The purpose of the compensation would be "to alleviate the burden of conservation measure imposed on" landowners who forgo their plans in order to help a species' survive.

Chuck Cushman, the executive director American Land Rights Association, praised this approach, saying: "We're getting away from the command-and-control penalty concept. More landowners will feel free to help species and not feel that they're going to lose their land.

Right now, Mr. Cushman added, "there's a fair amount of shoot, shovel and shut up going on," by landowners who would rather break the law and kill an endangered animal than risk facing land-use restrictions.

But Michael Bean, who heads the wildlife protection program at Environmental Defense and was an early proponent of working with landowners, criticized the new measure as a "big step backwards for endangered species conservation." He faulted a new requirement that federal scientists provide, within 90 days, an answer to any landowner's question about whether a planned activity would run afoul of the act by harming an endangered species.

Under the new law, if the government has not answered within 90 days, the landowner can proceed with the plans. Mr. Bean said "there's potentially no limit to the sorts of requests that could be made of" federal biologists "by businesses seeking to develop, build, cut trees."

The Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service, he added, have traditionally been stretched in trying to meet deadlines in the existing law and have frequently failed to do so.

Losers In Eminent Domain Case Face Hefty Fees (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

Seven homeowners in New London, Conn., who narrowly lost a court battle to save their homes from condemnation say the city is still demanding as much as $300,000 in "use and occupancy" fees dating to the November 2000 condemnation order.

They say the demands are being made even though an eviction order from last week has been rescinded. It had been issued by the semi-public New London Development Corp. and had told the homeowners to move out in the next 30 to 90 days and pay $600 a month in rent while they continue to occupy the premises.

An attorney for NLDC, which wants to demolish the homes to make room for private development, had told the homeowners' attorney last year that the city, for which NLDC has acted as an agent, expects to collect the occupancy fees.

"We know your clients did not expect to live in city-owned property for free, or rent out the property and pocket the profits ... for three-and-a-half years and counting ... if they ultimately lose the case," the corporation wrote then.

NLDC "has not retracted that 2004 demand," said Scott Bullock, senior attorney for the Institute for Justice, which represented the homeowners in their losing U.S. Supreme Court battle to prevent the city from using its power of eminent domain to condemn their properties and give them to NLDC.

DOJ_NMG_0006800

Asked yesterday whether those large debts are still owed, David Goebel, chief operating officer of NLDC, said, "I can't say what I don't know."

But Ron Angelo, deputy commissioner for the Connecticut Department of Economic and Community Development, yesterday seemed skeptical of whether NLDC would get the money.

"Those use and occupancy fees are still accruing, but accruing and collecting are two different animals," he said.

The seven-member New London City Council was to vote last night on a motion to express no confidence in NLDC and its top leaders, Mr. Goebel and President Michael Joplin. But such action would not derail the project.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will hold a hearing today on the plight of the New London homeowners. The House Judiciary Committee plans a hearing Thursday.

The homeowners were plaintiffs in the case of Kelo v. City of New London, which the Supreme Court decided on June 23. In its 5-4 ruling, which outraged property rights advocates, the court held that government can seize property from owners and give it to a private developer who promises to use it to create jobs and generate tax revenues.

The houses in the Kelo case are near a 90-acre waterfront site in New London slated for development, intended to bolster a recently opened global research facility belonging to Pfizer Inc., the pharmaceutical giant.

When Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell learned Sept. 12 of debt-warning letters sent out by NLDC, she was "incensed" that she had not been informed in advance and ordered that the letters be rescinded, her spokesman said.

"Governor Rell thought everyone had agreed to a [voluntary] moratorium" she had requested on eminent domain seizures, said Judd Everhart, a spokesman for the governor.

Mrs. Rell "feels the city of New London and NLDC can work their project around these homes, so the tenants are not forced out," Mr. Everhart said.

Some of the homeowners insist they are not leaving. They include Wilhelmina and Charles Dery, who live in a house that has been in Mrs. Dery's family for 100 years; she was born there in 1918.

NLDC has held title to the 13 homes involved in the legal dispute since November 2000. The compensation paid for those properties was put into an escrow account while the courtroom battles raged.

Alaska Natives Offer A Herd Of Reasons To Block Oil Drilling (WP)

By Vanessa De La Torre

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Solar-powered loudspeakers on a cloudy afternoon is about all the defense Sarah James can muster these days against the threat of government, oil companies and what she calls "cultural genocide" if they have their way.

A protest banner sways in the wind, gently imploring museum-goers, businesspeople, anyone hustling to the Capitol, to slow down for a moment and "Save Gwich'in Way of Life." The words are thickly markered in black and red; drooping toward them is a turquoise flower with a sad face. "Our culture is not for sale to balance national budget," James wrote in small bold letters.

As a Gwich'in elder, James has spent nearly two decades fighting off proposed oil drilling in her Alaskan homeland. Now comes her toughest battle yet: Congress is set to pass a budget bill that includes a provision allowing for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Some environmental groups argue that a limited oil supply in the Arctic's coastal plains won't ease U.S. dependence on foreign oil, or prices at the gas pump post-Katrina, and that development would damage one of the Earth's last untouched lands.

The Gwich'in (pronounced GOO-chin), a nation of 8,000 Native Americans who subsist on roaming caribou in the North Slope, see the prospect of drilling as a sure sign of their own demise.

On this particular afternoon, the Gwich'in protest was in its third week (out of six) in a small park opposite the entrance of the National Museum of the American Indian, some days to little notice.

"Gwich'in?" muses a middle-aged woman, squinting at the banner from Independence Avenue. "I don't know what that is." She decides not to find out. Later, a dapper man, Bogdan Wojciechowski, strolls to the modest Gwich'in table and observes for a moment. "Jay! Come over here so you can learn something."

"No thank you, Dad, no thank you," replies the grade-schooler. (However, a caribou bone ultimately intrigues him.)

James, 61, of Arctic Village, has been trying to inform the public of her native land since 1988, when proposed refuge drilling first threatened the Porcupine caribou herd and the Gwich'in way of life. Eight battles and no losses later, she says, "We must be doing something right." The closest bout came in 1995, when Congress passed a bill that allowed drilling; President Clinton vetoed it after pressure from environmentalists.

The environmental types return in the ninth showdown, says James, and "they're doing the fight as we are. But their interest is recreation, scenic, protecting animals. Us, it's our life."

DOJ_NMG_0006801

The protest allows James to preach about her homeland, Vadzaih googii vi dehk'it gwanlii . "It means 'Sacred Place Where Life Begins' . . . It's not a thing of the past," she says. "It's alive, it's not in a book only." She sits on a metal folding chair, tapping a native drum, her right knee bouncing in rhythm.

"We have to live there for thousands of years . . . so we want to keep it that way. The Gwich'in people are a caribou people. It's our food, tools, clothing. It's our shelter. We have a song called 'The Caribou Skin Hut Dance.' "

A man with two kids passes the table that has a photo album, buckskin jacket, a pair of ceremonial gloves with beaver fur and beaded flowers. A blond girl lingers; she gets tugged toward the museum.

Kelvin Long, 29, a Navajo leader from Flagstaff, Ariz., follows James to the mike. He is one of the few volunteers who have traveled to Washington for the vigil, and says he is here out of solidarity and in recognition that the Arctic refuge is sacred. "It's a place where you can still drink out of the rivers -- good, clean water," he begins. "So tell Congress it's not okay, tell them no.

"Come to our little table, our humble little table. Come take a stand with us, fight the big fight with us. . . . After you go into the museum and learn about native culture, come here and find out what's going on with native people right now."

Then Long breaks into song about the Navajo "red path" and walking that path in beauty, over the beeping of a garbage truck. James sits on a white Igloo cooler, humming along while stapling protest handouts.

"Today's a little bit slow," Long acknowledges later. A security guard lounging on a park bench, smoking a cigarette, waved people toward the table. One tourist from Florida, 71-year-old Barbara Gerber, took a pamphlet and ranted at the Bush administration. "They can't stand it that there might be a place that hasn't been drilled yet," she fumed.

Others say, "Good luck on that," and every couple of hours a person might offer a dollar along with: "I'm with you a hundred percent. One hundred percent." An Alaskan family offers to call their state legislators, wink-wink, and James gets the joke. Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski are among the staunchest supporters of drilling in the refuge.

By 3:30 p.m., the donation vase contains $25. It clearly won't fly in another Gwich'in from the Arctic, but will reimburse Long for the McDonald's chicken sandwiches he bought for their lunch. One visitor, smiling, flashed a Sacagawea dollar before plunking it in.

The biggest crowds tend to come in the evening, says Long, reclining in a lawn chair. On most days, they hold the vigil till 6 p.m., just after the NMAI closes and a steady flow of tourists shuffle out. "I definitely wish more people would stop by," he notes. But Long, with kind eyes and a calm bearing, says he understands. "A lot of people in the museum are on a schedule."

At one point, museum volunteer Donna Brandes wanders by. She explains her native lineage, chats a while. Long informs her of the "Don't Drill, Storm Capitol Hill!" rally planned for today, which organizers from the Arctic Refuge Action coalition hope will attract tens of thousands of people.

"So, you think this will pay off," says Brandes, speaking of the pamphlets, of the native drums, of James making business calls on a park bench. Long is quiet. "Nothing stops this administration," Brandes says.

James gives another go at the microphone. "It's charged by solar panels," she reminds passersby, because that is how the Gwich'in live. But her words meet static as the battery powering the sound system loses its juice. Overcast sky. "Solar energy is clean energy. We need to learn how to use less oil ."

James pauses; her voice is no longer amplified. "I think I have to recharge batteries, so stay put and I'll be back!" And so people milled around, as the vigil drummed on.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds: Internet Drugs Ring Cracked (PHDN)

By Jim Smith

Philadelphia Daily News, September 20, 2005

Dr. Akhil Bansal was one of 17 people indicted by a federal grand jury in Philadelphia last April for allegedly taking part in "an international conspiracy to import and distribute" prescription drugs, using the Internet.

Five additional defendants were charged in a "related indictment" in New York.

The major charges in the Philadelphia case include conspiracy to distribute and import controlled substances, operating a continuing criminal enterprise, and conspiracy to commit money laundering.

Federal authorities seized more than $6 million from defendants' accounts in foreign and U.S. bank accounts.

"This case shows us how the Internet has opened the door to an unregulated universe from which anyone with access to a computer can purchase anything from anti-anxiety drugs to anabolic steroids," said U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan, the Philadelphia-area's top federal lawman, when the cases were made public.

Authorities contend that the drugs were smuggled into the United States from India.

"The Web site owners do not require any prescription for the purchase of these drugs, which is contrary to law.

"The drugs are manufactured abroad, do not bear required labels and warnings, and are being imported without Customs declarations or payment of duty," said Christine Konieczny, a Lower Merion police officer assigned to a DEA Task Force.

Bansal, his father, Dr. Brij Bansal; a sister, Julie Agarwal; and her husband, Yatindra Agarwal, were charged with shipping medicines manufactured in India to Internet pharmacies' customers in the United States.

The other relatives are all in India.

Congress To Probe Orioles' Palmeiro (AP)

AP, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON Sep 19, 2005 — Congressional investigators looking into whether Rafael Palmeiro lied under oath are interviewing players who know him, including a Colorado outfielder suspended this year for steroids, The Associated Press has learned.

Palmeiro testified to the House Government Reform Committee in March that he never had used steroids. The Baltimore Orioles slugger, one of four players in history with 3,000 hits and 500 homers, was suspended by Major League Baseball for 10 days in August for failing a drug test.

A congressional source familiar with the committee's work, speaking to the AP on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said Monday that "several active players" have spoken or will speak with the committee. That source would not identify who was interviewed.

But a baseball source, also speaking to the AP on condition of anonymity because the inquiry is ongoing, said Colorado Rockies outfielder Jorge Piedra spoke on the phone with the committee within the last week.

Piedra, who has trained with Palmeiro in the offseason, was suspended for 10 days in April for a positive steroid test, the second player to be publicly identified under the sport's new rules.

The congressional source indicated that all the players asked to talk to the committee recently were chosen because they have relationships with Palmeiro such as teammates or workout partners and could have knowledge about whether he might have used steroids before his testimony.

On March 17, Palmeiro appeared before the Government Reform Committee alongside Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa, pointed his finger for emphasis and declared: "I have never used steroids. Period."

On Aug. 1, baseball announced his suspension. Palmeiro stood by his statements to Congress, saying he didn't know what caused the test result.

When he returned to the Orioles after his ban, Palmeiro said he would not speak about the case until Congress concludes its perjury investigation.

He had just two hits in 26 at-bats after returning and was booed by spectators at Baltimore and on the road. Palmeiro hasn't played since going home to Texas early this month to rehabilitate knee and ankle injuries.

Afghan Heroin Tied To Terror (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

Washington Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Insurgents and foreign terrorists in Iraq are being financed in part by the illicit drug trade originating in Afghanistan and passing through Iraq to Europe, congressional and defense sources say.

Money from Afghan-produced heroin is being used by terror cells to buy weapons and equipment, and pay Iraqi citizens to conduct attacks on U.S. troops and to plant deadly improvised explosive devices (IEDs), U.S. officials say.

In a Sept. 8 letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde wrote of an "emerging and dangerous growth of the illicit drug trade in Iraq, especially with heroin, now originating and pouring out of nearby Afghanistan."

"We can no longer ignore the threat to our national security from drugs in Iraq," the Illinois Republican said in the letter, obtained by The Washington Times.

A senior military official, who spent more than a year in Baghdad's green zone, which houses the U.S. Embassy, said Iraqi intelligence has documented drug routes that cut through Iran, into Iraq and then to Europe via Turkey. The official said some of the heroin cash goes to insurgents.

Andre Hollis, the Pentagon's top counternarcotics official in President Bush's first term, said there is growing evidence that the insurgents are buying and selling heroin for profit.

"Iraq has become a transit route for drugs, which are sold in both Europe and in Iraq and are used to further destabilize Iraq by funding anti-coalition militant activities in Iraq," Mr. Hollis said in an interview.

He said Iran's hard-line Islamic regime, which opposes the U.S. presence in Iraq, is permitting heroin to cross its territory.

"Iran doesn't want the drugs to stop in Iran," Mr. Hollis said. "They don't care if they end up in Europe or stay in Iraq."

A U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad said he had no immediate comment on any heroin-terror link in Iraq.

Mr. Hyde urged Miss Rice to find $100,000 to fund a study of Iraq's illegal-drug networks by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

Adam Ereli, a State Department spokesman, stopped short of endorsing a study, but added, "We support and are prepared to work with the United Nations to assess Iraq's vulnerabilities and see what we can do to prevent this from being a problem."

Mr. Hyde's letter referred to the seizure earlier this month of 44 pounds of Afghan-produced heroin in the Shi'ite city of Karbala. Last year, The Washington Times quoted a Polish general in charge in southern Iraq as saying his troops seized bags of heroin during various raids in the same area.

To anti-drug advocates, such as Mr. Hyde, the Karbala seizure put the spotlight on the terror-drug connection in Iraq, just like the seizure of two drug boats in the Arabian Sea last year highlighted the al Qaeda connection in Afghanistan. The U.S. Navy said at the time that the boats were manned by al Qaeda-linked traffickers.

Congressional and defense sources say the military downplays the al Qaeda-heroin link because it does not want Congress to push the Pentagon into the counternarcotics mission. It views such work as law enforcement, not war-fighting.

The Washington Times has obtained photographs taken by American special-operations forces of bags of opium gum seized on raids of al Qaeda and Taliban hide-outs in Afghanistan.

"We know that illicit drugs fuel and finance terrorism in Afghanistan, where the opium and heroin in the region originates," Mr. Hyde said in his letter to Miss Rice. "It passes out through terrorist-controlled areas, is taxed by them, and helps finance and arm our terrorists enemies."

The U.N. drug office last did an Iraq survey two years ago, which reported that "Iraq's porous borders, an established culture of smuggling, combined with its geographic location ... suggests the strong possibility of growth in drug trafficking."

Mr. Hyde said he wants to a new U.N. study "to be especially focused on its potential impact in financing insurgent terrorists and their networks."

Drug Trial To Begin For Former Haitian Anti-narcotics Chief (BRAH)

By Curt Anderson

The Bradenton Herald, September 20, 2005

MIAMI - A top Haitian police official in the government of ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide is facing trial on charges that he accepted thousands of dollars in bribes to help Colombian drug lords move huge loads of cocaine through the impoverished Caribbean country.

Jury selection is scheduled to begin later this week in the case against Evintz Brillant, the only one of four former senior Haitian police officials who has not pleaded guilty in the investigation of drug trafficking inside the Aristide government.

The three who pleaded guilty are expected to cooperate in the U.S. government's against Brillant, who has pleaded innocent and faces a life sentence if convicted. The trial's scheduled Monday start before U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke was delayed a few days by the approach of Tropical Storm Rita.

According the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Brillant used his post as head of Haiti's top anti-drug police unit from 2001 to 2004 to help drug traffickers ship thousands of pounds of cocaine through Haiti, including the airport in the capital of Port-au-Prince, to the United States, Europe and elsewhere.

Brillant and other top Haitian police officials, DEA Agent Noble Harrison said in a court affidavit, "agreed to look the other way when shipments of cocaine were in transit" in exchange for bribes, some of which he used to pay lower-level police officers to provide security and protection for the drugs.

On occasion, Brillant "stopped and arrested drug traffickers for the purpose of receiving payments and bribes," prosecutors said in court papers.

The investigation has produced no evidence implicating Aristide, even though some convicted drug dealers have insisted that the former president was intimately involved in trafficking through Haiti. Aristide was ousted in February 2004 and is now living in exile in South Africa.

"There was never any evidence and there remains no evidence of it," said attorney Ira Kurzban, who represents Aristide in Miami. "They've been trying for two years. There is no case."

Brillant is specifically accused by U.S. prosecutors of being involved in the drug network controlled by convicted Haitian drug trafficker Sergo Edouard. Brillant was paid $10,000 in one instance for agreeing to protect drug shipments and got a share of $150,000 from another trafficker to provide similar security.

DOJ_NMG_0006804

Although the Haitian police arrests were trumpeted as a major success in the war on drugs by the Bush administration, a U.S. State Department report issued earlier this year says that the flow of Colombian cocaine and other drugs through Haiti continues virtually unchallenged.

The report says that Haiti, with its 1,125 miles of virtually wide open coastline, clandestine airstrips, uncontrolled seaports and police corruption make it difficult for the Haitian government to stop the drug trade.

"Haitian drug trafficking organizations continue to operate with relative impunity," says the March report. "Haiti remains an important transit country for Colombian drug traffickers."

Freighters are most often used to transport the drugs directly from Haiti to the United States, concealed in shipments of legitimate items such as cement or in hidden compartments. Aircraft are also used, and some drugs are driven over the border with the Dominican Republic to be sent to Puerto Rico and elsewhere, the report says.

The other Haitian police officials who have pleaded guilty are Jean Nesly Lucien, the former national police director; Rudy Therassan, a former commander with the police; and Romaine Lestin, former police chief at the Port-au-Prince airport.

Therassan was sentenced in July to 15 years in prison, while Lucien and Lestin are scheduled for sentencing in November.

194 Youths Arrested In Crackdown On Violence (TUCCIT)

By DAVID L. TEIBEL and HEIDI ROWLEY, Tucson Citizen

Tucson Citizen, September 20, 2005

Tucson police made 356 arrests over the summer in specialized efforts to reduce the number of juveniles involved in crimes and to put a cap on a rash of murders.

Of that number, 194 of those arrested were juveniles while the rest were adults.

Operations Division South Capt. Perry Tarrant said the summer youth deployment, which lasted from May 27 to Aug. 20, was funded by a grant from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and a private grant from Kino Weed and Seed.

On July 28, police and ATF agents expanded the program to target adult troublemakers after there were four homicides in three days: one on July 23, one on the 24th and two on the 25th, said Assistant police Chief Kathleen Robinson.

The expanded special patrols had officers looking for such things as illegal gatherings in business parking lots, rowdy gatherings and drinking in public, considered precursors to killings. The patrols went on until Sept. 10, Robinson said.

From July 28 to Sept. 10 there were no homicides in the South Side patrol area, said Sgt. Kerry Fuller, a police spokeswoman. During the same period last year there were two, she said.

Citywide there have been 33 homicides this year. There were 38 by this time last year, Fuller said Friday afternoon.

Tarrant said the ATF grant provided for increased enforcement in the South Side patrol division, which covers Tucson south of 22nd Street.

Tarrant said officers focused on getting guns off the street.

In all, 166 weapons, including handguns, rifles and shotguns, were seized.

Thirty-eight firearms cases are ready for prosecution as a result of the deployments, officials said.

Tarrant said that overall, "We had the impact we were looking for."

Robinson said the department will continue violence reduction patrols throughout the year.

Federal Judge Rules That Marshals Service Must Release Photos Of Defendants (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, September 20, 2005

DETROIT (AP) -- A federal judge has ruled that the U.S. Marshals Service must comply with media requests for photos of criminal defendants, but said it can take up to 20 days to process the requests under the Federal Freedom of Information Act.

The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor also said that the requests may be processed through the Marshals Service headquarters in Washington, rather than through its office in Detroit, the Free Press reported in a story on its Web site Monday.

The newspaper had asked in its lawsuit that the photos be provided through the Detroit office. Pictures previously requested in Detroit usually were provided the same day.

The Free Press and the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal sued the Marshals Service earlier this year after it stopped providing the photos on the grounds that it would invade the privacy of defendants.

Diggs Taylor also granted a Free Press request that the government pay its legal fees in the suit. Herschel Fink, an attorney for the newspaper, said he didn't know how much it would cost.

Deadly Rig Blast May Have Been Criminal (NYPOST/AP)

The New York Post, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006805

INDEPENDENCE, Kan. (AP) -- Evidence of possible criminal activity has been found in a natural gas drilling rig explosion that killed two workers and injured a third, authorities said Monday.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Kansas State Fire Marshal's office and the Montgomery County Sheriff's Department are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and conviction in the June 2 explosion.

"If this tragedy was the result of a deliberate criminal act, we will not rest until whoever is responsible was brought to justice," Sheriff Stan Veach said in a statement announcing the reward.

Paul Marquardt, an ATF spokesman in Kansas City, Mo., would not discuss the evidence in detail.

The rig belonged to McPherson Drilling of Cherryvale. Shortly after the explosion, one of the owners of the company noted the unusual nature of the blast.

"You could tell the way the pipe blew that something inside the pipe blew out instead of up," Nancy McPherson said on the day of the explosion. "My husband says he has never seen anything like this before."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Nominee's Credentials Questioned (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The Bush administration is seeking to appoint a lawyer with little immigration or customs experience to head the troubled law enforcement agency that handles those issues, prompting sharp criticism from some employee groups, immigration advocates and homeland security experts.

The push to appoint Julie Myers to head the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, part of the Department of Homeland Security, comes in the midst of intense debate over the qualifications of department political appointees involved in the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina.

Concerns over Myers, 36, were acute enough at a Senate hearing last week that lawmakers asked the nominee to detail during her testimony her postings and to account for her management experience. Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) went so far as to tell Myers that her résumé indicates she is not qualified for the job.

But Voinovich has since met with Myers and is now likely to support her, his spokeswoman said yesterday. Myers, who has attracted strong support from many former colleagues, told senators that she would draw upon the experiences of ICE veterans in running the agency.

"I realize that I'm not 80 years old," Myers testified. "I have a few gray hairs, more coming, but I will seek to work with those who are knowledgeable in this area, who know more than I do."

After working as a federal prosecutor in Brooklyn, N.Y., for two years, Myers held a variety of jobs over the past four years at the White House and at the departments of Commerce, Justice and Treasury, though none involved managing a large bureaucracy. Myers worked briefly as chief of staff to Michael Chertoff when he led the Justice Department's criminal division before he became Homeland Security secretary.

Myers also was an associate under independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr for about 16 months and has most recently served as a special assistant to President Bush handling personnel issues.

Her uncle is Air Force Gen. Richard B. Myers, the departing chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. She married Chertoff's current chief of staff, John F. Wood, on Saturday.

In written answers to questions from Congress, Myers highlighted her year-long job as assistant secretary for export enforcement at Commerce, where she said she supervised 170 employees and a $25 million budget. ICE has more than 20,000 employees and a budget of approximately $4 billion. Its personnel investigate immigrant, drug and weapon smuggling, and illegal exports, among other responsibilities.

Myers was on her honeymoon and was not available to comment yesterday. Erin Healy, a White House spokeswoman, cited Myers's work with customs agents on money-laundering and drug-smuggling cases. "She's well-known and respected throughout the law enforcement community," Healy said. "She has a proven track record as an effective manager."

ICE was created from remnants of the former immigration and customs services. It is widely viewed as one of the most troubled parts of the sprawling Department of Homeland Security.

Homeland Security political appointees have come under scrutiny since Michael D. Brown resigned under fire this month as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which he joined with no experience in disaster preparedness. Several other senior FEMA officials were Bush supporters who did not have crisis-management credentials.

DOJ_NMG_0006806

Unlike most political appointments, the head of ICE is required by statute to have at least five years of experience in both law enforcement and management.

Many immigration advocates, ICE employee representatives and homeland security experts said they were troubled by the nomination of Myers to take over an agency with so many problems.

"It appears she's got a tremendous amount of experience in money laundering, in banking and the financial areas," said Charles Showalter, president of the National Homeland Security Council, a union that represents 7,800 ICE agents, officers and support staff. "My question is: Who the hell is going to enforce the immigration laws?"

I. Michael Greenberger, a former Clinton administration official who heads the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland, said the Myers appointment represents "pre-Katrina thinking, where political relationships were a very large factor."

"Post-Katrina, we now see that people need to be eminently qualified," Greenberger said.

But Jim Pasco, executive director of the Fraternal Order of Police, which represents several thousand ICE employees, lauded Myers's government experience.

"That organization . . . is on some days almost dysfunctional," Pasco said. "I think Julie may be just the person to pull people and functions together to get them working right for a change."

During a hearing Thursday of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and ranking Democrat Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) quizzed Myers on whether her positions over the past five years qualified her for the job.

The most pointed questioning came from Voinovich, who said during the hearing that he wanted to meet with Chertoff to discuss Myers's qualifications. "I'd really like to have him spend some time with us, telling us personally why he thinks you're qualified for the job, because based on the résumé, I don't think you are," Voinovich said.

But Marcie Ridgway, Voinovich's communications director, said yesterday that the Ohio senator had resolved his concerns by talking privately with both Chertoff and Myers. Ridgway said Voinovich was not available to speak directly about the issue.

DeLay Must Bridge Gap With Bush (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 20, 2005

The White House outlined a comprehensive immigration overhaul during a meeting last week with congressional Republicans, creating a potential conflict between the administration and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), who favors an incremental approach to reform.

The comprehensive package would increase enforcement on the border, create new workplace requirements for employers and expand guest-worker programs inside and outside the United States, said Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who met last week with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and other senior administration officials.

Flake said the administration “insists on comprehensive reform,” putting the president at odds with DeLay and those congressional Republicans who would rather change the current immigration code one law at a time. As recently as last week, DeLay said he would prefer passing a bill to increase border security before taking up legislation to address workplace enforcement or the current guest-worker program.

In the House, GOP leaders must try to find legislative language agreeable to those members advocating stronger border protections and those members pushing for an expansion of the country’s guest-worker program, although there is considerable overlap.

“We’re closer than people think,” Flake said of the distance between competing factions within the Republican Conference. “The gulf is not as wide as people assume.”

The guest-worker provisions in the White House package would require illegal immigrants employed in the United States to register with the federal government as part of a national database for employers of all sizes. Those workers would then be allowed to stay in the country for an intermediate phase as long as they remained employed.

Flake and Kolbe included a similar provision in the comprehensive immigration bill they co-wrote with Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) and Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.). Their bill would allow these workers to register for two successive three-year terms, during which they would have temporary guest-worker status and could apply for permanent residency.

In contrast, the administration plan would require these workers to return to their countries of origin after the intermediate work phase to register for permanent residency, Kolbe said.

DOJ_NMG_0006807

In the Senate, John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) have introduced a bill that would require illegal immigrants employed in the United States to return to their countries of origin before applying for permanent residency or guest-worker status.

Similar legislation is expected in the House, where Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), whose committee will mark up the eventual legislation, told the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel last week that he expected Hurricane Katrina to postpone any bill overhauling the country's immigration policy until next year.

Neither Flake nor Kolbe would give any details about when the administration would want to see Congress pass an immigration measure, but both members said they were confident the House could tackle legislation this year.

During a Republican Conference meeting the last week in July, President Bush told members that he wanted Congress to address immigration reform "next fall," prompting one member to shout: "We can't wait until next fall."

Bush then clarified his remarks to say he meant this fall, Flake said.

Immigration continues to be a particularly controversial issue for congressional Republicans. Flake and Kolbe both faced primary opponents last year who attacked them for advocating an expanded guest-worker program. Kolbe's challenger, state Rep. Randy Graf, has again made immigration the cornerstone of his campaign to unseat the senior member of the Arizona delegation. Graf won 43 percent of the Republican vote during last year's primary. His website features a Ronald Reagan quote about immigration: "A nation without borders is not a nation."

Flake argues that comprehensive changes to immigration policy are the best way to handle this issue politically because such a strategy would address concerns from every side of the political spectrum.

"If it's comprehensive reform … then that covers the basics for all of us, no matter what districts we're from," Flake said. In contrast, passing one component at a time would be a "recipe for disaster," he said.

A coalition of labor unions, civil-rights organizations and religious groups, including the newly independent Service Employees International Union, has scheduled a series of rallies beginning today at Foundry United Methodist Church in Washington in support of the Flake-Kolbe bill.

TAX:

American `Survivor' Winner Pleads Innocent To Tax Evasion (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 20, 2005

(AP) - PROVIDENCE, Rhode Island-Richard Hatch, who won $1 million (â,¬820,000) on the first season of the U.S. reality show "Survivor," pleaded innocent Monday to charges that he failed to pay taxes on his winnings and other income.

Hatch has been charged with tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. He entered the plea in U.S. District Court.

A grand jury indictment filed earlier this month said Hatch filed false tax returns for 2000 and 2001 that omitted his income from the CBS show, $327,000 (â,¬269,380) he was paid to co-host a radio show and $28,000 (â,¬23,070) in rent on a property he owns.

Hatch, 44, also was accused of misusing $36,500 (â,¬30,070) from a nonprofit camp he set up.

The former corporate trainer said the 10-count indictment was retribution for his refusal earlier this year to follow through with a plea deal.

"It was absurd in the spring, and it's still absurd," he said. "They thought I was going to accept two years in jail for something I didn't do."

Hatch faces a maximum of 75 years in prison if found guilty on all charges. He also could face millions of dollars (euros) in fines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Right Rift Over Roberts (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 20, 2005

A rift has opened between conservatives in the nation's capital and those outside the Washington Beltway over John Roberts and his carefully worded testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week.

DOJ_NMG_0006808

The split has divided those on the right who communicate regularly with the White House from conservative activists whose view of Roberts was shaped by the recently completed hearings.

Though it is extremely unlikely that conservatives who are voicing concerns about Roberts behind the scenes would oppose his confirmation by the Senate, they are sending a message to President Bush that his next nominee to the Supreme Court should have a clear record and be unafraid to express boldly his or her beliefs.

As result, political pressure is growing on Bush to nominate an outspoken conservative to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

So far, Republicans and conservatives have presented to the public unified enthusiasm for Roberts. But since the first round of questions of last week's hearings, conservatives have raised concerns behind the scenes, debating each other in private conversations and conference calls.

"I'm definitely one who has major concerns about the Roberts nomination," said Dr. Virginia Armstrong, the national chairwoman of Eagle Forum's Court Watch Project. "I had questions before the hearing. Since the hearing, those questions and concerns are much more intense than they were."

"The biggest question is what is this man's approach to the Constitution, and we were never told that," said Armstrong, who said she debated Roberts's testimony with fellow conservatives yesterday. "We were told he did not have an overarching philosophy."

She said that Roberts's answers last week indicated that he would follow Supreme Court precedent even if he thought it was not necessarily supported by the text of the Constitution.

For example, Roberts said that, when considering overturning precedent, "it is not enough that you may think the prior decision was wrongly decided."

"You do look at these other factors, like settled expectations, like the legitimacy of the court, whether a particular precedent is workable or not, whether a precedent has been eroded by subsequent developments," he said.

To some conservatives, concepts such as "workability" are alarming because they are considered vacuous and can be infused with a judge's personal views. In essence, such concepts are the building blocks of judicial activism.

Armstrong, who has a doctorate in political science and doesn't consider herself a political operative, is based in Texas. Her foils in recent debates have been conservatives based in Washington, D.C., who have more frequent contact with White House emissaries and Roberts's former colleagues who vouch for the nominee's conservative credentials in the absence of an extensive record.

Ironically, the aspects of Roberts's nomination that have frustrated Senate Democrats and liberal groups trying to inflict political damage on him — specifically the few writings expressing his legal views, and furthermore the reluctance to express those views in Senate hearings — have also frustrated conservatives.

"After four days of testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, there is much that we know about Judge John Roberts and yet much that we still do not know," said Dr. Rick Scarborough, president of Vision America, a Texas-based Judeo-Christian advocacy group.

"We do know that Judge Roberts says he will perform the proper duties of a judge, which is to apply the laws of the land according to the intent of the drafters, and will not legislate from the bench," he said in a statement given to The Hill that praised Roberts for being well spoken and intelligent.

But Scarborough also raised concerns: "We don't know whether he recognizes that the judiciary is subject to checks and balances by the other branches of government. We don't know whether he believes that the Roe v. Wade abortion decision was wrongly decided and should be overruled, or whether the court's homosexual 'rights' cases were wrongly decided and should be overruled."

"In short, we don't know whether a Chief Justice Roberts would be more like Justice Scalia, who is regularly faithful to the Constitution, or like Justice Souter, who regularly betrays the Constitution," he said.

But questions among conservatives have not been confined strictly to those from outside the Beltway.

"I think there is some disappointment in the way that Roberts testified," said an aide to a Republican member of the Judiciary Committee, who noted that the disappointment is not so great that GOP senators would vote against Roberts.

"In general, people thought that he could answer the question of whether he is a conservative," the aide said.

Aside from Roberts's decision not to endorse conservative views in the hearing, some answers that seemed intended to defuse Democratic criticism have alarmed conservatives.

In particular, responding to Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) during the first round of questioning, Roberts said that he agreed with the Supreme Court's conclusion in Griswold v. Connecticut that marital privacy extends to contraception and its availability.

Roberts noted — seemingly approvingly — that the court has since grounded the right to privacy in the 14th Amendment. The statement created a firestorm among conservatives, which Roberts's handlers scrambled to quell.

Griswold and privacy are hot topics because the court has founded reproductive rights, including the right to an abortion, on the right to privacy that case helped establish.

"Once people understood and looked at the judge's answers and his comments, everyone was comfortable," said former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie, who is overseeing the Senate confirmation for the White House.

Roberts's defenders noted that Roberts's discussion of Griswold was nearly identical to Justice Clarence Thomas's during his confirmation 14 years earlier.

Other D.C.-based conservative leaders have praised Roberts's Senate testimony.

"I think that Roberts was masterful, and he is also a solid conservative," said Manuel Miranda, who formerly handled strategy on judicial nominations for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

Miranda rebutted conservatives who have criticized Roberts avowed respect for precedent.

"His answers on precedent show that he is not like Robert Bork, he is like Rehnquist," Miranda said. "Some people believe nothing overrides the written word of the Constitution, but the rule of stability in law, which is stare decisis, is part of the fabric of the Constitution because undoubtedly the Framers' primary intent was to signal a stable and written law to the people."

Specter Backs U.S. Chief Justice Nominee Roberts (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 20, 2005

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said on Monday he will vote for John Roberts to be U.S. chief justice even though it is uncertain what the conservative appeals court judge will do on the Supreme Court.

"It's my judgment that he's well qualified ... and I intend to vote aye when his nomination is called before the Senate," the Republican chairman, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said in a Senate speech.

"Notwithstanding his answers and my efforts to glean some hint or realistic expectation from his words and body language, candidly it is not possible to predict or have a solid expectation of what Judge Roberts would do," Specter said.

The committee chairman had been expected to back Roberts, who seems headed toward confirmation by the full Republican-led Senate before the court begins its new term on October 3.

But Specter, a moderate, had withheld judgment until four days of hearings he led ended last week.

If confirmed, Roberts, 50, who has spent two years on the appeals bench, would be the youngest chief justice in two centuries and positioned to lead the court for decades. Some Democrats, citing documents stemming from his government work, have challenged his commitment to civil rights and women's rights.

All 55 Senate Republicans are expected to vote to confirm Roberts, and so are a large number of the 45-member Senate Democratic Caucus.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid intends to discuss President George W. Bush's first nomination to the Supreme Court at his party's weekly meeting on Tuesday.

While some liberal groups would like Democrats to send a message to Bush with a strong vote against Roberts, Reid "wants each member to vote his or her conscience," a party aide said.

TOUGHER FIGHT NEXT TIME

Easing Roberts' path toward confirmation is the belief he would not shift the balance of power on the nine-member court. He would succeed the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who had been the court's conservative anchor for three decades.

A tougher fight is expected over Bush's next nominee, who would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who has often been the court's swing vote.

With that nomination expected shortly, Bush was to meet on Wednesday with Specter and his Democratic counterpart on the Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, as well as Reid and Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Specter hailed the "impeccable credentials" of Roberts, who received the American Bar Association's top rating for a seat on the Supreme Court.

While Democrats voiced frustration that Roberts refused to answer many specific legal questions, on issues from gender bias to abortion, Specter said, "I think that Judge Roberts went about as far as he could." Roberts said he did not want to prejudge cases that might come before him.

Specter also noted that Roberts, while declining to say whether he would reverse the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, declared that the U.S. Constitution gives Americans the right to privacy, which underpinned the 1973 ruling.

Specter, a veteran of many Supreme Court confirmation hearings, also pointed out that Roberts embraced the importance of legal precedent.

DOJ_NMG_0006810

The Judiciary Committee is to vote on Thursday on its recommendation on Roberts to the full Senate, which is to vote on whether to confirm him during the week of September 26.

Roberts Seen As The Warm-Up In High Court Battle (LAW)

By Jeff Blumenthal, The Legal Intelligencer

Law.com, September 20, 2005

With U.S. Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter announcing his support Monday, the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States gained momentum.

The Pennsylvania Republican, in a speech on the Senate floor, said "Judge Roberts' answers demonstrated that he would take a fair, non-ideological approach to the law." In Specter's view, Roberts had not tipped his hand on whether he would vote to preserve or overturn Supreme Court precedent on a woman's right to end her pregnancy.

"Notwithstanding his answers and my efforts to glean some realistic expectation from his words and body language, candidly it is not possible to predict or have a solid expectation of what Judge Roberts would do," he said.

On Sunday, Specter -- who chaired last week's sometimes contentious confirmation hearings to generally positive reviews -- even suggested that Roberts serve as the template for President Bush's next nomination to the Supreme Court.

But local legal scholars said Bush faces a much tougher fight when he makes his choice for a new associate justice.

Gregory Magarian, a constitutional law professor at Villanova University School of Law and a former clerk for Justice John Paul Stevens, said Specter managed to run Roberts' hearing equitably.

"Sen. Specter attempted to go after information but he didn't grandstand and he definitely didn't grease the wheels for him," Magarian said.

But Magarian and Temple University's Beasley School of Law professor Mark Rahdert, a clerk for former Justice Harry A. Blackmun, both said Roberts' decision to not answer questions dealing with hot-button issues such as abortion could set a precedent for the next nominee.

"He played that card more than any candidate I have seen in recent memory," Rahdert said. "And each time that happens in the future, nominees will have more room to not answer questions. It's one thing if it's an actual case that will wind up before the court. But he can answer questions about an area of the law and he chose not to do so.

"I think Sen. Specter did a good job. The Democrats complained that Roberts was not answering questions and they were not given access to certain documents. But it was a very orderly hearing."

Magarian, though, said by not answering questions, a nominee gives the opposition party a legitimate reason to cast no votes. But he said Roberts has no reason to worry about the outcome of his candidacy.

"He was a great pick," Magarian said. "He has the conservative credentials but he is not obnoxious about it so he doesn't offend liberals as much as a Thomas or a Scalia."

Rahdert said bumping Roberts' nomination up to chief justice after the death of William H. Rehnquist is fitting in more ways than one. Roberts clerked for Rehnquist and appears to possess similar ideology and temperament for the chief slot.

"I think Judge Roberts will be just as strong of a conservative vote as Rehnquist," Rahdert said. "But he won't be leading the charge in forming constitutional law in a conservative fashion, and nor did Chief Justice Rehnquist, who was a pragmatist. Now if they replace Justice [Sandra Day] O'Connor, who was not as consistent of a conservative, with another conservative, there will be a conservative block of five on the court."

Magarian, though, sees key differences between Rehnquist and Roberts. Rehnquist began his term in the early 1970s, when the high court was viewed as a font of liberal decisions on highly divisive issues such as privacy, civil rights and the rights of criminal defendants. Conservatives responded by pushing for judicial restraint. As the court grew more conservative, Magarian said, Rehnquist evolved into an exponent of "conservative judicial activism" But Magarian believes Roberts has not demonstrated the same bent toward conservative activism.

Magarian said that with Roberts' nomination as chief justice -- a conservative replacing a solid conservative -- court watchers will intensify their scrutiny of a replacement for O'Connor, viewed as a more moderate figure and one of the court's "swing votes."

"This most recent hearing was just a warm-up for the next hearing, which will be a real fight," Magarian said. "If they were able to get Roberts through in the O'Connor slot, it would have allowed Bush to go back to his list of red-meat conservatives. Ideally, the president would be able to find another Roberts -- someone with conservative credentials who isn't as divisive. But how many of them are walking around? Democrats can now vote for Roberts and say that they played ball with the president on chief justice and now want a more moderate candidate or they will filibuster."

Rahdert said Roberts is a blueprint candidate for getting a nomination through the Senate but may be too mild for much of the president's conservative base.

DOJ_NMG_0006811

"This is going to be a much more bitter fight, unless Bush backs down on the type of nominee he sends to the Senate," Magarian said. "And judging from all the short lists we have seen, I don't see that happening."

For '08 Dems, A Tough Choice Lies Just Ahead (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 20, 2005

A vote for Judge John Roberts could be well within the mainstream but that may not be where Democrats with an eye on the Oval Office are looking to swim, according to some political strategists and analysts.

"If you're running for president, you need to take a hard look at voting no because that's where the Democratic base is," said Steve McMahon, a Democratic political consultant who worked on Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign.

Democratic senators, particularly those who harbor presidential aspirations, have plenty of reason to watch each other closely as a floor vote on Roberts's nomination to become chief justice of the United States approaches.

Support for Roberts could burnish a senator's centrist credentials and give room to oppose President Bush's pick to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy. But influential interest groups on the left — a source of strength in Democratic primaries — are pressuring their allies in the Senate to oppose Roberts.

With floor consideration on Roberts slated to start no later than Monday, Democrats' reaction to Bush's still-unnamed second nominee could present presidential hopefuls with an opportunity to distinguish themselves from each other.

"Anybody who's running for president is watching everybody else who's running," said McMahon.

Sarah Binder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a professor at George Washington University, said that there would be some value to Democratic presidential hopefuls' rejecting Roberts because liberal activists would champion their votes.

When the Roberts roll call starts, those senators who are viewed as possible contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 — including Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), 2004 nominee John Kerry (Mass.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and perhaps others — will already be under a microscope. That is particularly true of Clinton, who has not publicly revealed her intentions on either Roberts or the 2008 race.

Political experts say Clinton has shifted toward the center this year and a vote for the Roberts nomination would be characterized that way.

"She's caught between the swing voters, who she wants and needs for reelection, and the Democratic presidential primary voters and activists who will want her to vote no," said one Democratic strategist.

The Democratic senators will get a chance to test the political waters at today's weekly caucus lunch. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has asked his colleagues not to make a decision on Roberts until they have had a chance to discuss the issue together. But Reid spokesman Jim Manley said Reid is still not asking his colleagues to vote as a bloc. "It's not a party position," Manley said.

Though Roberts would replace the conservative William Rehnquist, who died Sept. 3, the importance of Bush's impending selection to replace frequent swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor has not quelled the left's hopes of spurring Democratic opposition to Roberts.

Comments on the liberal website www.dailykos.com excoriated The Washington Post's editorial page for recommending that senators support Roberts. The more liberal editorial page of The New York Times called Sunday for "no" votes — a position not likely to be ignored by Clinton. "Senators should vote against Mr. Roberts not because they know he does not have the qualities to be an excellent chief justice, but because he has not met the very heavy burden of proving that he does," the Times opined.

The reasoning underscores a dilemma for Senate Democrats. They have expressed few complaints about what the 50-year-old appellate court judge actually said, but the next nominee may be inclined to reveal even less if Roberts is confirmed. Senate Democrats also remain frustrated by White House refusal to release documents from Roberts's stint as a deputy in the solicitor general's office during the presidency of George H.W. Bush.

Still, some Democrats may vote for Roberts to position themselves better to oppose the second nomination, said Jeff Peck, a former general counsel and staff director of the Senate Judiciary Committee under Biden.

"I think there's going to be a lot more peril voting for the O'Connor replacement than the Rehnquist replacement," said Peck, a partner at the lobbying firm Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland and Steward.

Few have raised the Senate's own "F" word — "filibuster" — in relation to Roberts, but the tactic, and Republicans' threatened "nuclear" option, could be employed depending on whom Bush picks.

Confirm Roberts (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006812

IT WILL BE A DAMNING INDICTMENT of petty partisanship in Washington if an overwhelming majority of the Senate does not vote to confirm John G. Roberts Jr. to be the next chief justice of the United States. As last week's confirmation hearings made clear, Roberts is an exceptionally qualified nominee, well within the mainstream of American legal thought, who deserves broad bipartisan support. If a majority of Democrats in the Senate vote against Roberts, they will reveal themselves as nothing more than self-defeating obstructionists.

Most Democrats have not indicated how they will vote later this week in the Judiciary Committee, or subsequently on the Senate floor. The angst expressed by some senators who feel caught between the pressure of liberal interest groups and their own impression of Roberts is comically overwrought. "I for one have woken up in the middle of the night thinking about it, being unsure how to vote," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.).

One reason Democratic senators are struggling to reach a verdict on the Roberts nomination is that President Bush has yet to announce his nominee for the second vacancy on the court. They are trying to figure out how their vote on Roberts will influence Bush's next choice. This is silly; Roberts ought to be considered on his own merits. But even if one treats this vote merely as a tactical game, voting against an impressive, relatively moderate nominee hardly strengthens the Democrats' leverage. If Roberts fails to win their support, Bush may justifiably conclude that he needn't even bother trying to find a justice palatable to the center. And if Bush next nominates someone who is genuinely unacceptable to most Americans, it will be harder for Democrats to point that out if they cry wolf over Roberts.

Roberts is, admittedly, no William Brennan. But Democrats' hopes to remake the court in his image died (or should have) the day after Bush was reelected. Senate Democrats need to exercise their advise-and-consent duty within this context.

Indeed, given Bush's own past statements about admiration for justices such as Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, Roberts may be the best nominee liberals can expect out of this administration. He is in the tradition of Justices William H. Rehnquist and Anthony Kennedy, conservatives who believe in the value of stability and restraint. In his confirmation hearings, Roberts repeatedly distanced himself from an extreme "originalist" or literal approach to constitutional interpretation. He may have dodged plenty of questions, as do all judicial nominees, but he said plenty that was revealing and reassuring.

Roberts acknowledged that he believes there is a right to privacy, that many constitutional principles such as "liberty" and "due process" evolve over time and that justices must be mindful of how destabilizing it is to reverse prior decisions. He is no radical activist determined to take the court back to the early 20th century. Democrats, including California's Dianne Feinstein, should back Roberts or risk the consequences of voting against an acceptable nominee.

White House Is Said To Shift Names On List For 2nd Seat (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick And Sheryl Stolberg

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - The White House is reshuffling its short list of potential Supreme Court nominees with a new emphasis on finding someone who will hold up under the pressure of what is expected to be fierce confirmation battle, several Republican allies close to the process said on Monday.

The shifting calculus reflects the increased stakes in replacing the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor as the court's swing vote as well as the expectation that the new nominee will be measured against Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who was hailed by both parties for his performance during almost 20 hours of confirmation hearings for the post of chief justice.

The shift also indicates that the administration expects some Democrats' pent-up frustration with what they labeled as Judge Roberts's evasiveness to spill over into the hearings for a new nominee. Republican aides briefed on the search said the White House was looking mainly at female jurists for Justice O'Connor's seat, but it has expanded its short list and it is examining the contenders anew in the expectation of a trial by fire.

Conservative allies of the White House said the new criteria could hurt the chances of Judge Janice Rogers Brown, a 2005 Bush appointee to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and a favorite of the president's conservative base.

Republican strategists close to the White House worry that Judge Brown, an African-American known for her fiery speeches to conservative crowds, might try to fight back against vigorous questioning. Other conservative strategists say that she also lacks experience on the federal bench and that supporting her highly ideological oratory might strain the solidarity of the Senate Republican caucus.

Another judge said to be on the list is Judge Priscilla R. Owen, a friend of the president also recently confirmed to a federal appeals court after a vigorous Senate battle. In her case, strategists say the White House is evaluating whether her reticence and mild manner would be a strength or a weakness under interrogation in the Senate.

Others said to remain under consideration include the contenders for the last vacancy, Judge Edith H. Jones and Judge Edith Brown Clement of the Fifth Circuit, as well as Judge Alice M Batchelder of the Sixth Circuit, Judge Karen Williams of the Fourth Circuit and Judge Consuelo M. Callahan of the Ninth Circuit. Judge Callahan, a Republican appointee, is Hispanic, and President Bush has made clear that he would like to name a Hispanic to the court.

DOJ_NMG_0006813

Senate leaders, who will meet Mr. Bush on Wednesday to discuss the next court vacancy, said they were also bracing for a firefight over the next nominee. On Monday, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, called on Mr. Bush to name someone who will promote "balance and stability" on the court - a reference that seemed aimed at prodding the White House toward nominating a moderate in the mold of Justice O'Connor.

"I think that there's been a lot frustration on this one, and it's been commented upon very broadly and I think that frustration may well be vented on the next nominee," Mr. Specter said in an interview on Monday, after announcing his support for Judge Roberts.

Democrats, meanwhile, prepared for a meeting of their caucus on Tuesday to debate the vote on Judge Roberts. Democratic strategists said some leaders in the party were arguing that with Judge Roberts widely expected to win confirmation, members of their party should vote for him in order to appear open-minded and save their ammunition for the fight ahead.

Others, including Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, are expected to push for votes against confirmation in order to send a message to the White House.

Liberal advocacy groups staged a last-ditch campaign on Monday to push Democrats to vote against Mr. Roberts. "It would be an invitation for George W. Bush to name someone as extreme as he wants to for the O'Connor vacancy," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way.

Three labor union groups - the A.F.L.-C.I.O., the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, and the Service Employees International Union - announced their opposition to confirmation on Monday, as did the Center for American Progress, a liberal research organization run by John D. Podesta, the chief of staff under former President Bill Clinton.

Diversity Changes The Way Justices See The World (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2005

In the 215 years since the U.S. Supreme Court first convened, 104 of the 108 justices have been white men. (Related: Opposing view)

The exceptions? Thurgood Marshall, Clarence Thomas, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Sandra Day O'Connor.

Marshall died in 1993; the other three sit on today's court. But with the retirement of O'Connor, the nation's highest court will lose more of a commodity already in very short supply — different life experiences.

When President Bush nominates O'Connor's successor, he will have an opportunity to remedy that, and it should be a priority.

In a nation as diverse as America, a diversity of ideas and perspectives adds to the court's ability to wisely decide issues that change lives. If all nine justices see law and life from the same vantage point, their ideas will not be challenged, tested and honed into the best possible rulings.

Appellate Judge John Roberts, who appears headed for confirmation as the next chief justice, is superbly qualified as a lawyer, but he's also very much like the other overwhelmingly white, male lawyers he would join. Five graduated from Harvard or Yale law schools. Most worked in past presidential administrations, sat on lower courts or practiced at elite law firms. O'Connor is the only one from the Southwest and the only one ever elected to public office.

none of the other justices can see life as O'Connor does. She grew up on a ranch, served in the state Legislature and faced gender discrimination. She graduated near the top of her class at Stanford Law, but the only law job she was offered was as a "legal secretary" at a firm in California.

To those who argue that merit and legal scholarship should be the only standards, the answer is it's easy to name a minority or female justice without compromising excellence or creating quotas.

In law, as in other professions, minorities and women have made great strides. Nearly half of law school graduates in 2004 were women; 21% were minorities. Though the federal judiciary still doesn't look quite like America, about 10% of federal judges are African-American, nearly 7% are Hispanic and about 23% are women.

Bush might take his cue from the justice who is retiring. In a 1992 tribute to Marshall, O'Connor wrote about the value of diversity. During the court's deliberations, Marshall's life experiences informed the debates, she said. No one else had gone to segregated schools, represented African-Americans facing death sentences or been told by a gun-toting white man to get out of a small Mississippi town before dark.

After Marshall was gone, she wrote, she often longed for one of his stories that might "change the way I see the world."

Judging is about seeing the world and applying the law. The nation's highest court should not approach that job from a single, narrow perspective.

DOJ_NMG_0006814

Choice Should Be Blind ... (USAT)

By Thomas Heiden

USA Today, September 20, 2005

We are in danger of making our highest court just another part of our partisan political culture. That is bad for our nation and threatens the unique role of the Supreme Court in our system. (Related: Our view)

The next nominee for the court should be chosen on the basis of merit (and not "diversity," however defined) for several important reasons:

· To maintain a bright line difference between law and politics.

· To re-emphasize that the function of the highest court is to maintain the rule of law.

· So that the court does not become an extension of our increasingly divided political culture, but that it stands as the independent counterweight to those influences.

Our nation is wonderfully diverse, but justices do not sit as representatives of religious, ethnic or other groups. We do not allocate the 535 seats in the Senate and House of Representatives by group, much less the nine seats on the court.

The Congress should be full of the political push and pull of what the law should be. The Supreme Court is different. The justices should be pragmatic, not ideological; neutral, not representatives of groups.

To nominate a justice because he or she is a member of a group obviously signals that his or her decisions in certain cases will be influenced by membership in that group. To do so misperceives the court as a legislature and the justices as legislators. The signal sent in these times of cultural division should be the opposite. We should keep perceptions of politics and partisanship — whether in the disguise of "diversity" or otherwise — out of the independent judiciary, particularly the Supreme Court.

That is not to endorse the next nominee as a politically conservative white male. The top ranks of the legal profession today are full of women, with plenty of African-American and other "minority" lawyers right there with them. Our Supreme Court and our nation will be best served if the next nominee is selected with an eye blind to race, gender, religion and political ideology — a true focus on legal and intellectual merit.

Let's hope that she is.

Thomas Heiden is a partner in the Chicago office of the law firm Latham & Watkins. The opinions are his own.

Cost Of Katrina Relief Splits Republican Ranks (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON - President Bush's call to spend "whatever it takes" to rebuild the Gulf Coast set off alarm bells among some in his conservative base - and stepped up a growing debate among Republicans at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue on how to fix the battered region in ways that promote conservative values.

From vouchers for education and Medicaid to the creation of a giant "opportunity zone" where Katrina struck, the Bush reconstruction effort - which he called "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen" - is reviving prospects for policy initiatives that GOP leaders say could make or break their party's future.

At the same time, fiscal conservatives, often outside of leadership, are calling for deep cuts in existing spending to pay the costs of reconstruction. They, too, see this as a fight for the soul of the Republican Party.

"It's too early to tell. It could wind up being the New Deal on steroids," says Mike Franc, vice president for governmental affairs at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

For a president who campaigned on Ronald Reagan's legacy of limited government, the vast scope of needs in the region pose a special challenge. While President Roosevelt's New Deal and President Johnson's War on Poverty offer templates for a federal response, Republicans have campaigned for decades to roll them back.

"If people can agree that the last 40 years didn't help win the War on Poverty in New Orleans and the Gulf - and even hurt it - then the debate shifts into not replicating the last 40 years," says Mr. Franc.

But if the congressional committees bog down and can't agree on a package of reforms that can be financed without breaking the bank, "the default could be going with what we already have," he adds.

In recent weeks, Republican leaders have tasked every committee in Congress to come up quickly with new ideas that meet needs in the region.

These range from a vast package of tax breaks to revive business and housing in the Gulf, to Education Smart cards, which give families the option of paying for education wherever it is available and suits their needs, including private and parochial schools.

DOJ_NMG_0006815

But to move such a plan, Republicans will need coherence in their own ranks, especially agreement across their caucus on how to pay for it. For fiscal conservatives, the biggest issue in the Gulf cleanup is its price tag, expected to exceed $200 billion. Congress has already appropriated $62 billion in emergency spending..

"Congress must ensure that a catastrophe of nature does not become a catastrophe of debt for our children and grandchildren," says Rep. Mike Pence (R) of Indiana, who chairs the Republican Study Group, a top conservative caucus.

The Heritage Foundation estimates that such levels of spending could bump budget deficits past $500 billion in 2008 to $873 billion in 2015.

In response, some conservative lawmakers are calling on their leaders to find offsets for new spending, including delaying implementing the new Medicare drug benefit, rolling back pork projects in recently passed Highway and Energy bills, and even deferring a vote on the permanent extension of Bush tax cuts. Last week, 11 House Republicans voted against a $52 billion hurricane relief bill in protest against the failure to identify offsets.

In a comment to reporters last week, House majority leader Tom DeLay said that after 11 years of a Republican majority, there wasn't much fat to cut in the federal budget.

The comment alarmed many conservative activists outside government who see the big spending ways of the Bush administration as a betrayal of small- government ideals.

"I have to pretty strongly disagree with the majority leader," says former GOP Rep. Pat Toomey, now head of the Club for Growth, an antitax group that backs Republican candidates.

"Whatever money gets spent on this reconstruction effort really needs to be offset by reductions somewhere else," he adds. "It's not the role of the federal government to be rebuilding houses and strip malls...."

At a closed leadership meeting on Thursday, House GOP leaders tried to bridge divisions in their caucus by promising strong accountability on where new federal dollars are going "Whatever is expended by Congress, we want to make sure it is funded appropriately and that states and local communities, as well as the private sector, share the burden," said a House leadership aide.

While Republicans have stood by the president as he expanded the role of government in local schools and the war on terrorism, the new wave of post-Katrina spending could break that consensus at a time when the Bush's job rating is at record lows.

The bid to work conservative programs, such as education vouchers, into Gulf aid could help bridge those gaps.

"It's window dressing for the benefit of social conservatives," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J.. "The president may feel that whatever support he will lose among fiscal conservatives, he will win from conservatives proud of him for bootlegging vouchers in the relief plan."

Deficit Foes: Defer New Drug Benefit To Offset Katrina Cost (WT)

By Donald Lambro And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

Some House and Senate members want President Bush to postpone his Medicare prescription-drug program to help pay for Hurricane Katrina relief as the fight over the deficit and the cost of rebuilding heats up.

By targeting the Medicare program, which Congress passed in 2003 despite objections from some conservatives, the lawmakers are striking right at Mr. Bush's signature first-term domestic-policy achievement.

A bill to delay for a year the January 2006 start of the new drug entitlement would save $40 billion and will be "front and center" tomorrow when members of the conservative Republican Study Committee present spending cuts to offset Katrina's costs, said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and RSC chairman.

"It is a very serious option," Mr. Pence said, adding that "a broad number of members" have privately expressed support for the idea.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, mentioned the delay as an option on "Fox News Sunday," and a spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, said the senator is considering sponsoring a bill or backing other senators' efforts.

Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, said he understands the sentiment, but doesn't think the proposal will go anywhere. "I just don't see formal legislative action coming on that," he said.

One Republican leadership aide said it drives home the point Republicans are serious about cutting spending.

"When you talk about someone's prescription-drug benefits, people get it," the aide said. He said the push for the delay is "probably a message to the White House" more than a policy goal.

White House spokesman Trent Duffy dismissed the delay idea.

DOJ_NMG_0006816

"We've made a commitment to seniors. Their lives depend on it. ... Now is not the time to snatch medicines out of medicine cabinets," he said.

But Mr. Pence said the fact that the White House so quickly dismissed it may mean they are nervous. "If it was really going nowhere, it probably wouldn't have been ruled out," he said.

Deficit hawks both inside and outside of Congress say adding the cost of recovery and rebuilding to the deficit is a bad idea.

"Simply adding $200 billion or more to the deficit is unwise and unnecessary," said former Sen. Warren B. Rudman, New Hampshire Republican and chairman of the deficit-fighting Concord Coalition.

Some budget watchdogs say major spending cuts will be politically impossible to make as Congress approaches the midterm elections next year.

"I think this is a time when the leadership of the Congress and the White House should bury the ideological hatchet and suggest small increases in taxes and modest restraints on spending," said Robert Reischauer, former director of the Congressional Budget Office.

"Everybody has to put a few sacred cows on the chopping block for efforts like this to be acceptable, but it's highly unlikely in the climate we have now," Mr. Reischauer said.

But tax-cutters argue that any tax increases would weaken the economic recovery, lower tax revenues and thus worsen the deficit.

"Now more than ever, we need a vibrant economy which enables us to pay for things like helping New Orleans to recover," said Mallory Factor, a New York investor who heads the Free Enterprise Fund, which supports congressional candidates who favor lower taxes. "Tax increases are a nonstarter. We can't tax our way out of this spending, and it probably wouldn't reduce the deficit anyway."

One danger for Republicans is that the deficit will erode support for further tax cuts. Republicans had planned to enact about $70 billion in tax cuts under the budget process later this year, mostly by extending tax cuts from the 2001 and 2003 packages. But they now face opposition from within their own ranks.

RSC Pressing For Deep Cuts (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

Proposals from House GOP conservatives to cut federal spending to offset the costs of Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts ran smack into political reality Monday, as the White House rejected a plan to delay implementation of a new Medicare prescription drug program for one year, an idea that conservatives said would save at least $40 billion.

Other initiatives favored by House conservatives, including re-opening the recently passed highway bill to strip out $26 billion in “add-ons” disparaged as pork projects by budget hawks, also have garnered little support on Capitol Hill, according to GOP insiders.

But Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), chairman of the conservative, 90-plus member Republican Study Committee, vowed to press ahead with his initiative to find spending cuts to help pay for the Katrina reconstruction costs.

Pence, who along with President Bush and other Republican Congressional leaders objects to a tax increase to fund Katrina relief proposals, said Congress must do something to rein in federal spending, even more now that the Gulf Coast recovery effort will add tens of billions of dollars to the federal budget. Pence vowed to continue to push for a vote on delaying implementation of the Medicare drug program, despite White House opposition.

“With all due respect to the White House and their intentions, House conservatives will vigorously pursue the one-year delay in the Medicare prescription drug entitlement,” Pence said in an interview on Monday. Pence voted against the program when it was originally approved by Congress in November 2003, and the Indiana Republican said waiting until January 2007 to roll out the drug initiative would be “a great service to future generations of Americans.”

Pence and other RSC members, including Reps. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) and Jeb Hensarling (Texas), will take part in a press conference on Wednesday to unveil “Operation Offset,” their plan to pay for at least some portion of the Katrina recovery through cuts in government spending.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other House GOP leaders will meet with Pence and RSC representatives today to discuss their offset ideas, and while GOP leadership aides noted that senior lawmakers will listen to their proposals carefully, Hastert will not endorse anything that alienates other factions within the Republican Conference.

“We have been through this in the past,” said a senior House GOP leadership aide of offsetting federal disaster spending. “Getting offsets is a great idea. But getting it through the House is another thing. I don’t see where there are the votes” for delaying the Medicare drug rollout or retroactively cutting highway funds.

DOJ_NMG_0006817

White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters that delaying the Medicare prescription drug program is not even being considered by Bush or his top advisers, despite calls from some within his own party to do so.

"Now, in terms of the Medicare drug benefit, that is an important benefit for our seniors that will save them significant money on their prescription drugs," McClellan told reporters on Monday. "And it's important to move forward on the prescription drug benefit and we are."

The new prescription drug program is a centerpiece of GOP efforts to appeal to older voters, and Republican leaders are counting on using the implementation of the drug initiative in the November 2006 elections.

A House Republican leadership aide said the idea of delaying the prescription drug program was a nonstarter with top GOP lawmakers, given that the government already has spent millions of dollars assuring seniors that the benefit is on the way.

"It would be like Lucy pulling the football away from Charlie Brown," the aide said.

McClellan suggested instead that Congress enact some of the cuts included in Bush's fiscal 2006 budget proposal, although many of these overtures already have been rejected by Congress this year.

Bush proposed ending or slashing more than 154 federal programs to save at least $20 billion in non-defense discretionary spending. Some of these proposed cuts provoked outrage on Capitol Hill and were immediately rejected, such as plans to slash funding for Amtrak and reductions in farm support programs.

Bush also proposed cutting $137 billion over 10 years from mandatory programs. The House and Senate Budget committees postponed work on a $35 billion reconciliation package designed to cut spending on entitlement programs last week as the GOP leadership in both chambers struggled to address the concerns of a post-Katrina Congress.

Pence and other GOP conservatives would like to see the Budget committees double or even triple the size of these mandatory cuts, arguing that past reconciliation packages were much larger. Ben Pershing contributed to this report.

Possible Fed Candidate Proposes Hurricane Relief Plan (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 20, 2005

Economic damage inflicted on the U.S. economy by Hurricane Katrina is likely to be modest, making the case for huge government aid questionable, said Glenn Hubbard, who is cited as a possible candidate to head the U.S. Federal Reserve.

In a Financial Times commentary on Monday, Hubbard said that federal fiscal aid should be used to cushion the blow to business and consumer confidence from a nasty regional shock.

But overall the short-term hit to unemployment and production is likely to be modest, offset by rebuilding over the coming year, and long-term damage to energy supplies also seems unlikely.

"Favorable underlying economic growth trends make the need for a national 'stimulus' package -- ironic given the substantial government spending probably of about 1 pct of GDP about to occur -- questionable," Hubbard wrote.

He is one of three names on the list of likely candidates to replace Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, who retires on January 31, 2005. Hubbard was a former top White House economic adviser and for President George W. Bush, and now is dean of Columbia Business School in New York.

Other possible Fed candidates are Harvard economist Martin Feldstein, and former Fed Governor Ben Bernanke, who now is a White House adviser. No one has emerged as a clear front-runner.

Hubbard in the editorial argued for carefully targeting the federal aid from the hurricane that devastated New Orleans and the Gulf coast. The U.S. government already has provided $62.3 billion in special funding and some lawmakers estimate the final price tag could be $150 billion to $200 billion.

He said three economic principles should guide the relief effort for the U.S. Gulf states.

Firstly, temporary assistance should be given to those people hard hit, especially those without insurance. He suggested appointing a "red-tape tsar" to cut through bureaucracy and help people get local and federal benefits. He also recommended using vouchers for health insurance, housing and education. But long-term support should requires a national debate, Hubbard said.

Secondly, large-scale federal funding should be invested quickly in infrastructure -- draining the area, rebuilding the Port of New Orleans, the energy and transport sectors, and repairing levees. It also could be used for a redevelopment authority, which could issue long-term redevelopment bonds.

Thirdly, redevelopment should be governed by market forces once the infrastructure and city play is in place and people's immediate needs addressed, Hubbard said.

The U.S. government already has provided $62.3 billion in special funding for Hurricane Katrina relief, after the storm devastated New Orleans and the Gulf coast. Some lawmakers estimate the final price tag could be $150 billion to $200 billion.

If The Politicians Really Want To Help ... (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0006818

By Gerald Rafshoon And Doug Bailey

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

Members of Congress have voted more than $60 billion in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, with the total estimated to eventually go as high as $200 billion. But that's (mostly) your money. What about their campaign money?

After all, shouldn't sacrifice for the vulnerable start with the powerful? So how about this unconventional idea: Washington should call a 90-day moratorium on campaign fundraising, and both parties — and all congressional incumbents — should tithe from their campaign funds for Katrina relief.

That means 10% of their war chests should go to hurricane relief, or they should raise that amount and donate it to the relief effort instead of collecting still more for the 2006 campaign battles. While we're at it, how about extending the moratorium to political action committees and lobbyists and asking them to take what they have budgeted for the politicians and give it to Katrina relief instead.

Washington's special-interest, lobbyist-loaded, incumbent-entrenched political system may be broken. But it's certainly not broke. Federal Election Commission records show that the party campaign committees and House and Senate incumbents have more than $400 million with nearly 14 months to go before the elections. Tithing would yield $40 million for Katrina aid, money that otherwise would probably just be used for attack ads.

Are we dreaming? Probably. But it's obvious that the displaced and destitute evacuees need the money — and Washington's politicos don't. In 2004, 403 House members sought reelection and on average spent just over $1 million to do it. Regardless of party. One million dollars per incumbent seat. Almost two-thirds of them outspent their opposition 10 to 1 or more. Only seven of the 403 lost (and two of those because Texas redistricting forced incumbents to run against each other).

Incumbent protection is the only nonpartisan thing in today's politics. Both parties benefit; both parties are guilty. Both use redistricting practices at the state level to draw voter-district lines to protect incumbents. Both use special-interest money to keep them in office.

But do the incumbents really need the money? It's not as if many of their races are close. In terms of percentage of the vote, only two of those 403 incumbent races were as tight as the presidential contest between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry. And the incumbents who ran still had a total of $157 million left over on election day.

If self-protection comes first in Washington, is it any wonder politicians seem so out of touch?

But Washington's cycle of fundraising and influence-buying and access-selling is just one part of a system badly out of whack. Consider that:

· $2.2 billion was spent on the presidential race in 2004, twice what was spent in 2000, according to the Washington Post.

· Since 2000, the number of lobbyists in Washington has doubled to almost 35,000.

· We know from our own experience that the political consulting profession is increasingly peopled by mercenaries, many of whom work in campaigns just to be able to sell access to those they help elect.

· Many who come to Washington to serve the people tend to stay to serve the special interests.

So maybe rebuilding from the tragedy of Katrina is also an opportunity to rebuild a democracy of selfless public service. How can Washington's incumbents ensure that political money buys more than insider access? How can Washington's invulnerable understand the nation's vulnerable? How can the powerful earn the trust of the powerless?

One starting place is to give of themselves — donating a potful of their campaign money to people who really need it. And maybe we the voters ought to hold them accountable if they don't.

Gerald Rafshoon and Doug Bailey were the opposing advertising consultants in the Carter-Ford presidential campaign in 1976. They are working together on a documentary and book about the collapse of U.

Bush Proposes Vouchers For All Displaced Students (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Under President Bush's plan to cover most of the cost of educating students displaced by Hurricane Katrina, parents could enroll their children in a private or religious school this year at federal expense, even if they had gone to public schools back home, administration officials said yesterday.

In proposing $1.9 billion in aid for kindergartners through 12th-graders whose schools were ruined by the storm, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings originally said the administration was setting aside $488 million for private-school tuition and other help, to re-create as normal an environment as possible for the uncommonly large segment of children from New Orleans who had attended Catholic schools.

Yesterday, however, as new fine print of the proposal emerged, White House and Education Department spokesmen confirmed that the government payment -- as much as $7,500 per child -- would be given for a year to any displaced family that now prefers an alternative to public schools. "Parents may choose to send children to private schools. They may not. But this is their choice," said Susan Aspey, the Education Department's spokeswoman.

DOJ_NMG_0006819

According to administration documents, the $488 million allotment is an estimate based on the fact that about 61,000 children had attended private schools in the four Louisiana parishes that were affected most heavily. Asked whether the president would be willing to spend more on private schools if additional parents asked for such help, Aspey replied, "It's far too soon to speculate. Right now, these are just concepts."

The expansive eligibility for private-school payments intensified the dispute over Bush's approach to providing federal relief to people and places harmed by the hurricane. Democrats on Capitol Hill and public education advocates had begun to complain that the president was using the catastrophe to weave into legislation a version of federal funding of vouchers for private education, which the administration has sought, unsuccessfully, since 2001.

"It makes it even worse," Paul Houston, executive director of the American Association of School Administrators, said of the idea that all displaced families could obtain money for private schools. "It is really a tone-deaf response to the crisis. It is a real grab to get an ideological position across that they haven't been able to achieve under normal circumstances."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), ranking Democrat on the Senate's Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, said, "Instead of reopening ideological battles, we should be focused on reopening schools and getting people the help that they need."

Some congressional Republicans have embraced Bush's idea. A spokesman for Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), the panel's chairman, said he has not decided whether to add money for private schools into bipartisan legislation providing educational help that the panel drafted last week.

Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, said in a statement, "These children are being welcomed by schools across the nation, both public and private, and we need to support all the affected students and families."

Contractors Get Affirmative Action Exemption (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

The Labor Department has temporarily suspended government requirements that its contractors have an affirmative action plan addressing the employment of women, members of minorities, Vietnam veterans and the disabled if the companies are first-time government contractors working on reconstruction in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

While employment lawyers said it was not clear how strong an impact the exemption would have, the move comes as President Bush has tried to address the perception of unfairness in the government's response to the hurricane.

Under the rules that normally apply to companies hired by the government, businesses with more than 50 employees working on contracts for more than $50,000 must develop an affirmative action plan. But according to a memorandum on the Labor Department's Web site, dated Sept. 9, the goal of the exemption in the case of recovery work associated with Hurricane Katrina is to reduce the burden of paperwork on government contractors and so encourage more companies to jump into assisting with rebuilding from the storm damage.

The exemption is to last for three months, unless it is extended.

"It does not waive affirmative action requirements, it does not waive job posting requirements, it does not waive their obligation not to engage in discrimination," said Charles E. James, deputy assistant secretary at the Labor Department. "It's very, very limited."

The announcement by the Labor Department came the day after President Bush announced the suspension of a law that requires employers to pay the locally prevailing wage to construction workers on federally financed projects. The order applies to parts of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida. In explaining the move, the proclamation stated that "the conditions caused by Hurricane Katrina constitute a 'national emergency.' "

The Labor Department affirmative action memorandum, which Mr. James signed, specifically states that laws against discrimination continue to apply to federal contractors, as do requirements that employers keep records and post notices stating that "equal opportunity is the law." The memorandum only affects the requirement that employers develop a written affirmative action program, Mr. James said.

The memorandum received little attention in the media frenzy over the aftermath of the storm and hearings on the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to the Supreme Court. Protests against it began circulating online late last week.

"It is not simply a paperwork exercise," said Shirley J. Wilcher, deputy assistant secretary for federal contract compliance in the Clinton administration who is now the interim executive director of the American Association for Affirmative Action. "It is the basis for companies to be mindful of their obligation not to discriminate."

DOJ_NMG_0006820

But it is not clear how the exemption may, in practice, affect employment practices at companies, said B. Scott Silverman, an employment lawyer at Morrison & Foerster in Los Angeles. Its impact depends on how much affirmative action plans actually affect short-term hiring, he said.

"The only companies that will end up being completely excused are those that are not doing business with the federal government now and might not otherwise try to do business with the government," Mr. Silverman said.

He added that he thought a three-month exemption would probably not affect employment practices greatly, especially in light of the dire need for employees to rebuild.

"I don't think this exemption is going to restrict those opportunities in any way, shape or form," Mr. Silverman said.

Black Clergy Wary Of Bush's Courtship (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — For many of the black ministers who have allied themselves with President Bush and a Republican strategy to boost the party's African American support, the government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina put a severe strain on new and still-fragile bonds of trust.

But just as some ministers had begun denouncing a government recovery effort that seemed to leave many blacks in the Gulf region behind, a number of those African American clergy say an aggressive outreach campaign by Bush and senior White House aides in recent days has begun reversing what might have been lasting political damage.

Moreover, the ministers — as well as a cadre of conservative policy analysts who consult with the White House — are arguing that the Katrina relief response, while tarnishing the GOP image in the short term, could foster a Republican-led battle against poverty that would give the party a list of new selling points for African American voters who have long viewed Democrats as the best advocates for the downtrodden.

With the federal government spending tens of billions of dollars on the recovery, Republicans have a chance not only to appeal to minorities by creating jobs and other economic opportunities but to use the rebuilding effort as a real-world test of such long-discussed conservative ideas as school vouchers, enterprise zones and the use of faith-based groups to provide social services.

"The strategic question is whether or not the White House senior staff are smart enough to seize this historic and strategic opportunity," said the Rev. Eugene Rivers, pastor of Boston's Azusa Christian Community and one of about two dozen African American ministers Bush has courted heavily. "If they fail to practice the compassionate conservatism that they have preached, history may not be kind to them."

Other ministers said they took solace in Bush's sudden shift in tone last week, as he admitted making mistakes, unveiled a massive rebuilding plan and pledged a renewed look at the relationship between race and poverty.

In language that resonated with many of the black ministers, Bush during his nationally televised speech Thursday cited the "deep, persistent poverty" in the Gulf region and said it "has roots in a history of racial discrimination.... We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action." The Republican Party chairman, in a recent appearance, even talked about a new "war on poverty."

The White House outreach to its allies among black clergy has been intense and has engaged Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, chief domestic policy advisor Claude Allen and James Towey, director of the White House Office on Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

Their efforts show how important the black electorate is to Republican efforts to maintain and build its political majority — and how threatened those plans have been by the images of deaths and destruction in New Orleans, which has a black majority.

Towey said he had spoken to some pastors "two and three times a day" since the storm's wrath became clear, and he acknowledged that some were upset during their conversations.

"I've heard their frustration, and I've heard their deep concern for the people who are suffering," Towey said. But, he added, the fact that a dialogue continues is a sign of potential progress. "I'm encouraged because they're still calling and we're still talking, and we've moved past the first week into the phase the president is talking about now," Towey said.

Interviews with key black pastors who had built alliances with Bush revealed a continued reluctance to fully trust that the administration would follow through on new promises to look fully at race and poverty and to ensure that black residents and minority-owned firms benefited from the rebuilding. But they all expressed hope that Bush was sincere in his words.

The Rev. Bill Owens of Memphis, president of the Coalition for African American Pastors and a supporter of other Bush initiatives, applauded the president's speech, saying his new tone could be redemptive after two weeks of a troubling White House response. But his praise was cautious.

DOJ_NMG_0006821

"I think he now has a golden opportunity to show that he does in his heart care for the African American community," Owens said. "With what he does from here on, he will be judged."

Vivian Berryhill of Mississippi, president of the National Coalition of Pastors Spouses and one of Bush's most vocal black supporters last year, praised the president's new words and promises. But she acknowledged that feelings were raw.

"The president can't make a 20-minute speech and think it's all over," she said. "If Republicans ever hope to appeal to African American voters, they need to come out publicly and support the citizens of American who have a great need."

Even an outspoken member of the all-Democratic Congressional Black Caucus said the Katrina reconstruction outlined last week by Bush could present a history-changing opportunity — if the president and the Republicans in charge of Congress followed through.

"I did not expect [Bush] to be so strong" in addressing race, poverty and the federal commitment to rebuild in the Gulf, said Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.). While cautioning that "rhetoric is one thing and action is another," Cummings wondered whether Katrina's aftermath has been "a life-altering event for the president, making him more compassionate and more empathetic."

Cummings said his Baltimore constituents remain "very, very skeptical" of the Republicans' ability to deliver on the lofty promises of the president's speech.

Yet, the Democratic congressman added, "We have to roll up our sleeves and work with him."

In addition to enhancing the Republican appeal among African Americans, senior party strategists believe that remaking the Gulf Coast has the potential to reignite the Bush "compassion agenda" that had been shunted aside by a post-Sept. 11 focus on terrorism, and provide a laboratory for long-simmering Republican ideas for targeting urban poverty.

Bush outlined some of those ideas last week, promising tax incentives and the pledge that a portion of the relief money would flow to faith-based social service organizations.

Bush increased his share of the black vote last year by as much as 7 percentage points in key battleground states, in part because of a White House initiative that has directed millions in government funds to black churches and other faith-based social service organizations.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman has forged ahead with the party's minority outreach campaign.

Several worried Republicans posed questions about it during a visit last week by Mehlman to Oregon and Washington state, prompting Mehlman to assure them that the administration's response would fit comfortably with the notion of growing the GOP — putting "an effective war on poverty" on par on the administration agenda with the fight against terrorism and reshaping Social Security.

"One of the things this requires us to do is rethink how does our nation do in helping folks who are in need," Mehlman said during an appearance in suburban Seattle.

"What this president says is we need to move from a regulatory system that creates dependency to an opportunity society that creates ownership and says more folks can own their own home and poor parents can choose where their kids go to school and poor people can own a personal retirement account."

While Towey said the black pastors will have a major role in helping to devise policy, the White House has also been soliciting advice from conservative thinkers.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich is advocating vouchers to allow displaced children and families to make their own choices in education and a market approach to housing.

Jack Kemp, the 1996 Republican vice presidential nominee and former U.S. housing secretary, wrote last week that conservatives could turn Katrina into an opportunity just as presidents Lincoln and Franklin D. Roosevelt did during other periods of crisis.

In an essay in the online conservative journal Human Events, Kemp wrote: "In the wake of this national catastrophe we should all be imagining the unimaginable."

Incompetence, Not Racism (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

If you told me that George W. Bush is a dummy, I would argue with you but understand why you thought so: all those idiotic statements. But if you told me, as some have been implying, that Bush is a racist or that he doesn't care about black people, I would not only say that you're wrong but add, "Not the George Bush I know."

Of course, I don't know George Bush personally. But in his first presidential campaign, I traveled with him and tried, as he might say, to look into his heart. Conveniently enough, he sometimes wears it on his sleeve -- never more so, as I discovered, than when he talks about poor kids and racial and ethnic minorities. His feelings for them -- especially for poor kids -- are genuine. This is what I believed then and this -- his incompetent performance regarding Hurricane Katrina notwithstanding -- is what I believe now.

DOJ_NMG_0006822

Others believe differently. The most non-nuanced statements came from the rapper Kanye West. Appearing on an NBC special to raise money for flood victims, West attributed the slow recovery effort not to ineptitude but to the fact that "most of the people are black." He followed that up a moment later with: "George Bush doesn't care about black people." NBC snipped that comment from its West Coast feed, but no matter: West was clearly not speaking only for himself. National polls showed a racial divide in appraising how the government did after Katrina. Blacks by and large thought race played a role in the laggard relief effort.

The Rev. Al Sharpton, functionally unemployed all these years, put it a bit differently. Appearing Sunday on local New York television, he didn't exactly say that Bush was indifferent to the plight of New Orleans's poor blacks, but he did say this about Bush: "One has to suspect why he had such delayed compassion." Sharpton did point out, as Bill Clinton did in his Sunday TV appearances, that in New Orleans, poor and black are largely synonymous, but still the damage was done: George Bush is no friend of black people.

I have two problems with all this. The first is not just that it's unfair -- Bush, in this case, was an equal opportunity bungler -- but that it rests on a stereotype: Republicans tend to wear lime green pants in the summer and dislike black people all year round. There was more than a little truth to this at one time. The GOP, after all, became a safe haven for Southern bigots who fled the Democratic Party (as Lyndon Johnson knew they would) in the civil rights era. The fight for the rights of blacks turned Dixie as Republican as it once was Democratic. To its everlasting shame, the GOP continues to benefit from raw bigotry.

But Bush is not cut from that cloth. He is a contemporary Republican, a person of another generation who, you may have noticed, has a black woman as secretary of state and had a black man before her. Under him, the GOP began an outreach to black Americans, and unless the Democrats wake up it will ultimately succeed. As Karl Rove well knows, all he has to do is pick up a small percentage of the black vote and he ends the current 50-50 electoral split. Bush, who won an impressive 27 percent of the black vote in his reelection bid for Texas governor, could have been the man to do this. His task is a lot harder now.

My second problem is that yelling racism stops creative thinking. Questions about how reconstruction should be managed, about how relief money should be used, about who will be resettled and where -- all of them fraught with racial issues -- will not be addressed. Instead, as we have already seen, the feds will simply throw gobs and gobs of money at New Orleans and its poor -- never mind how it is spent. Bush has reacted like a conservative's stereotype of a liberal -- just spend the damn money and hope it does some good. This, more than anything, shows true contempt for the poor, regardless of race.

We owe the poor our special consideration. We especially owe the black poor an appreciation of their plight and their dolorous history. But in general it was incompetence, not racism, that slowed the relief effort -- incompetence on the local and state levels, too, and incompetence on the part of black as well as white public officials. The search for racist scapegoats does the poor no good. This relief effort ought to start, above all, with some clear thinking.

Visions Of The New New Orleans (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

PORTLAND, Ore. -- If the rebuilding of New Orleans is to be something other than a new government disaster, a coalition of the skeptical and the visionary will have to stand together and confront the lobbyists and the corporate welfare artists.

Fiscal conservatives in Congress are right to worry about the potential for -- yes -- waste, fraud and abuse if the federal government throws off tens of billions of dollars into a haphazard and ill-planned spending fest. If the goal is to spend as much money as quickly as possible, the benefits will flow primarily to the well-connected, and the result will be a new mess built on the old.

But because the rest of us are morally obligated to those whose lives have been damaged by natural calamity and government failure, it's a fact that the federal government will be spending a lot of money. That's why the fiscal conservatives need the visionaries. The visionaries are insisting that we put in the time to make New Orleans a model for a better kind of city and the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast a model for a better approach to governing. The people of the region, not the lobbyists, need to lead in creating an environmentally sustainable, socially just and economically viable region.

These thoughts are inspired by one of Congress's rare visionaries. Rep. Earl Blumenauer not only represents his beloved city of Portland but is also evangelical in spreading Portland's gospel of "livability." That odd but increasingly popular word embodies the idea that if governments plan right (and in cooperation with local citizens), they can safeguard the environment, create more agreeable lives for families and individuals and let loose sustainable private-sector growth.

DOJ_NMG_0006823

Blumenauer, a Democrat always seeking to put together left-right coalitions on behalf of his eclectic mix of ideas, is both worried and excited by the prospect of rebuilding the Gulf. Speaking for the fiscally conservative, he describes himself as "a little scared by how fast they're doing all this stuff because I don't think there's anybody in charge."

But his excitement burns through during a discussion at a restaurant in Portland's Pearl neighborhood, an old warehouse district near an abandoned rail yard that is now thriving. "I've been in Congress for nearly 10 years and I've never been so optimistic that we have a chance not just to engage in the gargantuan task of helping people in the Gulf, but also of healing the body politic." There is an opportunity, he says, for government to ask the basic questions: "How do you build a community? How do you get people involved? You've got to build a citizen infrastructure along with all the roads and bridges."

Blumenauer has more standing than most on this subject. On Jan. 26, after returning from a congressional visit to areas devastated by the Asian tsunami, he rose on the House floor to ask: "What would have happened if, last September, Hurricane Ivan had veered 40 miles to the west, devastating the city of New Orleans?"

"The city has always been at risk because of its low-lying location," Blumenauer warned, "but that risk has been increased because of rising sea levels, groundwater pumping and the erosion of coastal Louisiana . . . it is hard to imagine what would happen if a disaster of that magnitude hit the United States." Now, alas, we know.

Blumenauer is ecumenical in his criticisms of past practices, including the actions of Congress and the Army Corps of Engineers, and he even likes to think that President Bush might become an ally for the large packet of proposals he is peddling.

Why shouldn't the president want to leave a legacy of a New Orleans built on economically mixed neighborhoods and a thriving public transit system? Blumenauer sees new parks and buffer zones in areas where homes shouldn't be, and economic projects designed to put local people back to work. He wants to revisit past policies that encouraged development in dangerous places.

Above all, he wants to turn the hurricane's victims into decision makers. In the rebuilding, "people should have a role in what it should be like, rather than have it done to them." One of his biggest fears is that outsiders will simply turn New Orleans into a Disneyland.

There will be time to debate all of Blumenauer's ideas. But one thing is certain: If the fiscal conservatives and the visionaries don't come together quickly, the special-interest-lobbyist complex that doesn't care about planning and seeks only cash in the hands of its friends will dominate the reconstruction effort. That would be a disaster for all of us, and especially for the people of the Gulf.

Can You Hear Us Now? Let Poor Americans Speak For Themselves (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

One of the most difficult conversations I have endured in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is the discussion about race and poverty. Oh yeah, I have read the quotes from rapper Kanye West and former first lady Barbara Bush. I saw the early news reports about the victims that made me want to throw my TV out the window. But I made a strategic decision to stay focused on my family and not get pulled into making this horrible tragedy a wedge issue. It’s time we shut up and allow poor people to speak for themselves. They have a story to tell us all.

There’s no question that I am super-sensitive and emotional about this topic because of my own background. As a child growing up, I lived right smack on the intersection where race and poverty collide. It’s not a pretty corner. Unfortunately, this intersection of despair, hopelessness and turmoil is not unique to the Gulf Coast region. It exists in major cities across America and in some rural areas as well. Many poor inhabitants at this intersection are not black; whites live there, too.

Katrina was an equal opportunity destroyer. She did not care whether you owned a home on the lakefront or rented an apartment in the “projects.” This monster hurricane uprooted big elm trees and oak trees that lined our historic neighborhoods as though they were toothpicks.

And Katrina was colorblind. She didn’t care if you lived in a house made of brick or one of wood. She moved things out of her way and placed them somewhere else. She was a mighty big storm and from what I was able to witness, it will take time to put things back together.

In the aftermath of all this destruction, Congress should hold a series of hearings that allow the victims to tell their stories to determine how to help them get a fresh start. (We have so many of Katrina’s victims stranded in this region — just invite them over.) Whatever is done, poor people must not be excluded from this conversation.

Based on my experience, the worst part of being a member of the chronic poor or the working poor is the uncertainty about how to maneuver the system. Add race to this equation, and you have a recipe for hopelessness.

DOJ_NMG_0006824

The reason why so many of Katrina's victims, including some middle-class folks, are upset right now is they cannot get a straight answer. It's bad enough to lose all your material possessions, let alone figure out how to log onto a computer to file for assistance or to get an update on information to help you find housing. This expectation is just plain ludicrous.

Federal officials, working with state and local officials, should begin hiring some of the locals right away. They should get rid of the red tape that forces people to find a computer. Bring computers into the shelters or communities where they are stranded.

When I was back home over the weekend, I saw numerous ads for construction workers, builders and other professional skills. No offense, but can someone cut a radio spot and inform people where to apply? Better yet, post this information in the shelters and organize local transportation to take shelter inhabitants to job interviews. Again, think like the people you want to help. Tell them when and where to report and how they can get back and forth. They are ready to work.

If it takes a national conversation on race and poverty to get things moving, I want to start the dialogue. I want Americans to learn how people who live from paycheck to paycheck budget their time and limited resources. I want America to hear what it's like living with no health insurance and waiting for hours to see a medical professional. I want America to hear what it's like working two shifts at a minimum-wage job so everyone will understand why President Bush's decision to waive the Davis-Bacon Act, which guarantees that federal contracts pay workers prevailing wages, is an awful mistake and an insult to the people of the region.

I want America to hear from small and minority businesses about the cumbersome rules and the maze of red tape they went through to get certified only to learn that they may not qualify for the rebuilding work ahead. I am excited about some of the plans designed to help people rebuild their lives and communities, especially the plan to use excess federal land to build new homes. But, Congress should make sure that local people are involved in this process.

Congress can lead the way through public hearings to examine what went wrong and where we go from here. For God's sake, let's be honest with each other and respect our various opinions.

The people who raised me and so many others along the Gulf Coast did not sit on their behinds all day. They worked three or four jobs to make ends meet. They taught us to play by the rules, respect others, get an education and work hard. I still play by those rules, but my family and many others need support and assistance from Congress to help get back in the game.

Donna L. Brazile, the campaign manager for Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore in 2000, runs her own grass-roots political consulting firm.

President Sinking In Ratings (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Americans' views of President Bush and his leadership have soured in the wake of dismay over the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, the course of the Iraq war and the future of the economy.

Bush's rating for handling each of those issues dropped to his lowest yet in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday. Assessments of his personal qualities also fell: For the first time, a majority says he isn't a strong and decisive leader.

Bush's overall approval rating is 40%, equaling a previous low. His disapproval is 58%, a new high.

"Bush stands at a precipice," says Carroll Doherty of the non-partisan Pew Research Center. "He's lost ground among independents. He seems to be starting to lose ground among his own party. And he lost the Democrats a long time ago."

By a record 66%-31%, independents disapprove of the job Bush is doing as president.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan says the president "knows a leader must govern based on what he believes is right, not based on polls." Bush is "working to address the priorities that Americans are most concerned about," he says.

Of the poll's respondents, 30% identified themselves as Republicans, 33% as independents and 36% as Democrats.

The survey shows signs of friction between the two most pressing concerns on Bush's agenda: the Iraq war and Katrina recovery.

A 54% majority says the best way for the government to pay for hurricane relief is by cutting spending for the war. Just 6% support spending cuts in domestic programs, as Bush has suggested.

Nearly two-thirds of those polled, 63%, say some or all of the U.S. troops in Iraq should be withdrawn. A record-high 59% say it was a mistake to invade.

Bush's standing declined even though Americans, by 45%-27%, approve of the proposals he unveiled in a nationally televised address Thursday to deal with Katrina. Seven in 10 express confidence the administration can assist victims.

But assessments of Bush on the hurricane dipped after the speech: 56% say he has taken steps to help victims mostly for political reasons, not because he cares about them.

DOJ_NMG_0006825

By more than 4-to-1, Americans want an independent panel — not Congress — to investigate the government's response to Katrina.

Some Firms Hired In Katrina's Wake Have Checkered Pasts (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

GoldStar EMS was on the ropes earlier this year, beset by legal problems.

The Texas ambulance provider's offices had been raided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of a widening investigation into alleged Medicaid fraud. It faced a $1.3 million tax lien from the Internal Revenue Service. It had been forced to file for emergency bankruptcy protection to prevent the local tax assessors who had seized its airplane from also taking its helicopters. It had closed many of its offices across the state and fired two-thirds of its work force. Dozens of its ambulances sat idle in a parking lot in preparation for a fire sale.

Then Hurricane Katrina tore through the Gulf Coast, and GoldStar's fortunes began to change. Desperate to get ambulances into flood-ravaged areas of Louisiana, the Federal Emergency Management Agency put out a call for help. C. Henderson Consulting Inc., a small East Texas firm, bid for the work and signed a federal contract to provide up to 50 ambulances a day through the end of September at a total cost of $5.2 million.

Then Henderson Consulting went looking for subcontractors capable of providing dozens of ambulances immediately. The only firm it found with that many vehicles on hand was GoldStar, which soon had a subcontract to provide up to 45 ambulances a day at a profit of $800 per vehicle per day.

"Most ambulance companies wouldn't be able to supply 45 ambulances on a dime like that. But ours were just sitting there in the lot, so it was a nice coincidence for everyone," says Edward Rothberg, GoldStar's attorney. "It would be pretty sad for the government to say that we won't use GoldStar because they're being investigated, so we'll leave people to die in the streets."

The GoldStar contract illustrates one of the unintended consequences of what is shaping up to be the largest government rebuilding effort in U.S. history. As the Bush administration rushes to rebuild Louisiana, it faces the prospect of turning to companies with checkered histories that even include disputes with other arms of the government. It's essentially a no-win situation: If officials don't get quick results, they're likely to be criticized for getting bogged down in bureaucracy. But if they push some of the contracting formalities aside, they may find themselves employing unreliable or unsavory companies.

Companies that are involved in earlier disputes with the government are often "so clearly unreliable" that similar problems could well arise during the relief work, says Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a government watchdog in Washington.

FEMA officials say they do have a procedure to review the background of Katrina contractors. First, they check with the General Services Administration to see if a company has been suspended or barred from government contracts. Then they check FEMA's own database to see if the agency has had problems with the contractor in the past. If problems are found, FEMA won't sign up the company.

But such checks aren't likely to disclose much about first-time contractors or about companies that haven't been formally barred from federal work but still face tax liens, criminal investigations or other disputes with other parts of the government. And FEMA doesn't investigate the backgrounds of subcontractors at all, because, as spokesman Michael Widomski says, its work is "specifically through the main contractor."

The potential problems are complicated by the sheer volume of federal money being devoted to rebuilding the Gulf Coast. Yesterday, in response to congressional concerns about potential contracting problems, the Bush administration announced it was hiring FEMA's former acting chief financial officer, Matthew Jadacki, to head a new Office for Hurricane Katrina Oversight, with offices in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. But that may not assuage a bipartisan group of lawmakers that has questioned FEMA's ability to monitor spending. Last week the group proposed legislation to create an independent watchdog modeled on a similar office in Iraq.

GoldStar isn't the only company hired in the wake of Katrina that has had prior run-ins with government agencies. Last month, Illinois state police terminated a $7 million contract with Bode Technology Group Inc., a subcontractor for the company hired by the U.S. to recover and identify Katrina victims. The Springfield, Va., company, which is a division of ChoicePoint Inc., found "false negatives" on many of the samples it was testing for the state police. Bode, which was reviewing rape kits, said it had found no usable evidence in many of the samples. But the state police, which performed its own quality-control tests, found otherwise.

In a written statement, Bode expressed "regret" about the state police decision on the contract and said the dispute centered on an older type of lab work rather than DNA testing.

DOJ_NMG_0006826

The Katrina contract has been a lifeline for GoldStar, whose fortunes had plummeted after a meteoric rise. GoldStar Chief Executive Ralph Crall served as the pastor of a small church he founded and funded in East Texas. He launched GoldStar in 1998, along with an associate he met when the two handled public relations for American Medical Response, then the largest private ambulance provider in Texas. The new company soon displaced AMR. At its peak it owned 90 ambulances, two helicopters and two Learjets, held contracts with cities like Galveston and Corpus Christi, and had annual revenue of more than $20 million, Mr. Rothberg says.

But GoldStar's ascent was soon shadowed by accusations of billing irregularities and poor ambulance response times. Since 2003, eleven complaints were lodged against the company with Texas regulators, far more than any other ambulance organization had. A former employee sued, claiming he was fired after reporting "a potentially serious safety concern." And an investigative article in a Houston alternative newspaper, the Houston Press, concluded that the company "maximized profits and growth at the expense of the injured."

Last April, FBI agents raided seven of GoldStar's offices, confiscating patient records and other files as part of an intensive investigation into whether the company and its top executives had committed Medicaid fraud, according to people familiar with the probe. Mr. Rothberg denied wrongdoing and blamed a competitor or disgruntled former employee for lodging the complaint that triggered the probe. Prosecutors in the U.S. attorney's office in Beaumont, Texas, said last week that the investigation is ongoing but declined further comment.

GoldStar's problems deepened weeks later when tax collectors in Jefferson County sent constables to seize one of the company's jets over an unpaid tax bill of more than $70,000 and made plans to seize its helicopters as well, according to Miriam K. Johnson, the tax assessor there. "It's an unusual move for us to make out here," she says. "We only do it when we know a company is in trouble and we realize we need to protect the county the best we can."

The company filed for bankruptcy protection so that it could keep the helicopters but began scaling back significantly. It pulled out of Jefferson County and a half-dozen other East Texas counties and fired hundreds of workers, reducing its total work force to about 120, Mr. Rothberg says. It also closed a debt-ridden air-service subsidiary called GoldStar Angel Flight, selling off its helicopters and turning its remaining jet over to creditors, he says.

The legal and financial problems had put GoldStar on life support until Katrina hit and its unused ambulances suddenly became a valuable resource. Under the terms of its deal with FEMA, Henderson Consulting is paid $3,100 a day for each ambulance and two-person crew, Mr. Rothberg says. Under the agreement between Henderson and GoldStar, the two companies split the profit on each ambulance equally, he says, allowing each company to net about $800 a vehicle.

John C. Henderson, the owner of Henderson Consulting, says he knew about GoldStar's troubles when he struck the deal but accepted the company's assurances that they would be resolved in its bankruptcy proceedings. "Their legal and financial problems aren't any concern of ours," he says.

Mr. Rothberg, meanwhile, says the company is proud of its work in Texas and hopes its initial monthlong subcontract will be extended. He defends the company's right to win Katrina contracts. "We still live in America, and we're still innocent until proven guilty," he says.

Federal Contractors Seek Liability Shields (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Contractors working on Hurricane Katrina relief efforts for the federal government want Congress to limit their liability from lawsuits and are drafting legislation to seek such protection, industry officials said yesterday.

The Army Corps of Engineers and the Federal Emergency Management Agency have relied on contractors, including several who started work without a contract, to fix the levees in New Orleans and pump water out of the city. But the companies have become concerned about the liability issue because of lawsuits filed against construction firms that helped clean up the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"We're asking for some reasonable limits for going into the Gulf Coast and dealing with unknowns," Michael E. Kennedy, general counsel for the Associated General Contractors of America, said after a meeting of the trade group in Washington. "A contractor goes into an unknown situation to remove debris or fix a utility line, and three years from now someone decides they did it improperly."

The Corps has already contracted with more than a dozen companies for work worth $2.8 billion during the next year. Those companies will be joined by dozens more as reconstruction of the region begins.

The bill that the trade group is drafting would limit contractors' liabilities but still hold them responsible for following government regulations, Kennedy said. It would be similar to regulations the Homeland Security Department unveiled last year that protect companies selling security technology from lawsuits triggered by a terrorist act.

DOJ_NMG_0006827

Legislation was introduced in the House last week to shield volunteer contractors from liability. The general contractors' bill would extend the coverage to companies working under the government.

"You can consider these contractors as an extension of the government; they are performing a lot of public" duties, Kennedy said.

Robert S. Boh, president of Boh Bros. Construction Co. of New Orleans, said yesterday that he favors such a bill. His firm moved its New Orleans offices to Baton Rouge, La., after the hurricane hit but was soon hired by the Corps to fix the levees and pump water out of the city.

"We're simply showing up and responding to verbal direction," Boh said. "We're not adequately able to assess the request for risks."

Also yesterday, the Homeland Security Department's inspector general appointed a National Weather Service official who once served as acting chief financial officer of FEMA to lead the office's work overseeing Katrina spending.

Matthew A. Jadacki, who worked at FEMA from 1991 to 2004, will "be responsible for overseeing the management and expenditures of all contracts, grants and governmental operations related to Hurricane Katrina relief efforts," according to a Homeland Security Department statement.

Jadacki's appointment comes as members of Congress continue to debate other ideas for how the government will monitor the flow of money for Gulf Coast reconstruction. The proposals include establishing a special inspector general's office, expanding the duties of the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction or establishing a chief financial officer.

Some in Congress are concerned that Homeland Security's inspector general's office will not have the resources to monitor the department's regular work, as well as the tens of billions of dollars flowing into the Gulf Coast. Homeland Security Department officials, however, have said the department's IG office is up to the task.

House GOP Scraps Plan For Joint Probe On Hurricane Response (LAT)

By Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Congressional Republicans signaled today that they have abandoned their plan to conduct a joint House-Senate probe of the government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

In announcing a joint probe this month, the Republican leadership had said it would be the most efficient way to investigate the administration's much-criticized initial response to the hurricane. But today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) conceded that he could not overcome Democratic opposition to a joint investigation.

The Democratic leadership has refused to appoint members to a joint committee, citing the lack of equal representation of Democrats on the panel, and the lack of power to issue subpoenas that the majority opposed. Democrats also have insisted on an independent inquiry.

Democratic opposition has left Republicans little maneuvering room for mounting a credible probe. With the joint investigation apparently off the table, Republicans can only hope that Democrats will participate in each chamber's separate investigation. It was far from clear today that Democrats would do that.

In a letter sent to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Frist offered that instead of a joint House-Senate probe, the Senate would conduct its own investigation and "coordinate" its efforts with the House "so as to minimize the burdens placed on those who are coming to Washington, D.C. from the gulf coast region."

Frist also said he was willing to name the members of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs committee as members of the Senate's special panel to probe the disaster. But a spokeswoman for Reid said the majority leader had rejected the proposal.

Meanwhile, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was having no more luck persuading House Democrats to participate in that chamber's probe.

Late last week, Hastert named Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), chairman of the House Governmental Reform Committee, to head the House's special panel investigating the hurricane response. Davis may name Republican members to that committee as early as Tuesday and is planning his first hearing later this week.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) remains adamant that Democrats will not participate in the House committee.

Congress — Again — Misses The Boat (USAT)

By Ross K. Baker

USA Today, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006828

The first reaction to Hurricane Katrina from members of Congress was not one to inspire confidence in our legislative branch.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., when asked about the devastation in New Orleans, told a Chicago newspaper on Aug. 31 that it made little sense to spend billions of dollars to rebuild a city that is7 feet below sea level. This drew a sharp rejoinder from Louisiana's Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu and compelled Hastert to spend much of the day trying to soften his remarks. The episode set the tone for what was to follow — a rancorous debate over how to get to the bottom of the failure of governments at all levels to cope with the ravages of the storm.

In a well-ordered world, a calamity of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina ought to be the subject of a congressional investigation. From the earliest days of the republic, the House of Representatives and Senate had unquestioned responsibility for probing and, yes, finger-pointing in calamities' aftermath.

That, sadly, is no longer true. Congress has fallen victim to a number of problems that have caused Americans to look elsewhere for answers.

The first of these problems is the fractious spirit of partisanship that has so infected Capitol Hill that no conclusion Congress might reach about who was responsible for the botched response to Katrina would have much legitimacy in the eyes of Americans.

A panel of one party

Republican leaders in Congress proposed the creation of a House-Senate committee to investigate the belated relief efforts. They reached this decision without the involvement of Democrats and further undercut the authority of this committee by announcing that Republican members would outnumber Democrats. Democratic leaders in both houses hastened to denounce the plan and have, thus far, declined to participate.

This kind of partisan bickering caused some lawmakers — Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., most prominently — to call for the establishment of an independent panel modeled on the 9/11 Commission to ferret out the causes of the debacle on the Gulf Coast. A panel, along the lines of that commission, with its widely acclaimed hearings and best-selling report, would satisfy the American people that they were getting the straight story. But it is deeply troubling that only by bypassing Congress would citizens conclude that the truth is being told. In all likelihood, the public would be equally skeptical of a panel dominated by Democrats.

But it is more than partisanship that has impeded Congress' ability to avert or probe causes of disasters. The perverse arrangement of committees supervising agencies responsible for disaster relief also impairs the lawmakers. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and the Coast Guard have their operations monitored by two committees. Fear on the part of congressional committee chairmen of losing control over federal agencies to other committees makes a mockery of accountability.

The money Congress spends to avert disasters such as Katrina are distributed, not to those places at greatest risk, but often to those localities represented by legislators who are most influential.

Spoils go to influential

Homeland security money, for example, went to the organization that operates the ferry to fashionable Martha's Vineyard, and a rural county in Kentucky received money to fend off biological and chemical attacks.

Given the preference of terrorists for spectacular acts of violence against heavily populated places, these grants to inconspicuous rural communities is without justification, yet the heavy-hitters on Capitol Hill have resisted apportioning money to the most vulnerable cities and states and insist that all states get a decent ration of pork.

There are a few bright spots in this otherwise dismal picture of business as usual in Congress. Even before Katrina struck, the House Committee on Homeland Security was upgraded from a "select committee" with no legislative authority to a standing committee that can write and process bills. It has a new chairman, Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., who is likely to be sensitive to the security needs of large cities.

On Friday, Sept. 16, the Republican and Democratic leaders of the Senate agreed to put aside, for the time being, the question of how the joint House-Senate committee would be organized and concentrate instead on expediting spending bills to aid the hurricane victims. This does not dispose of the issue but at least enables Congress to deal immediately with the most pressing problems of recovery.

But even these few glimmers of hope can quickly dim if relief and reconstruction after the hurricane degenerate into squabbles over pork, turf and partisan credit. It's truly an ill wind that blows no good, and perhaps one beneficial result of Katrina would be to infuse Congress with a new determination to restore itself to being the place we turn to for help — and for answers.

Ross K. Baker is a political science professor at Rutgers University. He also is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

DOJ_NMG_0006829

Storm Threat Halts Returns To New Orleans (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 19 -- With Tropical Storm Rita bearing down on the Gulf of Mexico and growing political pressure from federal leaders, Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Monday that New Orleans residents could not return home after all and that any people already in the city should evacuate.

Nagin had been allowing business owners to return over the weekend, and on Monday residents of one dry neighborhood were to return to their homes. But Nagin reversed himself and ordered another mandatory evacuation, to begin Wednesday, just hours after President Bush questioned whether the city was safe enough for people to return.

"We are suspending all reentry into the city of New Orleans as of this moment," Nagin said. The mayor said he backed away from his earlier decision because of fresh fears about Rita, which forecasters said could become a hurricane by Tuesday.

"If we are off, I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," Nagin said.

The city's levees, overwhelmed by Hurricane Katrina, "are still in very weak condition" and many of the pumps used to push the mucky floodwaters back into Lake Pontchartrain are not yet operating, Nagin said. If Rita were to dump nine inches of rain on New Orleans, the result would be "three to four feet of flooding in most parts of the city," he said.

Asked if anything could be done to buttress the levee system before Rita were to strike, Nagin replied: "Just tell people to run."

Current weather projections indicate that Rita, which was threatening Key West, Fla., Monday night, could roar across the Gulf and strike the lower portions of Louisiana by the weekend. If, as some suggest, New Orleans sits on the "eastern side of the storm, we take the brunt of it," Nagin said.

As New Orleans residents faced the grim prospect of an even slower recovery, state officials put the still-rising Katrina death toll at 736 in Louisiana and the overall toll at 973.

Bush administration officials and Nagin have sparred publicly and in private in recent days over the mayor's push to demonstrate that New Orleans will be back in business soon. Last Thursday, he laid out a plan to permit up to 182,000 people to return over the course of 10 days.

Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard chief of staff tapped by Bush to lead the federal response here, said that move was "extremely problematic." Allen said it was dangerous to invite tens of thousands of people into a city with little clean water, a severely compromised sewer system, a manual 911 emergency call system and few hospitals or traffic lights.

Nagin, interviewed over the weekend in Dallas by Fox News, questioned Allen's credentials: "Since I have been away a day or two, maybe he's the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

That prompted Bush to reinforce Allen's message, telling reporters he was taking the unusual step of commenting publicly to be certain the mayor got the message.

"We have made our position loud and clear," the president said Monday.

Although he defended his initial plan to reopen New Orleans, Nagin said the new decision to evacuate was based solely on long-range projections that show Rita has the potential to bring high winds and downpours to a city ill-equipped to handle another natural disaster.

"This is not a diversion," he said from his new command center in a downtown hotel. "This is a real threat."

Initially criticized for failing to move many of the city's impoverished black residents out on the weekend prior to Katrina, Nagin promised a more aggressive approach to the evacuation set to begin Wednesday.

"I don't play around with hurricanes," Nagin said. "I've seen Katrina."

Although Nagin said he would turn to active-duty soldiers and the National Guard to help the city's depleted police department enforce the new evacuation order, a Pentagon official said that is not the role of the military.

"They have not asked us to help them take anyone out of the city at this time," said Brig. Gen. Mark A. Graham, deputy commanding general of Fifth U.S. Army, which oversees the 82nd Airborne Division and other active-duty Army forces in the region. "We don't forcibly evacuate anyone. That's a law enforcement job."

The Department of Defense was also evaluating whether to send out to sea vessels such as the warship USS Iwo Jima, which is tied up at a Mississippi River dock in downtown New Orleans and is serving as command center for the military in the region.

"I'm certain they are contemplating that" because ships "have a better chance of riding out the storm" at sea than if they are tied up to moorings, said Maj. John Thomas, a spokesman for the federal recovery effort in Baton Rouge, La.

Many emergency responders who have helped rescue survivors and locate the dead here were pondering their next move, weighing whether they ought to flee before Rita's arrival or hunker down.

DOJ_NMG_0006830

Alexandria, La., Police Capt. John Henderson, who is helping run the city's command center, said aides were drawing up evacuation plans that would enable out-of-town relief workers to move to high ground if necessary later in the week.

Throughout the day, there were pockets of activity in Algiers, the neighborhood across the Mississippi River where residents were officially permitted to return. Even before Nagin's announcement, most residents said they had no intention of staying.

"I just came to clean up, salvage as much as I can," said Ramsey Washington, who drove back from his temporary home in Houston. "It's not livable. They got no jobs. No banks are open."

Sonia Badon, 35, has already rented an apartment in Baton Rouge; her employer has relocated his computer company there, too. On Monday, she and her boss and two friends were nailing a tarp onto the roof of her Halsey Avenue home.

Although her best friend has moved to Nashville in search of a job, Badon said she will return to her native New Orleans. But for now, she said with sweat rolling down her face, "It's too soon to come back."

City Clears Out Again (USAT)

By Laura Parker And Alan Levin

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Mayor Ray Nagin on Monday reversed his call for people to return to the city and ordered most people out over worries that a new tropical storm could flood the city again.

The announcement came after President Bush and the federal government's Hurricane Katrina response team urged the mayor to reconsider his plans, saying the city was not safe.

“The levee system is still in a weakened condition,” Nagin said at a late-afternoon news briefing. “Any type of storm will put the east bank of the city in harm's way.”

Tropical Storm Rita, which is heading toward the Gulf of Mexico, could become a major hurricane, the National Weather Service said.

Earlier in the day, Nagin had criticized Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen for publicly imploring him to stop people from returning. He called Allen a “good man” but said, “There's only one mayor of New Orleans, and I'm it.”

Allen warned that the city's water was largely undrinkable and its hospitals not working. He said there was no evacuation plan in case new floods rose from another storm, so residents should stay out.

Bush urged the mayor to heed Allen and reconsider. Nagin and Allen met later in the day.

“He's got this dream about having a city up and running, and we share that dream,” Bush said. “But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans.”

Nagin planned to have one-third of the city's 460,000 people return over the next week and a half. On Monday, he ordered everyone out except for people in Algiers, a neighborhood that was the first to be reopened. Thousands of people returned there Monday, but Nagin warned them to be ready to leave.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco told coastal residents to be ready to go. “We will weather this storm as we have weathered Katrina,” she said.

Kelly Jordan, 27, who was dispensing pizzas from a trailer to emergency workers, said Nagin erred by reopening. “If he hadn't let people back in too soon, he wouldn't be having this problem,” she said. “He should have at least waited until the boil order (for water) was lifted.”

Mayor Suspends Flow Of People To New Orleans (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 19 - Under pressure from President Bush and with a new storm threatening the Gulf of Mexico, Mayor C. Ray Nagin suspended on Monday his controversial plan to allow people to return to this vulnerable city.

Instead Mr. Nagin called for a "mandatory" evacuation of many of the residents who have returned or never left.

"This is a different type of event," the mayor said of the storm, Rita. "Our levee systems are still in a very weak condition. Our pumping stations are not at full capacity, and any type of storm that heads this way and hits us will put the east bank of Orleans Parish in very significant harm's way. So I'm encouraging everyone to leave."

The mayor reversed himself hours after Mr. Bush had questioned whether it was safe for residents to return. The president reiterated warnings by Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, leader of the federal recovery effort, that the levee system was weakened, that the 911 emergency telephone system was not working, that the hospitals remained closed and that pollutants were in the air and water.

DOJ_NMG_0006831

"Admiral Allen speaks for the administration," Mr. Bush said on Monday in Washington. "We have made our position loud and clear. The mayor needs to hear, and so do the people of New Orleans, our objective.

"Listen, I went there and stood in Jackson Square to say we want this city to re-emerge. As I said, I can't imagine America without a vibrant New Orleans. It's just a matter of timing, and there's issues to be dealt with.

"If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break. And so therefore, we're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history."

The dispute over access reflected three weeks of tension, despite public reconciliations, between federal and local authorities over the response to Hurricane Katrina, which struck on Aug. 29.

Mr. Nagin said the new storm and sewer problems, but not political problems, had prompted the change.

"I understand the federal government was a little, uh, excited about the plan," he said. "They didn't feel as though conditions were quite right. But my thought has always been that if we have this many resources in the city working cooperatively, then we could correct just about any situation that was out there."

Forecasters said the new storm, which passed through the Bahamas on Monday, was expected to strengthen into a major hurricane in the Gulf of Mexico this week and potentially strike Texas, near the Louisiana border. The mayor asked people remaining in the city to leave or at least "be prepared" to evacuate as soon as Wednesday, depending on the storm track.

The terms of the evacuation were not fully clear. The mayor said the east bank of the city, which includes historic neighborhoods like the French Quarter, as well as those most devastated by flooding, was under the same mandatory evacuation he issued before Hurricane Katrina. But he said people in those areas would not yet be forced to leave.

Mr. Nagin and Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, said buses would be in place to remove people who needed transportation. In a statement after the mayor's announcement, the city said it that it had requested 200 buses and that it already had 150. If the storm threatens the city, the plan calls for residents to start boarding the buses 48 hours before the projected landfall from the Ernest M. Morial Convention Center downtown and from Behman Stadium in the Algiers section.

The governor said more details of the plan would be available on Tuesday.

In Algiers, a section of the city across the Mississippi that did not flood, Mr. Nagin asked residents to "be prepared to evacuate as early as Wednesday." He made that call hours after the city had officially begun letting residents return to that area, the first major neighborhood, with 60,000 people before the storm, to reopen.

Word of another potential evacuation was met with some acceptance, some resistance and much frustration in Algiers. After a long drive home from Pensacola, Fla., Roy McGinnis parked his Dodge Caravan on Magellan Street, home at last.

"I can't take another evacuation," Mr. Magellan said. "I have my grandchildren with me. I have my whole family with me. The first storm to hit, we haven't gotten over that yet. We've been on the road. We can't get back on the road.

Others were less defiant. Diane Craik, a real estate broker who had stayed in San Diego during Hurricane Katrina, made a half joke about moving to California for good.

"If they say evacuate, we're going," Ms. Craik said. "It's crazy. This is just stuff. I wouldn't stay for stuff."

The death toll in Louisiana from Hurricane Katrina rose to 737 on Monday, from 646 on Sunday.

By Monday afternoon, a police officer on Interstate 10 turned away all residents going into the city because of the new storm threat. Just contractors and the news media entered, said the officer, Gus James.

Some low-lying areas close to Lake Pontchartain remain under water.

"Three inches will cause some flooding," Col. Terry J. Ebbert, homeland security director of the city, said about more rain.

"The real problem," he said, citing the weakened levees, "is storm surge."

The Army Corps of Engineers has warned for days that the repaired levee system around the city, most of which is below sea level, would not protect the area from another hurricane or even a heavy storm.

"Initially when the storm struck, we thought they might be in a little better condition," a spokesman for the corps, Eugene A. Pawlik, said. "We had not had the opportunity to go out and do a full inspection of the levees."

Now, Mr. Pawlik said, it is clear that the city "can't take much of a hit."

After inspections, the corps has found that many areas of levees that had been "overtopped" have become significantly lower than their designed heights. Some levee stretches, including those along the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet canal, have been entirely eroded away, from original heights of 17 feet "to almost ground level," Mr. Pawlik said.

In the coming months, the corps plans to work through three phases. The first one to close the gaps in the levees, the second to rebuild the levees to their former height and the third to return the levees to their pre-storm structural strength.

The corps plans to have the third phase completed by next June, when the 2006 hurricane season begins. The repairs would restore the levees only to their strength before Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0006832

The mayor, asked whether the city could allow residents to safely return at a point in the near future, knowing that hurricane seasons does not end until Nov. 30, said the city would resume its phased in re-entries in some form after the threat from the new storm had passed.

He emphasized that the program was not intended for everyone in a city with no open schools and no public transportation.

"I think we can, as long as those are mobile residents that come back and as long as we're not encouraging children to come back and elderly," Mr. Nagin said. "I think we can do it. We need a very flexible citizen that comes back. And I think our citizens are smart enough to understand the difference."

A spokesman for the Louisiana Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparation, Mark Smith, said emergency personnel would also have to be evacuated if the new storm turned toward New Orleans. He said 16,000 National Guard and regular Army soldiers were in New Orleans, along with several thousand workers from contractors for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, FEMA employees and other relief workers would be affected.

Mayor Nagin has said the federal presence proves how safe the city is after widespread looting and violence in the first days after Hurricane Katrina. But he has also resisted federal intervention at times.

Noting that Admiral Allen had urged residents not to return, the mayor said: "The admiral's a good man. I respect him. But when he starts talking to the citizens of New Orleans, that's kind of out of his lane. There's only one mayor of New Orleans and I'm it."

Bush Questions Reopening Of New Orleans (AJC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Criticized for weeks for failing to react aggressively enough to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush on Monday put some muscle behind concerns that a new tropical storm could again deluge New Orleans and the people being allowed to return to the ruined city.

It worked. Six hours after Bush questioned New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's plan to bring as many as a third of the city's population back over the next week, Nagin reversed course and said he was suspending it.

Appearing at the White House with his homeland security council, Bush said he had "deep concern" about the possibility that Tropical Storm Rita, which was headed toward the Florida Keys, could move into the Gulf of Mexico and impact New Orleans.

"If it were to rain a lot, there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break," Bush said. Among the many other concerns are a lack of drinkable water and fears about contamination levels in the remaining floodwaters and the muck left behind in drained areas.

As Bush spoke, residents had begun trickling back into the city.

Besides the president's public words, White House chief of staff Andrew Card pressed the point on the phone with Nagin. And Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, head of the federal government's hurricane response, delivered federal officials' concerns to Nagin later Monday — after appearing on numerous TV shows to express dismay with the city plan.

"The mayor needs to hear him. So do the people of New Orleans," Bush said. "We're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history."

The president stressed that it's not a question of if residents return, but when — "it's just a matter of timing," he said. And the White House rebuffed any discussion of forcing the city to bend to Washington's wishes, preferring to let discussions take their course.

At a news conference in New Orleans, Nagin not only said the reopening was off, but that everyone who was in the city needed to evacuate because of Rita. "I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," he said.

Bush, however, continuing his effort to undo the political damage from the bumbled early response by keeping a heavy storm-related schedule, was heading into New Orleans. Making his fifth trip to the hurricane zone, the president was meeting Tuesday with local officials and business leaders in Gulfport, Miss., followed by a stop to a business trying to get back on its feet.

He planned to return south Friday and Saturday, traveling to Alabama, Texas and Arkansas. "The trip will be an opportunity for the president to personally thank some cities and states that have taken in large numbers of our fellow citizens affected by Katrina," said White House press secretary Scott McClellan.

Being away from Washington on Saturday will keep Bush far from an anti-war march that organizers hope will attract 100,000 people. The demonstration is expected to include Cindy Sheehan, the California mother of a soldier killed in Iraq.

Sheehan, who set up camp outside Bush's Texas ranch in August and drew thousands of fellow protesters, has been on a 25-state bus tour scheduled to end at the Washington march.

DOJ_NMG_0006833

On another front, 21 House Republicans sent a letter demanding that Bush find offsets in the budget to defray the massive cost of rebuilding the Gulf Coast. Conservatives, worried that the deficit will balloon, have been alarmed at the pace of spending with no talk of how to pay for it.

"We find this fiscal situation troublesome and urge your administration to follow the examples of previous administrations facing fiscal difficulties in time of emergencies and exercise spending restraint," said the Sept. 15 letter by Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., suggested dropping the Medicare prescription drug plan, which he has long opposed. "It was supposed to cost $400 billion dollars," he told CBS Evening News. "It's now up to $700 billion. We ought to cancel it, go back to square one."

Bush on Friday ruled out raising taxes to pay Katrina expenses and said other government spending must be cut. His aides have said, though, that no such cuts have yet been identified and that the hurricane relief effort will temporarily swell the deficit. Estimates of the final cost have reached $200 billion and more.

—

Associated Press writer Jonathan M. Katz in Washington contributed to this story.

—

On the Net:

White House: http://www.whitehouse.gov

New Orleans Suspends Reopening Of City (AJC/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Under pressure from President Bush and other top federal officials, the mayor suspended the reopening of large portions of the city Monday and instead ordered nearly everyone out because of the risk of a new round of flooding from a tropical storm on the way.

"If we are off, I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," Mayor Ray Nagin said.

The announcement came after repeated warnings from top federal officials — and the president himself — that New Orleans was not safe enough to reopen. Among other things, federal officials warned that Tropical Storm Rita could breach the city's temporarily patched-up levees and swamp the city all over again.

The official death toll from Hurricane Katrina reached 973 across the Gulf Coast, with the number in Louisiana alone rising by 90 to 736.

The mayor reversed course even as residents began trickling back to the first neighborhood opened as part of his plan, the less damaged Algiers section.

Nagin wanted to reopen some of the city's signature neighborhoods over the coming week to reassure the people of New Orleans that "there was a city to come back to."

But "now we have conditions that have changed. We have another hurricane that is approaching us," Nagin said. He warned that the city's pumping system was not yet running at full capacity and that the levees were still in a "very weak position."

The mayor ordered residents who circumvented checkpoints and slipped back into still-closed parts of the city, including the French Quarter, to leave immediately.

Nagin also urged everyone already settled back into Algiers to be ready to evacuate as early as Wednesday. The city requested 200 buses to help if necessary.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, in a televised address Monday, also urged residents of coastal southwest Louisiana to be prepared to leave. More evacuees would strain the shelters in Texas, she said, so she urged people to head for central and northern Louisiana instead.

"We will pray that Rita will not devastate Louisiana, but today we do not know the answer to that question," Blanco said.

Tropical Storm Rita was headed toward the Florida Keys and was expected to become a hurricane, cross the Gulf of Mexico and reach Texas or Mexico by the weekend. But forecasters said it could veer toward Louisiana and New Orleans' weakened levees.

"We're watching Tropical Storm Rita's projected path and, depending on its strength and how much rain falls, everything could change," said Col. Duane Gapinski, of the Army Corps of Engineers task force draining New Orleans and repairing levees.

The dispute over the mayor's plan to quickly reopen New Orleans and bring back about 180,000 of the city's half-million inhabitants was just the latest example of the lack of federal-local coordination that has marked the disaster almost from the start.

DOJ_NMG_0006834

Nagin saw a quick reopening as a way to get the storm-battered city back in the business of luring tourists. But federal officials warned it would be premature, pointing out much of the area does not yet have full electricity, drinkable water, 911 service or working hospitals.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who heads the federal recovery effort in the region, went on one news show after another over the weekend to warn that city services may not be able to handle an influx of people.

Allen said repeatedly that he intended to have a frank discussion with Nagin about his concerns on Monday, but the two didn't meet until after Nagin held a news conference to announce he was suspending re-entry to the city, a mayor's spokeswoman said.

Nagin had spent the weekend in Dallas, where he moved his family and has enrolled his daughter in school, and he missed an appointment with Allen because his flight home was delayed, she said.

Earlier, a clearly agitated Nagin had snapped that Allen had apparently made himself "the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

Allen tried unsuccessfully to reach the mayor by cell phone over the weekend, a Coast Guard spokesman. President Bush said White House chief of staff Andrew Card had also been pressing Nagin to pull back on the plan.

With the approach of Rita, Bush added his own voice to the mix, saying he had "deep concern" about the possibility that New Orleans' levees could be breached again.

In addition, Bush said there are significant environmental concerns. New Orleans still lacks safe drinking water, and there are fears about the contamination in the remaining floodwaters and the muck left behind in drained areas of the city.

"The mayor — you know, he's got this dream about having a city up and running, and we share that dream," the president said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

About 20 percent of the city is still flooded, down from a high of about 80 percent after Katrina, and the water was expected to be pumped out by Sept. 30.

But officials with the Army Corps of Engineers said the repairs to the levees breached by Katrina are not yet strong enough to prevent flooding in a moderate storm, much less another hurricane. Brig. Gen. Robert Crear said Monday they hope to have the levees capable of handling a Category 3 storm by June, the start of hurricane season.

Nagin did not give any specifics about how he plans to enforce the renewed evacuation order.

In the raucous French Quarter, about a half-mile from where Nagin made his announcement, businesses were getting up and running, and bars were serving cold beers to National Guardsmen and passers-by.

Del Juneau, owner of a Bourbon Street lingerie shop, said it would be premature to order an evacuation based on the storm nearing Florida. "Where are you going to go? What are you going to do?" he said. "I'm not going anywhere."

Down the street at the Famous Door, bartender C.B. Dover, said: "If we have a forced evacuation, we'll go. If it's not forced, we're not going anywhere." Dover said the mayor "has been overreacting the whole time. ... He's reacting emotionally, and you can't do that."

Earlier in the day, as residents began streaming in at the mayor's invitation, cars were backed for two hours at an Interstate 10 checkpoint into the city. Tractor-trailers, emergency vehicles and National Guard trucks shared the highway with cars towing trailers full of hurricane gear and pickup trucks with their beds loaded with water, cleaning materials and coolers.

It was clear that at least some of the traffic was headed to sections of the city that had not yet officially opened.

Algiers, a neighborhood of 57,000 just across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter, is home to many of the companies that make floats for Mardi Gras parades. Unlike much of the rest of the city, it saw little damage from Hurricane Katrina three weeks ago and has electricity and drinkable water.

"Obviously we need to get businesses up and running any way we can," said Barry Kern, whose float businesses is stocked to the rafters with oversized imaginary creatures. "If we don't start somewhere, where do we start?"

Elsewhere across the city, where the damage was more severe, much of the sentiment seemed to be with the mayor and his attempts to reopen the city quickly.

"Send Bush here and we'll make him a po' boy and tell him to leave us alone," Kathleen Horn said as she cleaned up the debris piled in front of Slim Goodies Diner on Magazine Street in Uptown.

New Storm Halts Reopening Of Big Easy (WT/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- The mayor yesterday suspended residents' re-entry into the city and ordered nearly everyone out, fearing a new round of flooding from an incoming tropical storm, just as about 90 percent of floodwaters had been pumped out.

DOJ_NMG_0006835

"If we are off, I'd rather err on the side of conservatism to make sure we have everyone out," said Mayor C. Ray Nagin, who was implementing a plan to open large parts of city, including the French Quarter, over the objections of federal officials.

President Bush and other top federal officials yesterday said New Orleans was not safe to reopen, warning that, among other things, Tropical Storm Rita could breach the city's temporarily patched-up levees and swamp the city all over again.

News of Mr. Nagin's reversal came as the death toll from Hurricane Katrina reached 973 across the Gulf Coast, with an increase in Louisiana by 90 to 736, and as U.S. Army Corps of Engineers officials predicted that they would have the floodwaters removed from the city by Sept. 30 -- about five months faster than initial estimates.

"We have another hurricane that is approaching us," Mr. Nagin said, warning that the city's pumping system was not running at full capacity and that the levees were still in a "very weak position."

He ordered residents who circumvented checkpoints and slipped back into the still officially closed parts of the city to leave immediately. Those areas include the historic French Quarter, the Garden District, Uptown and the central business district.

Mr. Nagin also urged everyone already settled back into Algiers to be ready to evacuate as early as tomorrow. The city requested 200 buses to help if necessary.

Tropical Storm Rita was headed toward the Florida Keys and was expected to become a hurricane, cross the Gulf of Mexico and reach Texas or Mexico by the weekend. But forecasters said it could also veer toward Louisiana.

"We're watching Tropical Storm Rita's projected path and, depending on its strength and how much rain falls, everything could change. Residents moving into the area may have to evacuate again," said Col. Duane Gapinski, commander of the Army Corps of Engineers task force that is draining New Orleans and repairing the levees.

Under the mayor's plan, Algiers opened yesterday, and Uptown, the Garden District and the French Quarter were supposed to reopen one ZIP code at a time between Wednesday and next Monday, bringing about 180,000 of New Orleans' half-million inhabitants back.

The dispute over reopening large parts of the city was just the latest example of the lack of federal-local coordination that has marked the disaster practically from the start.

Mr. Nagin saw a quick reopening as a way to get the storm-battered city back in the business of luring tourists. But federal officials warned that such a move could be a few weeks premature, pointing out much of the area does not have full electricity, drinkable water, 911 service or working hospitals.

With the approach of Rita, Mr. Bush added his voice, saying he had "deep concern" about the possibility that New Orleans' levees could be breached again.

Mr. Bush said White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. had been pressing the matter with Mr. Nagin. The concerns were also echoed by the top federal official in charge in New Orleans, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, who appeared on one news show after another to warn that city services might not be able to handle the influx of people.

Before reversing course yesterday, a clearly agitated Mr. Nagin snapped that Adm. Allen had apparently made himself "the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

It was not known whether Mr. Nagin met with Adm. Allen, who said this weekend that he intended to have a frank discussion with the mayor yesterday.

About 13 percent of the city is still flooded, down from a high of about 80 percent after Katrina hit, a top Army Corps of Engineers official told the Los Angeles Times.

But officials said the repairs to the levees breached by Katrina are not strong enough to prevent flooding in a moderate storm, much less another hurricane.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, in a televised address yesterday, also urged residents of coastal southwestern Louisiana to be prepared to leave. More evacuees would strain the shelters in Texas, she said, so she urged people to head for central and northern Louisiana instead.

"We will pray that Rita will not devastate Louisiana, but today we do not know the answer to that question," she said.

In the raucous French Quarter, about a half-mile from where Mr. Nagin made his announcement, businesses were getting up and running and were serving cold beers to National Guardsmen and passers-by.

Del Juneau, owner of a Bourbon Street lingerie shop, said it would be premature to order an evacuation based on the storm nearing Florida.

"Where are you going to go? What are you going to do?" he said. "I'm not going anywhere."

Reopening Of Parts Of New Orleans Delayed (KRT)

By Gary Estwick, Susannah A. Nesmith And Eric Frazier
Knight Ridder, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006836

NEW ORLEANS - Facing the threat of another powerful storm and besieged by questions from President Bush and others, Mayor Ray Nagin on Monday halted the reopening of large sections of the city.

And anyone who is holding out on the city's east bank - the main part of the city - should evacuate, he said.

"I am urging and encouraging everyone who knows of someone who may be at their homes somewhere in Orleans Parish ... to call them and encourage them to leave the city," Nagin said.

Within about an hour of his announcement, security tightened in several parts of the city.

Flooding from Tropical Storm Rita, which is expected to develop into a hurricane, is possible because the city's levees are weak and its pumping stations are not operating at capacity, Nagin said.

He warned that residents he had invited back Monday to neighborhoods in the Algiers section of the city, across the Mississippi River from the city's east bank, might have to turn around and leave Wednesday.

Although most forecasts project Rita will hit Texas as a major hurricane, Nagin said some scenarios show it crashing into the Louisiana coast.

The Army Corps of Engineers said Monday that if Rita veers toward New Orleans, heavy rainfall could flood the northern and some central parts of the city with two to four feet of water.

The developments came on a day when the death toll from Hurricane Katrina rose to 973, with 90 more bodies reported in Louisiana.

Nagin made his decision after a weekend of questions about the city's readiness, raised first by the federal commander of relief efforts in New Orleans, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, and underscored on Monday by Bush.

"There is deep concern about this storm causing more flooding in New Orleans," Bush said.

Earlier in the day, Nagin had defended his plan to repopulate the city.

"The admiral is a good man. I respect him. But when he starts talking for the citizens of New Orleans, he's kind of out of his range," Nagin said. "There is only one mayor of New Orleans, and I'm it."

Nagin said the hurricane was not providing him an excuse to follow the advice of federal officials, and pledged to resume his plan as soon as Rita's danger has passed.

Forced evacuations on the east bank are being considered. Residents are not supposed to be living in that area now, but have not been forcibly removed. The city cannot estimate the number of people there now, but at least several hundred are living there.

Nagin's repopulation plan had barely begun, and the return of residents to Algiers on Monday was more a trickle than a stampede.

The mayor last week announced plans to reopen the city's Garden District later this week, followed by the historic French Quarter, but backed off a specific timetable when federal officials cautioned that he was moving too quickly.

Earlier Monday, a number of state officials also urged caution.

Bill Doran, chief of operations for the Louisiana Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, said levees damaged by Hurricane Katrina could fail if faced with any type of tropical storm or unusual high tide. Some of the major evacuation routes used as Hurricane Katrina approached are now unusable, Doran said.

"We want to do it," he said of Nagin's repopulation plan, "but not in a hasty method that would put those people in harm's way."

Should Rita threaten the area, there would be far fewer people to evacuate because so many are still outside New Orleans. But there are more than 16,000 National Guard troops and other rescue workers in the area, said Mark Smith, a spokesman for the state homeland security office. They would have to be evacuated, and the state is already making plans to do so if Rita approaches.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco urged residents in southwestern Louisiana to begin making preparations to leave if necessary. She said FEMA has buses to help those who can't evacuate on their own, and a task force is arranging shelters.

"We are in a very dangerous place," she said. "Because we do not know where this hurricane will end up, we are taking Rita very, very seriously."

A few people trickled back on Monday to Algiers, which escaped the city's most serious damage. Some people never left, and others had managed to get in shortly after Katrina passed.

Over the past week, they have been sustaining the rest of the city.

"We're like ground zero for the National Guard and Immigration dirty clothes," said Jim Ritchie, owner of the Spin Stop.

Algiers is where rescue workers, soldiers and journalists can get fresh laundry, gas, cigarettes, even a cold Coke or beer.

At a Red Cross assistance center set up at a high school, volunteers were having trouble giving away hot meals. There just wasn't much need in Algiers.

DOJ_NMG_0006837

"I would welcome anybody. We've got a ton of food and I don't want it to go bad," said volunteer Charles Way of New Jersey. The center was the first to open anywhere in the city of New Orleans.

Pamela Gregory was glad to get the help. She had stayed through the storm, but found that neighboring Jefferson Parish wouldn't let her in to buy supplies.

"I'm so hungry," she said, laughing. "I've lost weight since this thing happened. A co-worker brought us in some supplies. She lives in Jefferson Parish so they'll let her in. But we've been getting pretty low around here."

The mayor's hope that the city would start returning Monday, beginning with Algiers, seemed dashed on this neighborhood's deserted streets.

Timothy Allen came Monday to gather his belongings, but he was headed back to Texas.

"Even though the house is OK, I'm a physician at Baptist Hospital and it's closed," he explained, a bit melancholy to be leaving a neighborhood his three little children loved. "This is a great neighborhood. We walk to the park, and I take the ferry over to the aquarium with my daughter. But because of the situation in the rest of the city, we can't come back for now."

New Orleans Mayor Halts Return Of City's Residents (LAT)

By Scott Gold, Susannah Rosenblatt And Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Facing pressure from Washington and with another storm system on the way, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin halted his campaign to repopulate the city Monday and ordered the few residents and business owners who had returned to leave again.

Three weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast, flooding New Orleans, Tropical Storm Rita was expected to bear down Tuesday on the Florida Keys -- where all 80,000 residents have been told to evacuate. Rita then is likely to move over the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico, where officials said it could strengthen into a Category 3 hurricane.

Rita could make landfall on the Gulf Coast as early as Thursday, although Friday or Saturday is more likely.

According to government forecasts Monday night, the storm could land anywhere from northern Mexico to Mississippi. But Nagin said his advisers had determined Rita most likely would strike near the island community of Galveston, Texas -- where authorities were planning evacuations starting Tuesday afternoon -- or pass to the west of New Orleans.

If Rita makes landfall anywhere near New Orleans and its damaged levee system, it could send water cascading into a city just starting to dry out after Katrina.

Nagin said a three-foot storm surge, which can be kicked up by even a moderate tropical storm, would leave as much as four feet of water in New Orleans. Rita was expected to rake the Keys with an eight-foot storm surge; authorities said that even if Rita's eye strikes in Texas, it could still send a three-foot surge to New Orleans.

"I'd rather err on the side of conservatism," Nagin said in ordering residents back out of the city. "Today there is a significant threat of this thing turning north. ... Any type of storm that heads this way and hits us will put Orleans Parish in a very vulnerable position."

Nagin said he considers the threat from Rita equal to that posed by Katrina, but called it "a different event" because there were not a significant number of people left in the city.

As Katrina approached New Orleans, authorities had issued a mandatory evacuation. And with the city under water after the storm, they threatened to use force to remove stragglers from their homes. But many refused to leave, and the city backed down. Residents since have trickled back to the city despite roadblocks, a collapsed infrastructure and the threat of toxic sludge.

Last weekend, Nagin allowed some business owners to return. On Monday, he opened the Algiers section -- across the Mississippi River from the central business district -- to residents, and thousands of cars streamed back into the city. Then the mayor said everyone needed to be out again by Wednesday.

"I am hopeful that people have seen the threat of Katrina and that they understand the threat," he said.

Asked whether he expected that some people would refuse to leave, Nagin said: "We're all adults."

"All I can do is tell you exactly what I'm seeing," he said. "If anybody wants to sit this out ... God bless them."

Meanwhile, energy prices skyrocketed in New York futures trading Monday over worries that Rita would deliver another blow to the key Gulf Coast oil and natural gas production region.

Oil futures jumped $4.39 to close at $67.39 a barrel. Natural gas surged to a record $12.663 per million British thermal units, up $1.519.

As oil companies began evacuating workers from production platforms and drilling rigs in the Gulf on Monday, experts predicted the recent decline in retail gasoline prices could come to a halt.

Nagin had clashed with federal officials in recent days over his proposal to bring 180,000 residents back into the city by the end of the month.

DOJ_NMG_0006838

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, head of the federal government's relief effort, had encouraged Nagin to slow down -- citing lingering environmental threats and lack of a potable water, a 911 system and operable sewer pipes, among other problems.

While calling Allen "a good man," Nagin said that he was only attempting to repopulate the safest portions of the city; he reminded Allen that "there is only one mayor of New Orleans."

President Bush jumped into the debate Monday, citing a "deep concern" about Rita. Bush said he disagreed with Nagin's efforts to allow residents to return to New Orleans, but called it "just a matter of timing."

"The mayor has got this dream about having a city up and running. And we share that dream," Bush said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. spoke with Nagin by telephone Monday before the mayor announced he was halting the effort to bring residents back.

Authorities were staging buses outside New Orleans Monday night that could be used to ferry residents to safety. Nagin said he planned to amass 200 buses, and that evacuations would begin 48 hours before projected landfall. Citizens would be loaded onto buses at the New Orleans Convention Center along the Mississippi River and at Behrman Stadium in Algiers.

Another 350 buses also are ready west of New Orleans to begin evacuations at shelters housing thousands of people who fled Katrina.

New Orleans Mayor Reverses Plan To Reopen Parts Of The City (WSJ)

By Rick Brooks And Corey Dade

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, already under criticism from federal officials and the White House for reopening parts of the city too early, reversed his plans and ordered those returning to their homes and businesses to leave before the area is threatened by another major storm later this week.

Yesterday's announcement by the mayor was a major setback in efforts to bring life back to New Orleans, about 15% of which still is underwater three weeks after Katrina barreled past the city. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers warned that Rita, which was expected to reach hurricane strength last night in the Bahamas and is expected today to approach the Florida Keys before entering the Gulf of Mexico, could inundate some areas with as much as four feet of additional rain and floodwaters.

While breaches of levees along three canals in New Orleans have been at least temporarily closed, more than a dozen breaches remain in neighboring St. Bernard Parish. Army Corps officials said some levees that weren't breached during the storm were nonetheless damaged by Katrina so badly that they could be defenseless against another storm surge. If Rita approached New Orleans, metal pilings would be used to attempt to block water from Lake Pontchartrain from flowing into two canals that flooded large parts of the city after Katrina struck. There is no guarantee of how well that would work.

Mr. Nagin denied that criticism from the White House had anything to do with his reversal. "All I can tell you is exactly what I'm seeing," he said at a news conference. "If anybody wants to sit this storm out with rain-soaked levee systems ... then God bless 'em."

The National Hurricane Center said Rita could make landfall anywhere from southern Texas to the Louisiana-Mississippi border. Galveston, Texas, officials yesterday called for a voluntary evacuation beginning today if Rita's storm track remains unchanged. Officials said they would consider calling for a mandatory evacuation by tomorrow.

In 1900, an estimated 8,000 residents of Galveston and surrounding towns died from a storm that remains the most deadly to hit the mainland U.S. The island has no coastal marshes or other natural barriers.

It isn't clear how many residents and business owners were trying to return to New Orleans. Yesterday, cars and trucks along Interstate 10 were gridlocked for more than a mile as authorities at a checkpoint allowed only one vehicle to pass at a time. Some frustrated motorists turned into the grassy median and went back the way they came.

United Parcel Service Inc. made its first deliveries in the city's central business district, sending four trucks, but found few recipients. "Nothing but soldiers and cops," said UPS driver Ricky Folse, 35 years old, his eyes darting out both sides of the truck as he looked for regular customers along Canal Street.

At one stop, David Munn, owner of Orleans Optical, emerged from his store dripping sweat and wearing a pair of latex gloves and black rubber boots up to his knees. "Who are you going to sell to?" asked Mr. Munn, who had pulled enough debris from his store to make a three-foot-high pile outside. He took the package from Mr. Folse, but didn't open it.

Officials At All Levels Butt Heads Over Hurricane Relief Operations (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006839

The latest in a long line of disputes among local, state and federal officials over Hurricane Katrina was defused yesterday when New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin called off reopening the city, although he cited another storm for his capitulation rather than federal officials' litany of concerns.

The various levels of government have disagreed over when to call in federal troops and whether the entire operation should be federalized. They also have clashed over when and how to evacuate New Orleans and when to let residents return.

"We share the goal of the mayor, but we have got concerns," Mr. Bush said early yesterday, when Mr. Nagin still was allowing residents to return.

"The mayor has got this dream about having a city up and running -- and we share that dream," Mr. Bush said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

The obstacles include the possibility of additional flooding from Tropical Storm Rita, which was heading toward the Gulf of Mexico yesterday, and the lack of electricity, drinking water and sewage facilities. Early yesterday, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen said it might be as much as a week before residents could return safely.

"We just think that conditions need to be set so when people come back in, they can operate safely, and, moreover, with the weakened levee system, that there's a plan to evacuate whatever number of people are allowed back in the city," he told CNN.

"When those conditions are met and the risk has been reduced, then the population comes in," he added. "That could be two days, five days, one week."

Mr. Nagin initially criticized the remarks and insisted that up to 180,000 people -- about a third of the city's population -- be allowed to return during the next 10 days.

"I'm a little surprised the admiral came out publicly on this," Mr. Nagin told Fox News Channel in the morning. "Maybe since I've been away a day or two, maybe he's the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

Mr. Nagin, who spent the weekend in Dallas, said: "If he's suggesting I'm pushing a little hard, I am. The citizens of New Orleans deserve the opportunity to see what they have left and what they can salvage."

Later in the day, however, Mr. Nagin began reassessing the timing of his plan because of Tropical Storm Rita and other "external factors," said Nagin spokeswoman Sally Foreman.

By the end of the day, the mayor reversed himself, agreeing with Mr. Bush and Adm. Allen that it was too soon and too unsafe for residents to return.

The rift yesterday was the latest in a series of high-profile disagreements among federal, state and local officials about how to handle the hurricane and the subsequent flooding of New Orleans.

The discord began Aug. 27, when Mr. Bush asked Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco to order an evacuation of New Orleans. Mrs. Blanco did not issue the order until Aug. 28, a day before Hurricane Katrina made landfall.

Mrs. Blanco also neglected to ask the president for federal troops when she wrote him a letter on Aug. 27 and when she spoke with him on Aug. 29. She had not made the request even on Aug. 31, when she gave a series of television interviews in Baton Rouge.

"I really need to call for the military," she told her press secretary between interviews. "And I should have started that in the first call."

Later that day, she asked the White House for troops, which were dispatched to assist Louisiana National Guard forces.

Mrs. Blanco hesitated again when she met Sept. 2 with Mr. Bush, who offered to have the federal government take over the chaotic evacuation. Mrs. Blanco said she needed 24 hours to make a decision and ultimately rejected the federal offer.

Mr. Nagin later told CNN that Mrs. Blanco and Mr. Bush needed to "get in sync." But within days, Mr. Nagin and Mrs. Blanco were feuding with each other over whether New Orleans residents should be ordered to leave their homes.

"My mandatory evacuation is still in effect," Mr. Nagin said Sept. 6.

But Mrs. Blanco refused to enforce the order, saying she needed more time for scientists to test the toxicity of floodwaters, even though health officials were warning that the waters were very dangerous.

"The mayor certainly has ordered that, but the governor -- and that would be me -- will have to enforce it or implement it," Mrs. Blanco said Sept. 7.

Mr. Bush will make more trips to the storm-hit areas this week, meeting today with Mississippi business owners and civic leaders in Gulfport and visiting a recovering business in New Orleans.

On Friday and Saturday, he will travel to Alabama, Texas and Arkansas, which have absorbed thousands of refugees from the harder-hit neighboring states.

"The trip will be an opportunity for the president to personally thank some cities and states that have taken in large numbers of our fellow citizens affected by Katrina," White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0006840

Weary, Wary Residents Trek Back Into The City (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Oren Dorell

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The prospect of another fierce storm hitting wasn't going to stop Malcolm Poree from spending the first night in his home since Hurricane Katrina struck more than three weeks ago.

Poree, 38, was among hundreds of residents of the city's Algiers section who returned to their homes Monday only to be told by Mayor Ray Nagin to be prepared to evacuate again as early as Wednesday because of Tropical Storm Rita.

Poree figured another storm would do more damage to his embroidering business than to his home, which survived Katrina virtually unscathed.

"Being self-employed, I can't take much more of not having a city to sell to," Poree said.

As for his safety, Poree said he and his wife have a car and a minivan and are ready to leave the city again with sons Malcolm, 9, and Marcus, 6.

"If we have an emergency, we know our way around," Poree said.

The Algiers area, across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter and downtown, never flooded during Katrina and now has electricity and water service to most homes. Nagin announced last week that Algiers residents could begin returning Monday. However, hundreds ignored pre-storm evacuation orders and never left or have already returned.

Nagin said Monday afternoon that the potential for Rita to hit the area was enough to suspend plans to reopen other high and dry parts of the city, including the French Quarter and Garden District.

For some, the mayor's abrupt reversal was another disheartening example of what they said was a disorganized and inept local response to Katrina.

Just down the street from Poree, David Gautreaux and his wife, Dolly, rode out Katrina but plan to move to Dallas or Houston at the first opportunity.

"We're ashamed to be citizens of this city," Gautreaux said. "There's no leadership. The mayor blamed the president. The governor blamed the president. This is in God's hands, not the president's."

Many other Algiers residents said they were relieved to be back home and were committed to remain as their city rebuilds. "Even though this hurricane happened to New Orleans, I'm coming back to stay. It's my home, and I'm not going to leave," said Cinder Anderson, 34.

Anderson and her family left New Orleans for Houston shortly before Katrina hit. She enrolled her children, 12-year-old Miquel and 8-year-old Michael, in schools there.

Soon, everyone was homesick.

"My son cried every day he had to go to school there," Anderson said. "He wanted to come home. I cried every day, too."

Their trip back was nerve-racking. They wondered: Had the storm thrown the huge pine tree in their front yard into their house?

"When I came in, I drove up slow. I had my hand over my heart," Anderson said. "I saw the tree didn't fall on the house, and I said, 'Thank you, God.' "

Like many of her neighbors, Anderson left her refrigerator at the side of the road to be picked up by cleanup crews. Weeks without electricity left the inside so contaminated by rotting food that even a scrubbing with bleach couldn't eliminate the stench, Anderson said.

Anderson and her husband, Elbert Bender, said they're relying on the military and aid groups for food and bottled water.

The closest place to buy food was the convenience store at the Spur Gas Station, which has been open since Saturday.

Owner Ibrahim Attamari did a brisk business Monday in liquor, beer, gasoline and cigarettes. The shelves were stocked with motor oil, candy and toiletries.

Attamari said he has been receiving deliveries and has enough gasoline to last a week, but staying open has been hard. "I have 13 employees; none of them are here," he said.

Schools are closed.

About a half-mile from Anderson's brick house is St. Andrew the Apostle Catholic Church, which has a school for about 800 students in pre-kindergarten through eighth grade. Principal Sybil Skansi said she's trying to prepare her school to reopen by Oct. 3.

"The school is one of those things that has to be here for people to come back," she said.

Anderson's son normally attends the public Alice Harte Elementary School adjacent to the church; her daughter would attend the Karr Junior High School behind their house. New Orleans school officials say they hope to have some schools in Algiers open by Nov. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0006841

Poree also was waiting for Harte Elementary to open so his sons could return home. He had another reason to hope for the schools to reopen as soon as possible: The schools are the best customers for his embroidery business, which personalizes clothing such as jackets and ball caps.

"My customer base is New Orleans," Poree said. "Since there's no New Orleans, I have no business."

Rita Rages Toward Florida Keys (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 20, 2005

MIAMI — Tropical Storm Rita was expected to become a hurricane and slam the Florida Keys today, then gather strength and threaten the entire Gulf Coast.

On Monday, thousands of people jammed the one highway leading out of the Keys, a string of low-lying islands that were under a mandatory evacuation order.

Rita was still a tropical storm late Monday with winds of 70 mph, but the National Weather Service predicted it would be a Category 2 hurricane today with winds of 100 mph as it closed in on the Keys.

After it passes over the Keys and heads into the Gulf of Mexico it is expected to become a Category 3 hurricane, meaning one with winds of 111 to 130 mph, the National Hurricane Center said. Rita's track has it landing anywhere from the Texas-Mexico border to Louisiana by the weekend, the center said.

Jennifer Pralgo, a meteorologist with the National Hurricane Center, said New Orleans isn't the likely target but isn't in the clear. The city hit by Katrina last month could still get heavy rain and high winds.

"Everybody on the Gulf Coast should pay attention to this," she said. "They're like ping-pong balls in the Gulf. They can bounce around, but they're going to land."

Rita's starting path is similar to Katrina's. Both sprang to life near the Bahamas, headed for South Florida and set a course for the Gulf. Strengthened by the Gulf's warm waters, Katrina was a Category 4 hurricane when it made landfall.

On the Keys, where 78,000 people live, hurricane-force winds are expected to thrash the islands overnight. Rain totals of 15 inches are possible.

A storm surge (a rise in the sea level) of as much as 9 feet is forecast. At that height, the sea could swallow the one road out of the Keys.

Holly Elomina, 33, kept close watch on the forecast as she shuttered her home on Big Coppitt Key on Monday. She has four children — ages 3 months to 16 years — and was deciding whether to leave.

"That storm surge is what scares me," Elomina said.

The last Category 2 storm to hit Key West was Hurricane Georges in 1998. That storm damaged hundreds of homes and closed the island to tourists for weeks.

In Miami-Dade County, home to more than 2.2 million people, shopkeepers and residents braced for hurricane-force winds today. Schools were ordered closed and shelters opened. Residents in mobile homes and those in low-lying areas were told to evacuate. Tourists on Miami Beach were asked to leave.

On South Beach, a stretch of trendy, art deco hotels, restaurants and shops, workers screwed corrugated metal shutters over windows.

Joe Monteiro, 35, executive chef at the Avalon Hotel, was unconcerned.

"This happens every year," he said. "People get all freaked out about it."

On the beach, a 25 mph wind whipped waves into a froth but did not chase away all swimmers. Nor did a red flag warning of hazardous conditions.

Lifeguard Vlad Sazonov, who hoisted the flag, said it was foolish to underestimate the storm.

"We had really bad preparations for Katrina," said Sazonov, 39. "People regret that now. All I can say is, 'God save us all.' "

Florida Keys Are Ordered Evacuated As Rita Nears (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Residents of the Florida Keys were ordered to evacuate yesterday as Tropical Storm Rita approached hurricane strength on a path similar to that of Katrina, which devastated the Gulf Coast three weeks ago, and the mayor of New Orleans suspended a plan to start repopulating his flood-ravaged city.

With Rita forecast to become a Category 1 hurricane last evening and to reach Category 2 strength today, tourists streamed out of the Keys, and residents boarded up homes and shops.

DOJ_NMG_0006842

But a potentially greater threat looms later in the week, when Rita is projected to intensify over the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico, just as Katrina did late last month before slamming ashore about 60 miles southeast of New Orleans. On its current path, meteorologists said, Rita could hit the Texas coast by the weekend, bringing hurricane-force winds and torrential rains to an area that houses thousands of evacuees from flooded New Orleans.

In view of the new storm, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin announced he was calling off his plan to allow displaced residents to return, one neighborhood at a time. (See story, A1.)

Rita is "not an exact reprise" of Katrina, "but it's probably pretty close," said Frank Lepore, a spokesman for the National Hurricane Center in Miami. "It's got similar characteristics, except it's just a little lower in latitude. The issue is what happens when it gets out over the very warm waters of the central Gulf."

The storm was packing winds of 70 mph last night and was projected to hit Key West about 6 p.m. today with winds around 105 mph, making it a Category 2 hurricane, Lepore said.

As Rita gathered strength, the hurricane center issued a hurricane warning for the southern tip of the Florida peninsula and for all of the Florida Keys. It said that at 11 p.m. Eastern time, Rita was 270 miles east-southeast of Key West and was moving west-northwest at 14 mph.

The hurricane center said the Keys could be hit with storm surge flooding of six to nine feet above normal tide levels, "along with large and dangerous battering waves."

A mandatory evacuation order issued by Monroe County, Fla., covered about 80,000 people in the Keys, including 25,000 residents of Key West. Buses were sent to Key West High School to evacuate people who needed help to leave, and a military C-130 transport plane was dispatched to Key West Hospital to evacuate patients there. In addition, about 134,000 Miami-Dade County residents who live in coastal areas were under a voluntary evacuation order.

A voluntary evacuation was set to start today in Galveston, Tex., where officials said residents who could not leave on their own could take buses -- and their caged pets -- to shelters starting tomorrow.

President Bush, after a meeting with homeland security officials to discuss Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, suggested that in view of Rita's approach, it would be a mistake for evacuees to return to New Orleans.

Rita "now looks like it's going to head out into the Gulf, and could track Katrina, or it could head further to the west," Bush told reporters. "But, nevertheless, there is deep concern about this storm causing more flooding in New Orleans."

Nagin "has got this dream about having a city up and running, and we share that dream," Bush said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

He said that if Rita brought heavy rains, "there is concern from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levees might break. And so, therefore, we're cautious about encouraging people to return at this moment of history."

According to Lepore, a five-day projection shows Rita reaching Category 3 strength in the middle of the Gulf, with sustained winds of about 115 mph and gusts up to 130 mph. Although its path is difficult to predict at this point, the latest projection has Rita heading toward Houston, a major oil industry center that is now also home to thousands of Katrina evacuees.

One concern is that Rita will hit "the general area where all these folks from New Orleans have been evacuated," Lepore said. "And there is enough hardship in that area as it is without throwing another hurricane at them."

As Its Coffers Swell, Red Cross Is Criticized On Gulf Coast Response (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom And Campbell Robertson

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

In New Orleans and the coastal flood plains of Mississippi, many people are complaining that the American Red Cross was missing in their worst hours of need and are worried that its billowing relief fund may bypass them entirely.

The organization did not open shelters in flood-prone areas and was therefore unable to provide food and other necessities to people closest to the coast ravaged by Hurricane Katrina.

"The Red Cross has been my biggest disappointment," said Tim Kellar, the administrator of Hancock County, Miss. "I held it in such high esteem until we were in the time of need. It was nonexistent."

Even some volunteers are disgusted. "I will never, ever wear the Red Cross vest again," said Betty Brunner, who started volunteering in 1969 when Hurricane Camille destroyed her house but quit last week over the organization's response in Hancock County.

Two days after Hurricane Katrina struck, the Red Cross had only one shelter in the county, and it was far from some of the most populated coastal towns. It had no shelter in New Orleans.

"It's purely a safety issue," said Armand T. Mascelli, vice president for response operations at the Red Cross. "People expect a Red Cross shelter to be safe, not to be at risk of flooding." Frustration over the early absence of the Red Cross is now compounded by the realization that the organization has collected the bulk of public contributions, money that will be spent on emergency rescue and relief, not long-term assistance, and may never get to the coastal areas.

DOJ_NMG_0006843

The organization has garnered almost three-quarters of the $1 billion that Americans have donated to help the hurricane victims, with endorsements from President Bush, corporate America and many nonprofit organizations. Its duty, mandated by Congress, is to provide immediate assistance, a need that is rapidly diminishing as victims leave shelters.

Some people are asking whether the Red Cross can use all its money effectively as its role winds down. "Once we're out of the relief phase, what capacity does the Red Cross have to rebuild communities?" asked George Penick, president of the Foundation of the Mid South. "That's not their core competence."

The Red Cross says it will need every penny, and it just raised its estimated costs for Hurricane Katrina to $2 billion from $1.5 billion. "The scope of this is just so huge," said Joe Becker, the Red Cross senior vice president for preparedness and response. "If you took New Orleans out of the equation, Mississippi and Alabama would be a bigger job than we tackled in all four of the storms that hit Florida last year."

But time and again in past disasters, the Red Cross has raised more money than it has needed for relief. It has also been less than clear in the past about where its money goes, and it has rarely shared its money with other organizations that tackle long-term needs of victims.

So, at a meeting of charity officials last week in Jackson, Miss., Mr. Penick asked whether the Red Cross would share its wealth.

"Especially in rural areas and small towns, the Red Cross was either absent or overwhelmed," Mr. Penick said. "You had churches and nonprofit groups taking care of the evacuees in any way they could with whatever money they could scrape together."

Mr. Penick said that when he asked a Red Cross representative at the meeting whether it would reimburse these organizations, "he said he didn't know."

Responding to the complaints from coastal Mississippi, Winnie Romeril, a spokeswoman for the Red Cross in the disaster area, said the organization was unprepared for the scope of the disaster and initially lacked enough fuel and supplies. She added that the Red Cross had 23 shelters in three of the most affected counties in Mississippi.

The Red Cross decided in the mid-1990's that it was unsafe to maintain shelters in flood plains, a decision that piqued New Orleans officials, said Dr. Bernadine Healy, a former president of the organization.

Dr. Healy said she negotiated with Louisiana officials to support state-operated shelters until the disruptions caused by Sept. 11.

"The obligation of the Red Cross is to oversee the sheltering of people in disasters," she said. "I had been working with the governor to find a compromise so that the Red Cross would be there at the very least to provide supplies for their shelters."

The Red Cross's mission is to provide immediate shelter, medical care, sustenance and small amounts of cash, usually $800 to $900, for clothing and other necessities.

It said on Monday that $1.4 billion of the money it hopes to raise will go to financial assistance, $744 million for food and shelter, and $78 million for mental health services. As of Monday, the Red Cross had spent more than $521 million.

Some victims have complained that the Red Cross is reluctant to dispense cash; the organization maintains that tight control of cash helps foster accountability. Outside a shelter in Baton Rouge, volunteers distributed papers last Thursday with a toll-free number for assistance and pointed to a sign saying that only residents in the shelter would be helped there. Some tried to argue the point, to little avail. "We were just getting the runaround from the Red Cross," said Mia Norflin of Carrollton, La.

Through Friday, the organization had handed out roughly $225 million in cash assistance to 236,000 people. Its shelters have housed more than 2 million people for at least one night, and, together with the Southern Baptist Convention, it has served more than 12 million hot meals.

About 36,000 people remained in 232 Red Cross shelters on Monday.

In Texas, Charlotte Toney applauded the organization for reuniting her with her husband and three foster children last week. Evacuated from New Orleans early because she had diabetes and was recovering from surgery, she ended up at a hospital in Houston.

"I was so out of it, but when the lady from the Red Cross called and said, 'I found your children,' I was screaming and hollering," Mrs. Toney said.

Mr. Becker said the Red Cross was unlikely to give money to other groups that might pick up the recovery effort after the relief stage.

"If we feel we have enough money to meet our mission, we'll tell America we have enough money and recommend giving to other organizations," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0006844

On Oct. 30, 2001, the Red Cross said it had received $547 million in Sept. 11 pledges, which would be enough, but the total swelled to twice that amount as donations continued to roll in for victims of the attacks.

Devorah Goldburg, a Red Cross spokeswoman, said that it would take many organizations to address the needs of the hurricane victims and that the Red Cross had told CBS and MTV not to raise money on its behalf and to find other charities. During the broadcast of the Emmy Awards on Sunday by CBS, donations were solicited for Habitat for Humanity.

In some of the nation's biggest disasters, the Red Cross has raised more money than it has needed. As of June, the organization still had roughly $40 million of the more than $1 billion it collected for a fund it created after the Sept. 11 attacks.

It raised $55 million for the 1989 earthquake in San Francisco and spent only $12 million on direct disaster relief, angering local officials who wanted some money to build a homeless shelter.

It spent about a quarter of the money raised after the attack on the federal building in Oklahoma City in 1995, and the Minnesota attorney general held public hearings to prod it to release $4 million retained after the Red River flood in 1997.

The Red Cross and other organizations use money generated in response to giant disasters to offset the costs of other, smaller crises. But many donors are insisting that their gifts be used for a specific disaster.

The Red Cross has always pledged to honor those designations, and it created the special fund for victims of the Sept. 11 attacks. But many people became upset after laerning that some of the money would be used to prepare the Red Cross to respond to future attacks.

Dr. Healy resigned, and the Red Cross recommitted to spending all the money on the victims. The special fund swelled to more than $1 billion.

In his book "After: How America Confronted the September 12 Era," Steven Brill described livery drivers parked in fleets of cars outside a Red Cross facility in lower Manhattan to pick up checks to help make up for lost business.

Red Cross Official To Meet With Lawmakers (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 20, 2005

Marty Evans, president and CEO of the American Red Cross, will brief lawmakers today on the organization's recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region, said congressional aides familiar with the meeting. The Red Cross, the largest nongovernmental organization operating in the hurricane- and flood-battered area, contacted House Republican Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) earlier this month, asking whether lawmakers would be interested in a briefing.

Pryce passed along the Red Cross's request to Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) last week after he was named chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. King, along with Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), the ranking Democrat on the panel, arranged the meeting and invited Republican and Democratic lawmakers.

The briefing is the second bipartisan event organized by King; he led a trip with more than a dozen lawmakers to New Orleans on Sunday to view the damage caused by the flooding.

From FEMA To WEMA (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

SLIDELL, La.

I don't think Washington needs any more czars. But if President Bush feels compelled to put someone in charge of rebuilding the Gulf Coast, let me suggest a name: Lee Scott.

Scott is the chief executive of Wal-Mart, one of the few institutions to improve its image here after Katrina sent a 15-foot wave across the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain. If you mention the Red Cross or FEMA to people in Slidell, you hear rants about help that didn't arrive and phone lines that are always busy. If you mention state or national politicians, you hear obscenities.

But if you visit the Wal-Mart and the Sam's Club stores here, you hear shoppers who have been without power for weeks marveling that there are still generators in stock (and priced at $304.04). You hear about the trucks that rolled in right after the hurricane and the stuff the stores gave away: chain saws and boots for rescue workers, sheets and clothes for shelters, water and ice for the public.

"This was the only place we could find water those first days," said Rashan Smith, who was shopping with her three children at Wal-Mart on Saturday. "I still haven't managed to get through to FEMA. It's hard to say, but you get more justice at Wal-Mart."

DOJ_NMG_0006845

That's the same assessment you hear from public officials in Louisiana, and there's even been talk of letting Wal-Mart take over FEMA's job. The company already has its own emergency operations center, where dozens of people began preparing for the hurricane the week before it hit by moving supplies and trucks into position.

I realize that Scott would not be a popular choice with Democrats. They concede that Wal-Mart and other private companies were far better prepared for Katrina than FEMA was, but they say FEMA would work fine if it were under the control of a virtuous, compassionate public servant - someone, as Bill Clinton suggested, like himself.

Clinton looks back on the 1990's as FEMA's Age of Pericles. "I think we did a good job of disaster management," he said on ABC's "This Week." While criticizing the Bush administration for leaving poor people stranded in New Orleans, he said that he and his FEMA director, James Lee Witt, had been especially sensitive to the needs of poor people because of their own backgrounds.

But if they cared so much, why didn't New Orleans ever work out a feasible way to evacuate poor people? FEMA had a golden opportunity to plan it during the 1990's. The threat of nuclear war had receded and terrorism wasn't yet a priority, so the agency's biggest concerns should have been an earthquake in California and a flood in New Orleans.

But it was too busy dealing with the record number of other "disasters" that Clinton declared - an average of one a week, which meant FEMA was mailing out checks for every flash flood within range of a major media market. Upstate New Yorkers suddenly became incapable of coping with the cost of snow removal.

In 1997, Congress gave FEMA $500,000 and ordered it to develop a comprehensive plan to evacuate New Orleans. The agency passed on the money to Louisiana, which used it instead to study building a new bridge. As Rita Beamish of The Associated Press reported on Sunday, FEMA didn't bother making sure a plan was drawn up - an aide to Witt said its job had just been to pass on the money.

How often do you suppose someone at Wal-Mart headquarters dispenses $500,000 and doesn't bother keeping track of it? The company can tell you the precise location of every thumbtack in its inventory. It's legendary for tracking every transaction and pinching every penny.

Its executives fly coach, and they empty their own wastebaskets. When Scott, the chief executive officer, travels with the chief financial officer, they cut costs by sharing a hotel room.

That's the kind of leader we need to oversee the tens or hundreds of billions that Washington will be spending on the Gulf Coast. Scott could insist on low everyday prices while still leaving the area as well prepared for the next disaster as Wal-Mart was for Katrina.

David Vitter, the Republican senator from Louisiana, was so impressed with the rapid response of Wal-Mart and other companies that he promised to introduce a bill to abolish FEMA and contract its job out to the private sector. I'm afraid the Wal-Mart Emergency Management Agency will be a tough sell on Capitol Hill. But I'd vote for WEMA.

Kerry, Edwards See Chance For Change After Katrina (REU-Y2)

By John Whitesides, Political Correspondent

Reuters, September 20, 2005

The two Democrats who challenged President George W. Bush for the White House last year said on Monday the devastation of Hurricane Katrina provided a historic chance to reevaluate government priorities and address long-neglected issues including endemic poverty.

In separate speeches, John Kerry and John Edwards said the administration's inadequate response to the hurricane revealed a failure of competence and values, while the public outpouring of support for storm victims showed Americans wanted more from their government.

"This horrifying disaster has shown Americans at their best -- and their government at its worst," Kerry said in a speech at Brown University, in Providence, Rhode Island. "Katrina stripped away any image of competence and exposed to all the true heart and nature of this administration."

The Massachusetts senator and 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, who fell short in his bid to oust Bush from the White House, said the storm created "a rare accountability moment" when not just the administration but all Americans could take stock of the country's direction.

"That's our job -- to turn this moment from a frenzied expression of guilt into a national reversal of direction," Kerry said.

Edwards, Kerry's vice presidential running mate and a former senator from North Carolina, said in a speech in Washington that the storm offered a chance to reopen the debate about poverty.

"We do not have to live in an America that accepts poverty as a fact of life or chooses to ignore it," said Edwards, Kerry's one-time rival for the Democratic nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0006846

Edwards talked frequently during the 2004 campaign of "two Americas" -- one for the struggling and one for the wealthy -- and opened an anti-poverty center in North Carolina earlier this year.

"Katrina has given us an opportunity to tap into the conscience of the American people," he said.

Edwards introduced a series of proposals to build opportunities for the poorest Americans, including "work bonds" to expand the earned income tax credit for the poor, a savings plan to help families buy a home, an increase in the minimum wage and programs to make college more affordable.

Both Kerry and Edwards are potential presidential candidates again in 2008, and both called on Bush to abandon his plan to pay for the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast without any tax increases.

They said the rush to rebuild should not distract attention from the need to address growing economic and environmental crises elsewhere in the country.

Kerry made pointed reference to the 2004 campaign several times in his speech, saying Bush's response to the hurricane was politics as usual and revealed a "betrayal of trust and abuse of power" designed to shift power to the privileged.

"The plan they are designing for the Gulf Coast turns the region into a vast laboratory for right-wing ideological experiments," Kerry said.

"They're already talking about private school vouchers, abandonment of environmental regulations, abolition of wage standards, subsidies for big industries."

Tracy Schmitt, press secretary for the Republican National Committee, said Kerry's speech was designed to politicize a tragedy.

"Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry," she said. "Such tactics haven't served him well in the past and today is no exception."

(Additional reporting by Jason Szep in Providence)

Kerry, Edwards Criticize Bush Over Response To Hurricane (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

President Bush came under withering criticism for his handling of Hurricane Katrina yesterday, with Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) charging that the storm exposed the administration's incompetence and ideological blinders and former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) asserting that even in its response, the administration backs policies that support the privileged over the working poor.

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, said in a speech at Brown University that Michael D. Brown, who quit under fire as the Federal Emergency Management Agency's director, exemplified the administration's failures over the past five years.

Using the nickname Bush used for Brown, Kerry said, "Brownie is to Katrina what Paul Bremer is to peace in Iraq, what George Tenet is to slam-dunk intelligence, what Paul Wolfowitz is to parades paved with flowers in Baghdad, what Dick Cheney is to visionary energy policy, what Donald Rumsfeld is to basic war planning, what Tom DeLay is to ethics and what George Bush is to 'Mission Accomplished' and 'Wanted Dead or Alive.' "

Bremer was the head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq. Wolfowitz served as deputy defense secretary until becoming president of the World Bank.

Edwards, who has made poverty a signature issue, said the plight of many of those displaced by the flooding in New Orleans underscores an urgent need for the nation to attack the problem again. He offered policy initiatives aimed at ensuring that Americans who work full time do not fall below the poverty line.

The former senator -- who was tapped by Kerry to be his running mate last year and, like Kerry, is contemplating a 2008 presidential run -- said the administration has long favored wealth over work. He criticized Bush for suspending a law requiring federal contractors along the Gulf Coast to pay prevailing wages on reconstruction projects.

"I might have missed something, but I don't think the president ever talked about putting a cap on the salaries of the CEOs of Halliburton and the other companies . . . who are getting all these contracts," he said in a speech at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "This president, who never met an earmark he wouldn't approve or a millionaire's tax cut he wouldn't promote, decided to slash wages for the least of us and the most vulnerable."

The two speeches followed pointed comments along the same lines by former president Bill Clinton, who criticized the administration's response to the storm Sunday. Speaking on ABC's "This Week," Clinton said Bush should roll back tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans to offset the cost of rebuilding, and he asserted that the poverty exposed by the storm-forced exodus was caused in part by the administration's own policies.

DOJ_NMG_0006847

"Whether it's race-based or not, if you give your tax cuts to the rich and hope everything works out all right, and poverty goes up, and it disproportionately affects black and brown people, that's a consequence of the action made," he said. "That's what they did in the '80s; that's what they've done in this decade. In the middle, we had a different policy."

